BLUE AND THE

Hasten the time when war shall cease
 Among nations forever;
 The golden rule guide all men's lives
 Peace flow like a river,
 Millennial dawn will glow the sky
 Light up the dark horizon.
 The mightier than the sword

America for a public school was given a woman, her sex was denied admission to the school.

Mrs. Marcet was the first person who wrote upon political economy in a way

Some three years ago when I visited the home of my childhood, after an absence of eighteen years. I could but compare the conditions of two of my dearest friends and schoolmates. Marriage had made them sister-in-laws. One was the wife of a doctor, and had one of the loveliest homes in that locality and seemingly everything that heart could wish: with two hired girls in her employ, with leisure time for recreation or self-improvement as she helpmeet and companion of her husband, ever willing to share his duties wherever placed, and that every mother should be able to challenge the love and admiration of her children. and be able ever to give them advice and counsel; and that woman's duties in relation, as well as elsewhere, should be identical with man's. Our husbands are beginning in this struggle and need our assistance.

My faith and confidence in the future

"NOT FARMER'S WIVES."

BY MRS. ANNIE L. DIGGS.

But let the funny items go their rounds: let the sneers and the jeers come fast. "Mrs. Livermore, Mrs. Lease and Mrs. Diggs" have shaken hands with the farmers' wives, and it is too late for the funny men to break the friendship.

On Trial.

We will send THE FARMER'S WIFE, on trial, to January 1st, 1892, for 25c.

THE SURAH SILK DRESS.

EMMA GHENT CURTIS.

From the Nonconformist.

O, friends, did it ever seem unjust to you
That such pictures as these are common and true?
In our childhood they told us the adage was meet
That he who toiled not, neither bread should he eat;
But our eyes must in wonder behold the reverse—
Wealth blessing the idler, while toil bears a curse:
The babe of the seamstress half famished for milk;
The child of the idler encompassed with silk.

And yet they dare call this the land of the free;
 They echo its praises from sea unto sea;
 Ah, yes, they pronounce it the home of the brave,
 Little dreaming its soil may prove liberty's grave!
 My country, awake from your lethargy deep;
 Shake off the inertia that waits on your sleep,
 Lest the lightnings may flash and the thunder
 bolts roar,
 And your name be forgotten on earth evermore!

A Tribute to Women Journalists

"Let me give you a fact about women as journalists in my office," said the editor of one of the largest dailies to me a few days ago. "Five years ago I employed one woman on my staff; to-day I have over twenty, and the best work which appears in our paper is from the pens of our women writers. Of course you cannot give a woman all sorts of commissions, but if I want a really conscientious piece of work done nowadays I give it to one of our women. I find, absolutely, that they do their work more thoroughly than do men."—Edward W. Bok.

The world's fair commission have appointed their own wives, their cousins and their aunts, women who have heretofore had little or no experience in public work, beyond preparing the church festival or social tea, the results, although intended for a snub to the woman movement, can but add another element of success. However the women organizations of the country had better put in some kind of a claim at the fair, as the Hoosier girl exclaimed at the party, "we must pitch in, as our dads pay as much as any of them."

Who would not be a Farmer?

Who would not be a farmer? He plants his grain, then he is in a holy wait for months. about too much drought, too much rain, too much bug, too much worm, too much fly, too much blight and too much rust.

Finally, if the cyclones and hail don't entirely do him up, he is still in a sweat, for then the grain manipulators, the worst wheat pest of all, get in their work, and he is forced to sell his precious lot of wheat for what they choose to give him.

Let's protect the farmer. Let's grant him a bounty of fifty cents on every bushel of wheat raised. It is just as awful and right as to grant bounties to American manufacturers, who employ cheap foreign labor to run their factories.

LETTER FROM LECTURER WIL- LITS.

To the Editor of the Advocate.

I have had some grand meetings through Illinois and Missouri. Brass bands and long processions, with crowds of thousands in groves and parks, have met me with hearty welcome everywhere. The mighty social revolution is on everywhere; the grand march of industrial progress and intellectual development is moving the heavens and earth for the enfranchisement of the masses. This impending revolution is gathering strength and momentum at every successive turn. The entire country stands aghast, systems tremble, customs change, and the long-established usages are breaking up; cringing cowards are being transformed into men; fawning sycophants are refusing to obey their former triumphant masters.

We are living in an age of mighty changes. It is the people, in the terrible agonies of a life or death struggle with the plutocratic powers of earth, that have combined to put to the test this last experiment of self-government. It remains to be seen whether the children of Washington, Jefferson, Madison and all the other illustrious heroes will submit to a system of robbery which can only result in a slavery the most degrading and ruinous that ever robbed and conquered a free nation since the dawn of history. We are making the fight in the interest of humanity against the combined powers of organized and legalized robbery. We want no cowards in this terrible conflict. We want Leonidas and his three hundred Spartans. We want an army like Gideon's, that will keep their eye on the enemy while they lap at the branch. We want a Moses to lead us out of the wilderness—a Joshua with power to command the sun to stand still while he fights our battles for justice and humanity. We want a patriot to kindle anew the fires of liberty on our country's altar. We want men, high-minded men; men who their duties know, who know their rights—and, knowing, dare maintain.

Yours for three years, or during war,
J. F. WILLITS.

ENGLAND'S GRIP OF GREED.

From the Montgomery, Ala. Herald.

If England would demand direct tribute of the people of the United States in one-half the sum her financiers impose and exact of the people of this country, there would be a declaration of war by Uncle Sam within ten days. What is the difference, in effect, from the government doing directly what the subjects of that government do indirectly? Take, for instance, the English syndicate that paid about twelve million for the system of elevators in the great grain districts along the line of the Chicago & Northwestern railway. Having possession of all the grain storage of several states, this trust gave notice this year that they would store no grain for the producers. What is the effect? The producers, in many instances, were not provided with the buildings to store their grain, so that it would not be damaged, and they were compelled to sell. The syndicate having applied the force that put their products on the market, in spite of the protests or opposing efforts, then provided to purchase at very low figures. The farmer sold. The trust bought. The farmer lost; the trust profited in the same ratio. Within one year the producers along that line of railroad have been robbed of enough to pay for this elevator system by that trust. In corporation vernacular, "the company declared a dividend of 100 per cent." In robber dialect, "the gang swagged twelve millions." Return to the proposition: If England had exacted and obtained of these American farmers 80,000,000 bushels of wheat at $12,000,000 less than its value, the United States would have made it a cause to declare war. Upon what ground? That the English government had robbed her people, and that the highest obligation of this government is to protect its citizens. Whoever should oppose it would be branded as a dastard and denounced as a coward. But these same people, robbed indirectly to the same amount, come to the government and ask a means of protection from robbery by British subjects, by this government providing adequate means to assure them protection through the sub-treasury for imperishable farm products, or any other practical way, and every big and little politician in the land lifts himself on tip-toe to howl, "unconstitutional demand." What is government but an institution framed, organized and administered by the people, through their agents or servants, for their protection? If it does not protect, all taxation is money taken from them under false pretense. If it does not prevent them from being robbed, the contribution made by them for its support is itself robbery. As the government, by refusal to protect, licenses this robbery, it has not only become a robber itself to the extent of all the taxes it levies, but is particeps criminis in robbery to the extent of all it willfully permits.

WILL SEE IT SOMETIME.

By R. T. Van Horn.

We mean this money question. Why should Lazard Freres be able to own and ship $2,500,000 in gold to Europe, or anywhere else, and so far disturb business and credit? It is only because the civil power of the world favors the usurer. And then what is the effect? Why, that these things we call banks have to squeeze the business of the country and destroy it. In a "boom," banks help inflate; in "hard times" they oppress legitimate business, very often. The man who does a regular business goes to a bank in boom-times and is told that their resources are loaned out on real estate and they must have gilt-edge security, for as a rule it doesn't pay to discount commercial paper. Then the speculative-craze collapses and the business man is told that their loans on real estate are so great, and there being no demand for that kind of property, they can only make sight loans. Are banks real friends to trade, or are they not? That question is becoming a very serious one. And bankers are not to blame, as they are merely part of a system. As one of them said to us not long ago: "A bank is a very good friend except just at the time you need it."

Now we know that this will not be considered good financial talk, but it has got to come to something like it before the masses of men are free from the grasp of the usurer. Even our alliance friends in Kansas propose to get out of their troubles, by starting a bank. True, it has a corn, or rather broom-corn, warehouse as collateral for loans, but then it is a bank, and subject to all the disabilities of the system. It recognizes the system that since the bank of Venice has ruled the world. For money to sustain armies, the governments of Europe have given the money-lenders the dominance of the world. Egypt to-day is occupied by England as a simple collector of usurious interest. Why? Because the lenders sustain the vast fabric of British power, and they demand that Egypt shall be made to pay at the cannon's mouth. So it will be in the Argentine Republic if they don't reimburse the Barings. The world is in the power of the broker-to-day, and there must come a relief outside any of the present theories as to finance. How it is to come we can't tell. But one thing all can see—the present system and civilization both cannot live together.

TO ALL FRIENDS OF POLITICAL REFORM.

The people's party has been formed under the most favorable auspices, and gives promise of an early emancipation from the thralldom of the money power and other monopolists. But this emancipation cannot be secured without special and extraordinary effort, requiring large outlay in the preparation of documents, arranging meetings and other legitimate and proper purposes. To this end every earnest friend of political and economic reform, and every reform organization, is urged to contribute at once and liberally. Don't delay a moment. Send the money now. Bring the matter up in your organizations at once. A few dollars contributed now, when the preliminary work is to be done, may do more good than hundreds of dollars just before the elections, when it is too late to organize and agitate. Remit all contributions to the secretary of the national committee.

WHEELING THE FARMERS.

From the Rising Sun, Md., Journal.

There is an old and rich and aristocratic class of agricultural papers in the east that have fallen in with the plutocracy, and when not directly opposing the farmers' movement for reforming old abuses they resort to wheedling and tell how bright prospects are growing and promising for the future. The American Agriculturist is conspicuous as one of this class, and the following a specimen bribe from its pile: "The new wheat is looking promising, and it looks as though we should be able to put our own price upon the crop," says the editor. "This means higher prices for everything the farmer produces and immense business for the railroads. When the farmers and railroads are both happy at receiving good prices, prosperity is insured for every industry." "Farmers and railroads" is good! This is a fair specimen of the taffy this class of agricultural papers are dishing out to the farmers. The farmers should mark these wolves in sheep's clothing and send out protests from every association against their double dealing. They should be driven to openly espouse one side or the other. "Prices are jumping up daily, but dealers and speculators both home and abroad are buying freely at the advance," continues this cheerful agricultural paper. Not a word is said about the process the speculators employ to bear down the price till the crop was out of the hands of the farmer, and now he will be compelled to pay double the price he got for his wheat for the flour he must buy. And the big crop in prospect which ought to rejoice the farmers to see it grow, when it begins to turn yellow for the harvest will be cited as an evidence of "over-production" and low prices in the fall. Money scarce, farmers must sell, prices low, speculators will buy up the crop, and railroad and speculators, not farmers, will be happy, while this class of agricultural papers sit like dumb dogs on the walls of Zion, and never raise voice or pen against the outrage that is yearly practiced on the farmers by railroads, speculators and government.

THE NEW DISPENSATION.

From the National Economist.

The partisan press of the country has advertised with big, black headlines, and numerous sub-heads, the action of the meeting as the birth of the new party. But it is not. It simply provided for education on the Ocala platform, for co-operation with the conference to be held in February, 1892, and, if necessary, to call a convention to institute the party in June, 1892. It is necessary that this fact be recognized and emphasized, because the partisan press of the south, where the conflict is now very bitter, will team with falsehoods about the capture of the alliance by a lot of sore-head politicians. They will say that a parcel of men afflicted with office itch, who had ridden every reform movement to death for the last twenty years, called the meeting for the purpose of tacking the alliance tail on the kite of their aspirations, and that all alliance men who advocate the alliance platform of Ocala belong to a new political party instituted in opposition to the democratic party by disgruntled republicans of the north, for the purpose of securing negro supremacy in the south.

But the point to disarm the partisan attack to be made in the south is, that the Ocala platform still belongs to the alliance, and the people's party will not appropriate it for political purposes until the farmers shall fail to do so in February, 1892. Now, therefore, if the democratic or the republican party, or both, shall take an equally just position on these questions, then the people's party will have to find a new reason for launching on the political sea. Otherwise, those parties can have no claim upon their members who believe in the "new dispensation." They have plenty of time and an ample opportunity to forestall it.

IN GEORGIA.

From the Atlanta, Ga., Southern Alliance Farmer.

Unless a great change takes place in public sentiment, all influences combined cannot keep the farmers of Georgia from going into a new party. It seems to us inevitable. The alliance lecturers we have recently seen report the people as being unanimous on this issue. The only opposition you find is in the towns and cities. There is no use in disguising facts. We see but little chance of Georgia going democratic in 1892. We don't know what changes may occur before that time, but there is a mighty upheaval of the people now in favor of a new party. Our farmers say that the western alliance men have stood by their every promise and they are going to do their part as well. You may just as well try to change the course of the wind by talking to it as to argue with a Georgia alliance man against a new party. They say the democratic party had done nothing for their relief, and they intend hereafter to rely on their own exertions. When they elected Grover Cleveland president he vetoed the silver bill and fastened the shackles of Wall street more tightly upon them; and now the politicians are trying to force him upon them again as a candidate. Of the hundreds of farmers we have recently conversed with, without a single exception they are advocates of a new party. We know that this information is unpalatable to our democratic friends, but it is certainly true, and any man who will take the trouble to interview farmers and inform himself will so discover. It's going to take big concessions and hard work from the democrats to secure the alliance support in Georgia. It can never be done by abuse and ridicule and the selection of Cleveland as a standard-bearer.

CAN REGULATE ALL VALUES.

By Andrew Jackson.

The result of the ill-advised legislation which established this great monopoly (the national bank) was to concentrate the whole moneyed power of the Union, with boundless means of corruption and its numerous dependents, under the direction and command of one acknowledged head; thus organizing this particular interest as one body, and enabling it to bring forward upon any occasion its entire strength to support or defeat any measure of government. In the hands of this formidable power, thus perfectly organized, was also placed unlimited dominion over the amount of this circulating medium, giving it the power to regulate the value of property and the fruits of labor.

THE CITIZENS' INDUSTRIAL ALLI- ANCE.

A meeting of the national board of organization was held at the office of the secretary in Topeka.

Vice President Allen called the meeting to order, and its objects were stated by the secretary. H. C. Vrooman, of Harvard university, sent in his resignation as a member of the board of trustees, which was accepted, and Gen. J. B. Weaver was elected to fill the vacancy.

Charges were preferred against J. R. Morrison, county organizer of Wyandotte county, and he was suspended as an organizer pending an investigation. The resignation of C. O. Fee as a member of the executive committee was offered and accepted.

BANKS ARE DANGEROUS.

By Thomas Jefferson.

I sincerely believe that banks are more dangerous than standing armies. Put down the banks, and if this country cannot be carried through the longest war against her most powerful enemy, without loading us with perpetual debt, I know nothing of my countrymen.

THE CINCINNATI PLATFORM.

First—That in view of the great social, industrial and economical revolution now advancing upon the civilized world, and the living issues confronting the American people, we believe that the time has arrived for a crystallization of the political reform forces of our country and the reformation of what should be known as the people's party of the United States of America.

Second—That we most heartily endorse the demands of the platform as adopted at St. Louis, Mo., in 1888, and at St. Paul, Minn., in 1890, and as a substitute for national bank notes we demand that legal tender treasury notes be issued in sufficient volume to transact the business of the country on a cash basis without damage or special advantage to any class or calling, such notes to be legal tender in payment of all debts, public or private, and such notes, when demanded by the people, shall be loaned to them at not more than 2 per cent. per annum upon imperishable products, as indicated in the sub-treasury plan, and shall be held for actual settlers only.

(C)—We demand the passage of laws prohibiting alien ownership of land, and that congress take prompt action to devise some plan to obtain all lands now owned by alien and foreign syndicates, and that all land held by railroads and other corporations in excess of such as actually used and needed by them be reclaimed by the government and held for actual settlers only.

(D)—Believing in the doctrine of equal rights to all and special privilege to none, we demand that taxation, national, state or municipal, shall not be used to build up one interest or class at the expense of another.

(E)—We demand that all revenues, national, state or county, shall be according to the necessary expenses of the government, economically and honestly distributed.

(F)—We demand a just and equitable system of graduated tax on incomes.

(G)—We demand the most rigid, honest and just national control and supervision of the means of public communication and transportation, and if this control and supervision does not remove the abuses now existing, we demand the government ownership of such means of communication and transportation.

(H)—We demand the election of president, vice president and United States senators by direct vote of the people.

Third—That we urge united action of all progressive organizations in attending the conference called for February 2, 1892, by six of the leading reform organizations.

Fourth—That a national central committee be appointed by this conference to be composed of a chairman, to be elected by this body, and of three members from each state represented, to be named by each state delegation.

Fifth—That the central committee shall represent this body, attend the national conference on February 2, 1892, and, if possible, unite with that and all other reform organizations there assembled. If no satisfactory arrangements can be effected this committee shall call a national convention not later than June 1, 1892, for the purpose of nominating candidates for president and vice president.

Sixth—That the members of the central committee for each state, where there is no independent political organization, conduct an active system of political agitation in their respective states.

Women in the Alliance, by Mrs. Clark.
Equal pay for equal work, by Mrs. Effie H. Rogers.

Our Intention.

The desiderata for a paper intended for family reading are simple. They consist simply of the best reading at the least expense; and not only the purest and most innocent reading, but with an interest unimpaired by its harmlessness. Such a paper must be spirited and interesting, without being viciously or unhealthily stimulating. It must avoid prosiness on the one hand and sensationalism on the other.

It is this sort of a publication that THE FARMER'S WIFE is, and it is alone in the field.

Every line of type in this paper is the result of deliberation and close, critical scrutiny. The subjects of its stories are selected with abundant care, and their execution guarded by every precaution towards the production of a perfect publication for the family circle. To make THE FARMER'S WIFE worthy of its name is no easy task.

Facts are indisputable evidence. Study this number of THE FARMER'S WIFE and be convinced that ours is no idle boast.

Our Future.

We are unable to forecast, to any certain extent, the program for the future. Suffice it will be a most brilliant one for it will include the best in its line that the literary and intellectual activity of the day provides. No source of supply has been left unexplored. The brightest talents have been levied upon, and a long list of favorites in the field of fiction, and of new men and women whose merit is destined to place them among the favorites, is the result. That the program will receive constant amplifications and improvements goes without saying, but even in its present form it will be found exceptionally attractive.

Our Field.

In the field of short stories, complete in one number, provisions have been made for representing writers from all parts of America, letters from some of the best woman writers in the land.

Our Purpose.

The purpose of the publishers is to provide the ampest variety and scope of brief fiction, both for the purpose of increasing the variety of this paper and of affording opportunities for comparison and criticism as to the styles and methods of the masters of modern light literature. The stories selected and pledged for publication will, in every case, be completely representative of their authors in their happiest form.

Our Correspondents

Are among the most illustrious names in the world of letters. These will be like the other works, varied in character and only of the loftiest merit. An exacting critical taste has been brought to bear on their selection, with the effect that they represent in themselves the choicest literature of the time.

Our Readers.

Kind reader, will you help us in this, our undertaking? Will you subscribe yourself and will you encourage others to do so if you can?

THERE are thousands of wives and mothers in New York who make ends meet by sewing on overalls that pay seventy-five cents, shirts sixty cents, vests ninety-five cents, trousers three dollars, flannel shirts one dollar a dozen. They are obliged to find their own thread for the overalls and shirts and carry the work to and from the shop. If they take a street car one-tenth of their earnings is gone.

WOMAN's sphere is to be measured not by theories but by her individual capacities and limitations, and these she can discover only by effort.

Our Agents.

We want the girls to act as agents. To every one that will send us five subscribers at fifty cents each we will send a copy free for one year.

Clubs.

We will furnish THE FARMER'S WIFE, in clubs of five or upwards, for forty cents a year. Try and get up a club in your neighborhood.

FOUR LITTLE GIRLS.

Each Wearing a Toilet in Accordance with Juvenile Fashions.

These two dainty little creatures are very tastefully and charmingly clad, the one on the left wearing a combination dress of figured white batiste and plain white batiste. The skirt is made up on a foundation of white silk and is lined with muslin half way up. The waist, which passes under the skirt, is closed with hooks invisible at the back. There is a double ruching, as represented, at the neck and yoke, and the sleeves are puffed at the wrist and also ornamented with ruching. The little lady on the right is dressed in white crepe, the skirt being made up on a silk foundation lined with muslin. All the edge of the material, which is cut on the bias, is trimmed with embroidery sewed on the wrong side. The corsage is also trimmed in the same manner, and there is a bouffant sleeve over an ordinary one. The corsage must be made up on stiff material and have a rosette of ribbon.

The left hand figure of the tiny couple represented in the other illustration is dressed in gray linen with a band of blue embroidery forming a square yoke, with ribbons on the shoulders. A band of the embroidery also serves for a belt. The garment is buttoned at the back. The figure on the right wears a figured white batiste, with a band of embroidery at the bottom of the skirt surmounted by three narrow plaits. There is a pointed embroidered corsage. The waist is made of two insertions of embroidery scalloped on one edge and run with ribbon on the other. They cross at the back and are buttoned to the belt.—N. Y. Sun.

ABOUT IRISH MOSS.

It Forms a Most Nutritious and Soothing Diet for Invalids.

Among the many useful things which absolute privation has been the means of making known to the world is carrageen, or Irish moss. The virtues of this seaweed, now so largely used as a basis for mucilaginous drinks and cough emulsions, were for many years known only to the very poorest of the poor inhabitants of the Irish sea-coast, who were driven to its use by the pangs of hunger.

Finding that when boiled it produced a thick, nourishing, and not unpalatable jelly, they for a long time used it as food before becoming gradually aware of its beneficial effects in diseases of the throat and lungs. After a time this discovery led to its medicinal use in other and richer lands.

Boiled with milk, or even with water, and carefully strained, it forms a most nutritious and soothing diet for invalids, especially for those who suffer from chronic diarrhoea or other complaints which are attended with great irritability of the mucous membrane lining stomach and intestines. The jelly may be sweetened or flavored in various ways, fruit juices, either canned or in a natural state, and coffee or chocolate, prepared as for the table, being preferable to any of the flavoring extracts, both for taste and healthfulness. For invalids it is always best to use the least amount of sugar which will make it palatable.—Harper's Bazar.

The Latest in Pincushions.

The pincushion is no longer the piece of resistance of the toilet table. From behemoth size it has gradually dwindled down to a mere dainty accessory, sufficient indeed for all practical purposes, but no longer forcing itself on the attention. Sometimes the cushion is pendant and hangs on the wall beside the toilet table. In this case it is in the shape of a succession of small rollings in graded sizes, made of plush and separated by ribbons. Then there are the floral pincushions, sunflowers, roses or water lilies. Cabbages, beets and other vegetable designs are carried out in a realistic spirit, but are hardly in as good taste. Fanciful cushions of plush and satin are also made in shape of banjos, fiddles or flutes, which may hang on a wall or rest on a toilet table.

A DEADLY HOSTILITY

To any Measure Which Would Aid the Mortgage-Ridden Farmer.

A Scathing Letter to the Senate Finance Committee from a Lady Member of the Alliance.

To the Finance Committee:

Your report on Senator Stanford's land loan bill is such an honest avowal of deadly hostility to any measure which can possibly aid the mortgage-ridden farmer, and prevent that culmination which is fast maturing, that no intelligent farmer or unbiased statesman can longer doubt it is the most rational and praiseworthy plan ever presented to benefit a needy and meritorious class and give so little opportunity for ruinous speculation.

A hearty approval of any bill by the late congress is sufficient cause for distrust of its honesty and effect on labor.

The public schools of our land have prepared a large per cent. of this people to interpret the constitution of these United States without the assistance of monopoly gold bugs.

Unlike the subjects of the Roman imperial republic, printed copies of that constitution are accessible to all, and we well know it clothes congress with full power to perfect a plan for government land loans.

The usurpation of constitutional power is the root and foundation of the infamous national banking system, which you so discreetly ignore.

Brazen faced demagoguery has been successfully administered to the people in tremendous doses in the past, but, having thoroughly analyzed all the ingredients, they now find themselves able to distinguish a pretended complacency in one paragraph and an insult in the next; so leave that out of your future concoctions, they will be cheaper and more readily disposed of. Further, let me say, those contemptibly conservative croakers who continue to presume upon the ignorance and lethargy of the great plain people, will realize their folly when the conflagration of burning thought reaches its climax in 1892.

The land and loan bill in full, being side by side with your report proves the contrary of so many assertions and insinuations I need not enumerate them here, while your ridiculous comparisons to bubbles, having not a future in common, excite nothing but derision of you honor as men and ability as statesmen. Since the few minor objections which might properly be raised to this outlined plan are beyond the grasp of an elite law-making body to moderate or remove, it remains as a test of the new congress, Democratic.

The salaries provided in the bill are 100 per cent. too high. Unnaturalized foreigners should not in my opinion, have this privilege. A legal tender should have no exceptional clause whatever. Money for the people is good enough for the bondholder and Uncle Sam's household expenses.

This bill, being pre-eminently for the poor man, loans should certainly not exceed $5,000 to one individual within a given period, say five years.

Certain farmers, being renters or non-holders of title to tree claims or homesteads, will, of course, be debared. If more fortunate neighbors choose to mortgage a portion of their land at two per cent. interest and re-loan to these at four or five per cent., taking chattel mortgage for security, is it not a direct benefit to both, and no risk to either, compared to present transactions in that line.

I scarcely need add that a large class of industrious farmers are so situated, by the adverse conditions of maintenance on farm products, that a single failure of crops by accident, heavy loss of stock, or sickness, may place them, and does, at the mercy of the money sharks, who exact, not six, but from twelve to twenty-four per cent. interest which makes all the difference between recovery and ruin.

So considerate in you to ward off temptation for the "improvident," who might be led into a little speculation, after the manner of the high and mighty worshippers of Mammon. When Uncle Sam falls heir to occasional tracts of "unsalable" land, he can convert them into an asylum for his young and promising "infant" (the beet sugar industry), at his own expense and personal management. It would then grow and thrive in a legitimate way, without becoming a distorted leech upon society, as no other member of that numerous family has ever done, owing to the fatal mistake of "putting them out" to the tender care of greedy capitalists at the expense of the wage-earners. The immense profits this industry yields would be shared by the producers, factory hands, and the government. Each plant would soon pay for itself, and in time would become a grand source of revenue. While "foreign adventurers" and genteel "do nothings" monopolize all the benefits of this precious "infant," it is likely to languish. At the remunerative price of $3 or $4 per ton for beets, Nebraska farmers are not dazzled by the opportunity, though it might furnish a good school of experience for the deposed national bankers that are to be.

Fertile brains can find many ways to dispose of all lands not suitable for this purpose if Uncle Sam's bump of benevolence could be properly developed.

This country, never having been the "dumping ground" for foreign soil, as it has for unprotected pauper labor, the output of a land currency is positively limited.

Farmers, as a rule, are too cautious to encumber land unnecessarily to any great extent.

The future will prove the land currency and single land tax two good spokes in the wheel of evolution.

Women in Clubs.

BY MISS MAUD E. PACK.

FOR FARMER'S WIFE.

During the past few years in which women have been foraging to the front so remarkably in the fields of enterprise, the problem of women's clubs has frequently been raised. The organization of women into societies, unions and mutual benefit associations was never so universally apparent as it now is. Women believe in the same rights as their brothers to unite; the formation of Alliances for the attainment of objects held in common.

Heretofore the women clubs and organizations were maintained solely for pleasure and society. There is at the present time plenty of interesting debate on the matter in the West, especially in Kansas, Iowa and Nebraska, where women in Alliances tentatively exists, they were universally in favor of it. In the East, however, it is looked upon with less approbation. Miss Kate Field, who speaks as one of authority in such matters, places her newspaper astride the fence on this question by suggesting that the clubs for the future be divided into three departments: one for men, one for women, and one for men and women. This leaves the dudes and dudines without any club at all; but her suggestion is neither impracticable nor inappropriate.

The great influx of women in the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union and kindred organizations in Kansas proves conclusively that they are the power behind the throne. It is fair then to presume that the formation of the Alliances is built extensively by the women, who show their faith in building up the organizations for the benefit of those who have been legislated against by improper laws.

It is through the influence of the women of these clubs and organizations that true reform is justly due, and it behooves the women to join organizations and alliances for mutual protection to all. It will be the aim of farmers' wives to defend and lend a helping hand to women who show by their works the sympathy they have for those who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.

THE most effective vote-makers in this country now are the newspapers that tell the truth about public men and political parties.

No other paper can take the place of a local paper for defending the people's rights and promoting their interests.

THE cheapest investment any lover of home can now make is to take the paper that tells facts that everybody ought to know in the line of National reform.

Mrs. S. E. V. EMERY, of Lansing, Michigan, is the first lady ever elected as a member of a National Central Committee of a political party. The People's Party is the first party that ever recognized women in their convention.

MISS EVA McDONALD, who made so many friends at the Cincinnati convention, and who all will remember by her lady-like demeanor and amiable qualities, was recently married to Frank Valesh, a prominent Knights of Labor man of St. Paul, Minn.

Satan's Stump.

Five long toothpicks, straight and perfect, are necessary for this trick. The way in which they are put together will be best understood by consulting the accompanying illustration.

Having completed the framework, the diminutive bogie man must be constructed. His body may be made of a cork and he may have matches for legs and arms. Decorate a bit of bread in a fashion as artistically devilish as possible, and give it to him for a head. Put the framework of toothpicks on the neck of a bottle or on the bottom of a glass turned upside down, and seat the little Cork Satan on medial line, so-called.

Nothing remains then but to light

The result of the conflagration is shown in picture No. 2.

The fire, having destroyed the end of one of the toothpicks, disintegrates the whole structure. The central toothpick, suddenly loosened, lets fly like a catapult and projects the poor little cork devil into the air.

Good Advice.

That there may be more than one interpretation to passages of Scripture which each reader considers quite simple has been demonstrated again and again.

A little pupil in an English girls' school, hearing the story of Joseph for the first time, took a decidedly original view of Joseph's words to his brethren. It is easy to see how unquestionable the logic of her reading must have seemed to the small commentator.

A London schoolmistress had been talking to her first-class girls about the pathetic portion of the closing chapters of Genesis which deals with the reconciliation of Joseph to his conscience-stricken brethren.

After the lesson, by means of "question and answer," she elicited from the girls how Joseph, a "could not refrain himself" in the presence of his brethren, but wept aloud before them; how he cried: "I am Joseph. Doth my father yet live?" how he told them that they must return to Canaan, and straightway bring back the aged patriarch; and, finally, how the great wagons were brought out for the journey.

"And now," continued the mistress, "what did kind Joseph give his brothers before they started?"

"Of course, she expected the reply, 'Provisions and changes of raiment.' However, this was not the answer she received.

"Yes, you may tell me," she said, pointing to one of the girls.

"Some good advice," responded the pupil, without hesitation.

"What do you mean?" inquired the puzzled teacher.

"Why, ma'am," replied the little girl, "Joseph, knowing that his brothers were not accustomed to the use of wagons, thoughtfully said to them, 'See that ye fall not out by the way.'"

THE NEBRASKA CASE.

James E. Boyd, the Governor, Declared Ineligible by the Supreme Court

Just now Nebraska is excited over the decision of the State Supreme Court at Lincoln, declaring that Governor James E. Boyd is an alien and, therefore, ineligible, and rendering a judgment of ouster against him. The Governor's counsel insist that the question is one of naturalization for the Federal Courts to pass upon and will take the matter to the United States Supreme Court. Should this opinion, from which one of the Judges dissents, be finally sustained, the State, Douglas County, and the city of Omaha are placed in embarrassing position, as even from a time prior to 1867, when Nebraska became a State, and up to the present year, Mr. Boyd has held numerous offices and performed executive acts, all of which become void, if he be an alien. As Mayor of Omaha he was prominent in approving acts bonding the city for large sums, which bonds are now in the hands of capitalists in New York and Boston. As Governor he approved numerous acts of the recent Legislature, chief among which are a bill appropriating $150,000 for drought sufferers, $50,000 for the World's Fair, and the vetoing of the celebrated maximum freight-rate bill. The legality of his acts in these questions has been recalled, and the greatest uneasiness prevails in railroad and commercial circles. Nothing has occurred in the State's history to mix affairs up to such an embarrassing extent.

JAS. E. BOYD.

SOME BRIGHT LITTLE FOLK.

Downey, of Regent street, London, commonly known as "the grand old photographer," took the pictures of nearly all the celebrated people who visited London in his day, and had a wonderful collection of photographs of the English royal family. He had a particularly fine collection of pictures of pretty children, of which the accompanying cut is one. The name and date are both missing, but the face has probably often figured in London drawing-rooms since then, and its owner is almost sure to be one of the belles of English society. A copy of one of his royal family groups is to be found in almost every household in England. It represents the Princess of Wales, attired in rustic raiment and a straw hat on her head, carrying one of her children on her back as she walks up a hill and the other little ones toddling after her. It was taken from life during a summer visit to Balmoral. Others represent the little princelings astride of donkeys and Shetland ponies enjoying themselves on the Scotch hills

STORING TOOLS.

Illustration of the Carelessness Which Too Frequently Prevails.

When returning from a little lecturing trip in Ohio we were delayed some hours by an accident, and our train "laid off" in one of the finest agricultural sections of that gem State. Toward evening the prospects of getting to any town for supper became very gloomy, and a half dozen or more struck across the fields for a farm house, and were much gratified at the devices adopted for storing farm tools and machinery. A good plow, apparently nearly new, had been left in one corner of the field standing in the furrow, just where, last fall, the plowman had finished his stint. Probably the timber-needed seasoning—it was certainly getting it; or, maybe, it was left there for acclimation. Perhaps the farmer left it there to save time in the hurry of spring work in dragging it from the shed. Perhaps he covered the share to keep it from the elements and save it from rusting; or, again, perhaps he is troubled with neighbors that borrow, and left it where it would be convenient for them. He might at least have built a shed over it.

Over in an adjoining field was a reaper and binder just where the job was finished last fall in gathering the wheat crop; in fact a few bundles of straw—the hogs had taken the wheat—were thrown over the concern, and the hogs had a cozy nest among the gearing and on the bundle table, and in their zeal to get the warmest place had worn all the dirt and rust off in many places, and the constant friction of their bristles made the machine take a high polish in places.

Approaching the house, we passed through the barn yard, and if this man does not act soon it will be a grave question which he can either move, the farm buildings or the manure heaps. Passing to the house the same order prevailed, though we managed to get something to eat, and paid seventy-five cents apiece for some bread and milk and a greasy doughnut or two.

After returning to the train, we were tired, and ordered our berth prepared and were soon asleep and dreaming. We again visited that man's barn; boards were kicked off, partitions were half broken down, racks broken, floor a foot deep with manure—there was no room to throw it out—hay trampled under foot and wasted, grain squandered. The wagon had not been hauled under the shed, though it was raining. The harness was scattered about—hames in one place, the breeching in another. The lines were used for halters. We again went into the house. A shed stood near by in which a family wagon was kept for the women to go to town in. The hens had appropriated it as a roost, and, however plain it once was, it was ornamented now inside and out. (It should be borne in mind that hen manure does not injure growing melons, squashes, cucumbers, etc.) This farmer bought these things in town. We peeped into the smoke-house, but of all the fixings ever seen this place beat them. A Chinese museum cannot compare with it. Onions, soap-grease, decaying pumpkins, hogs' bristles, soap, old iron, rags, bones, kettles, a broken spinning-wheel, a churn, a grind-stone, bacon, hams, washtubs, a barrel of salt, bones with the meat half cut off, scraps of leather, dirty bags, a sack of corn meal, old boots, smoked sausages, the ashes and brands that remained since the last smoking, stumps of brooms, half a barrel of rotten apples, together with rats, lugs, earwigs, sow bugs, and all the vermin usually found in damp dirt.

Two gentlemen told us the next morning that we did not dream half what they saw when they went to the house in the back way. The window near the door had twelve lights, two wood, two of hats, four of paper, one of a bunch of rags, one a pillow, and the rest of glass, more or less broken and patched. Under this window stood several cooking pots, and several that were not used for cooking, and as they were debating whether to enter or not, such a squall arose from a quarreling man and woman that they feared violence if they entered.

Two of us entered the front way and escaped the circus and museum heard and seen by our friends. Amazing change! a front door, a piano, pictures, books, and smiles. The back door principally old junk, slop barrels and quarrels. Oh, what contrasts can our most vivid imagination picture. But what else can one or could one expect from a person who stored his implements and machinery out of doors and spent most of his time at the grocery or saloon talking of hard times and the down-trodden agriculturist.

My friends, the foregoing is no fancy sketch, and its counterpart can be found in nearly every farming community. Then the question is raised why the boys will not stay upon the farm, but seek the glare, glitter, and achievements of town or city life? This class of farmers have no money to pay for or time to read the agricultural paper, but will eagerly subscribe for some political blather-skits thrice told tales, and can always be relied upon to have a bottle of whisky in the hay-mow or in a hollow log. These things ought not so to be; this is what brings the high, the noble, the exalted pursuit of agriculture into disrepute, and causes many of their neighbors to hang their heads in very shame. Such farmers as these are invariably dodging their creditor and valuing protest; their notes are seen everywhere, and finally they make a big sale, pay all their debts, but the Sheriff is the auctioneer.—Farm, Field and Stockman.

How to Seed Down Ground.

It depends largely, in seeding ground, whether it is to be used for permanent pasture or merely for hay for a year or two and then to be plowed up again. If for permanent pasture, we want the sod very thick, and a variety of grasses, so as to be fresh and succulent all through the season. If to cut for hay, we want only one or two kinds of grasses, so that they will ripen together. For a permanent pasture, a mixture of clover, timothy, redtop, blue grass, fescue, orchard grass and some others may be used. From half a bushel to a bushel of seed per acre is none too much, as the sod must be very thick to withstand the drouth and tramping upon it. The best grass for hay is timothy, as it sells the highest in the market. The ground may be seeded on wheat, rye, barley or oats, but it is not a good plan to sow the grass seed alone as, if this is followed, a crop of weeds is sure to grow, and a grain crop is much better than a weed crop. If seeding down is the main object, a less amount of grain should be sown. Some practice sowing lightly of timothy in the fall, and sowing with timothy and clover in the spring. From four to eight quarts of timothy seed per acre is used and from four to six quarts of clover seed. In mixing grasses always have one kind in greater proportion than the rest. Oats make an excellent crop to seed with, as they shake the ground and keep out the weeds. But they must be sown early to do well. Barley is also good. Grass seed should be sown after the grain, and not harrowed in deeply, because the seeds are so small. If the weather is dry at harvest, cut the stubble high, so as to keep the young grass plants still shaded. A heavy seed for mowing lands is one bushel of red-top, one-half bushel of timothy and eight pounds of clover seed. For permanent pastures the amount and the kind of seed will greatly depend upon the richness of the soil and the amount of moisture in it. Grass seed may be sown on the snow on wheat or rye. It will settle down and as the ground softens the seeds go in and soon start growing.—Practical Farmer.

Birds Pulling Corn.

Blackbirds are often very troublesome about pulling corn when it first breaks ground and until it is too tall for them to handle. They have no fear of the lines around the field that would keep off the crows, and they are too numerous to be shot, and too brave to be afraid of scare-crows, or of a man with a gun when he is more than a gunshot away. Corn they want, corn they will have, and it is the best way to let them have it. A peck of corn scattered around the borders of a ten-acre field, putting the larger part on the edge next the swamp, where they most do congregate, will usually satisfy their appetite while the corn is growing, unless they are very numerous, and they would rather pick it up than pull it from the hill. If one feeding is not enough, give another, as it takes but little more corn and much less labor than it would to replant the field. Do not poison the corn, as the blackbirds, robins and other birds that would eat it are troublesome only a few days in the year, and the farmers' friends, in these days of numerous insect pests, the rest of the time.—American Cultivator.

THE PIGGERY.

Pigs in Clover.

Pigs in clover, or those fed in clover either in the field or in the pen, are the best pork producers. The old idea was to make pork from slop and dirty dish water, and a sole diet of corn, but now that pork is made from good milk, clover and grasses, it is better, sweeter and more commonly used. Grass-fed hogs, or those which are fed clover until autumn, and then fattened on the new corn, are nearly always exempt from hog cholera and other swine diseases. Clover and other sweet grasses are essentials in the diet of pigs as well as in other animals. The farmer that feeds his cows and horses on an excellent diet of corn, and denies them clover and grass, would be voted down as a lunatic or fool. Yet about the same sort of system has been applied to the swine for many years past, and growers as well as consumers are awakening to the fact that sweeter and more wholesome pork is being sent to the markets. Germany and France complain of our pork, and often with good cause. No country in the world is so well adapted to swine raising as this, and more pork than can be consumed in the States is grown every year. Foreign markets are thus essential to the swine raisers, but these cannot be opened and kept supplied unless more pains are taken in sending abroad good, sweet, wholesome pork. American pork has received a bad name on the other side, but with the improved method of raising swine on good sweet clover and grasses, and fattening them on new corn, there is every possibility of greater success in the business.

As it may not be practical always to pasture the swine out, it is a good plan to adopt a system of soiling which will keep the hogs supplied with green food in summer, and roots or silage in the winter. If the hogs are given the run of the hay stack too, will subsist for months with but very little grain. A ration of hay or dry grass during the season when the pastures are covered with snow will be very acceptable, and greatly reduce the cost of wintering the herd. Our pig money must now come out of the pasture, the clover, the orchard, and other cheap foods. The old demand may have been for pork in the land sense, but the coming demand is for meat in the muscle sense, and good, sweet, wholesome meat at that. The active hog, which has the range of the fields, will produce this kind of meat much faster and better than the inactive, sluggish one, penned up and fed on an exclusive diet of corn. The sluggish one will fill up with fat, and the secretions will be dried up and the blood will thicken. The system of such an animal is always more susceptible to disease, and besides it is always more costly to produce fat than good meat, and to-day it is the least value as a food.

The old idea seems to have been to begin to fatten the hogs as soon as born, and as a result nothing but fat pork was produced. People liked this less and less, and then when the germs of a deadly disease were found in the great rolls of fat the consumers became frightened. Pork was no longer the meat of the people. The hog that is brought up to make muscle and lean meat, and then when needed for the market fattened on corn, always pleases the butcher and the consumers. A complete change has thus been inaugurated in swine breeding, and for the better. The result is going to be more profitable for the breeders, and more and superior pork for the consumers. It will also blot out the bad name which American pork has received abroad quicker and more effectually than all governmental interference. The whole trouble and remedy lies in the hands of the swine breeders.—W. E. Farmer, in American Cultivator.

Keeping Sows to Breeding.

The fact is not so well known as it should be that from three to five days after dropping her litter of pigs a sow will mate again. It is best with large, fully grown sows, to let them have pigs as often as possible, as in our experience they do better and produce more thrifty growing pigs by this method. The explanation of this paradox is that this method prevents the sow from getting fat, so as to injure her breeding, as she is sure to do if left too long without pigs suckling her. Sows thus treated not only bear but will need liberal feeding, as the growing fetus and suckling pigs are drawing on the sow, besides the nourishment required to maintain her own existence.—American Cultivator.

Selling Young Pigs.

There is no way of making profit from hogs so easily and certainly as keeping a number of first-class breeding sows and selling the pigs when from six to ten weeks old. The price of pigs at this age generally represent both in the eye of the seller and buyer a considerable share of what the pig will grow to if properly fed. It is true the young pig makes more weight from same amount of feed than he does when older, but generally the man who sells the piglets this profit, or a good share of it, without the expense of feeding.

Notes.

UNIFORMITY in size, color and weight will add to the value of a lot of hogs when they are ready to market.

RIVALRY among swine breeders is a good thing, so long as it does not lead them to disparage the merits of others.

Or the seven to nine months required to feed a hog for market, from five to seven of them should be spent in good pastures.

In a majority of cases it is the breeder and feeder that looks after the little things in the management that makes the most money.

It is to the credit of hog breeders that in comparison with other classes of stock fully as much improvement has been made, says the Iowa Farmer.

The best profit is not realized with the greatest weight in swine, says an exchange. It is medium weight and early maturity that is the most desirable.

MANY beginners get discouraged in attempting to improve the quality of their hogs because prices get low, but this should only be an inducement for further improvement, says a writer.

Drying Out Rubber Boots.

Many farmers would wear rubber boots more than they do if they knew how to get them dry inside. A wet rubber boot is about the most uncomfortable thing one can put on his feet. Mr. M. H. C. Gardner, of Orange County, N. Y., tried hot oats, hot sand and a hot oven, with poor success, and was about ready to give up rubber boots when he hit upon the plan for drying shown in the illustrations. A stout wire is bent as shown, with loops large enough to admit the boot legs. There is a hook at the back to hold the wire in place when put over the stovepipe. The boots are thus out of the way, and when a fire is kept overnight they are perfectly dry and warm in the morning.—Rural New Yorker.

"A NEIGHORLY LIFT."

JAMES K. REEVE.

Farmer Allen was sitting at his comfortable breakfast table one morning in early April. About him was every evidence of thrift; his children were well clad, and upon their cheeks was the ruddy glow of health; his wife smiled happily at him from across the table as she poured his cup of fragrant coffee, and added to it a generous measure of cream—the product of their own sleek Jerseys. The sun shone warmly in at the window, the birds were singing merrily in the trees, the young grass on the lawn was showing patches of bright green here and there. Spring was abroad in the land.

"I shall finish sowing the west field to-day," said Mr. Allen. "Then we shall be through with the oats in good season, and Monday I can begin to plow the corn land. I am getting a good start with the work this year, and if the weather holds good the crops will all be put in in fine shape. And you know, Mary, a crop well sown is half-grown."

"Yes, I am glad you are not being pushed, as you were last year, Richard. But I am afraid all our neighbors are not so well off in that respect as we; I wish they were."

"True, Mary, I see that Denton has not turned a furrow yet. His land is not quite as dry as ours, and so not ready to work quite as early. But I am afraid the poor fellow isn't able to do much this year."

"I was over there yesterday. He looks bad, and I guess he isn't a well man yet. And they are worried about the farm. Mrs. Denton said that Joe wasn't fit to work, but that she could hardly keep him from it, and I know that they haven't money to hire help, for it has taken everything they had to pay the doctor bills this winter and keep up the interest on the mortgage."

Farmer Allen rose from the table and walked out to the barn rather more slowly than was customary. And while he was putting the harness on his two good grays he worked thoughtfully, and hesitated once or twice as if not quite sure that it was what he wanted to do, and chewed vigorously the while at a wisp of hay, as if that might solve his problem. Finally, when the harness was all adjusted he left the grays standing in the stalls, and walked over to the box where he kept his driving horse.

"I guess you must go out this morning, Dick," he said, patting the sleek, brown coat. "I reckon the mistress wants you, if she didn't say so."

Dick whinnied good-naturedly, and lowered his fine head to receive bit and bridle, as if to say that he would much rather be out-of-doors this fine spring morning than standing idle in his box; and he fairly pranced with exuberance of spirits when his master placed him between the shafts of the light buggy and then drove around to the front of the house and stopped before the gate. Mrs. Allen smiled as she watched her husband's movements, and walked down the path to meet him. There was such perfect understanding between those good people that it seemed sometimes to lessen the need of words.

"I concluded, Mary," said the farmer, with a glance of humor in his face, "that we had better take a play spell Monday, if the weather holds good. You know I've been working pretty hard this week, and all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy."

"Yes!" Mrs. Allen nodded at her husband understandingly, and waited for him to go on.

"Perhaps we had better make a little picnic of it, and invite some of the neighbors. You and Dick might take the morning to see about it, and if you ain't home by dinner time I guess the boys and I can make out."

"Who had I better see, and what shall I say?"

Allen laughed contentedly by way of answer.

"If you say to others just what you told me this morning, I guess it will be enough. I don't believe any of them can be any more set about going on with their work than I was to begin plowing that corn-field Monday morning. And tho' to whom to see—why, there's Kennedy, and Ransom, and both the Thom-thas, and any one else you come across. Denton has about twenty acres that ought to be plowed and sown right away. Let me see. It we have ten teams to plow, and three to harrow, and three to drill, we could just about get it done in a day. I'll hire Sam Williams with his team—he ain't hardly able to give the time himself, and I'll get a hand to work Denton's team. Besides myself, that will leave thirteen for you to drum up. Do you suppose you can do it?"

Allen closed a little anxiously. When he came to figure up it seemed a pretty large undertaking. He was by no means certain that thirteen farmers could be found in that neighborhood who were willing to lose a day out of their best season for the sake of "lending a hand" to a neighbor. It was a good deal to ask of them.

"Never mind; we'll get along all right. And, Mary, suppose you tell each man to bring oats enough to sow all the ground that he intends to plow, and fodder for his own team. And as for dinner, I guess we can leave that to you."

It was not Allen's way to half do a thing, and he was determined that if this lift was to be given to Denton, it should be done right. There must be no expense for seed, nor for feeding an army of teams, nor for dinner for a lot of hungry men. As Mrs. Allen was fully in accord with this sentiment, it was not long before Dick was taking her speedily along the turnpike that led to the house of their nearest neighbors, the Kennedys. This was not just the place at which Mrs. Allen would have wished to begin her work, for Simon Kennedy had rather an unenviable reputation for "nearness." But she concluded that she might as well try here first, as long as it came in her way. The gate of the farm-yard stood open and Mr. Kennedy was just coming out with his team, on the way to a distant field for his day's work.

"Good morning, Mr. Kennedy. I am glad that I came before you were gone, for I want to see you this time. How are you getting on with your spring work?"

"Eh!" said the farmer, somewhat surprised at this question from a woman. "Eh! Well, fairly, I guess. I ain't usually much behindhand, am I?" He returned question for question with a self-satisfied chuckle.

"No, you are not, and that is why I have come to you first. Mr. Allen is going over Monday to give Joe Denton a hand at getting his oats sown, and he thought maybe you would like to go, too." Mrs. Allen knew her man too well to put it in the light of a duty, and one that he must be reminded of by others.

"Well, I don't know, Mrs. Allen. What I get I work for, and I work hard. I ain't got over much sympathy with men that are always behind with their crops."

"But you know Mr. Denton has been sick all winter; and maybe he is a little discouraged, and if his neighbors should turn in and give him a start—"

"Who else have you talked with?"

"Nobody yet. I wanted to start with you, for I knew you could influence others."

Mrs. Allen was somewhat of a diplomat, and knew that Simon Kennedy liked to be thought charitable, whether he was so or not.

"Well, I'll see. Mother!" At the sound of his voice Mrs. Kennedy came out upon the porch.

"Why, good morning, Mrs. Allen. Won't you come in?" she called out hospitably at the sight of her neighbor; but before Mrs. Allen could answer, her husband spoke again.

"Mother, Dick Allen and I are thinking of going over and helping Joe Denton next Monday. He's somewhat behind with his work. Do you think we can afford to lose a day of such weather from our own affairs?"

"Oh! it would be such a good thing," said the kindly soul. "I know he ain't able to do anything, and it worries him and keeps him down all the time. And you know you said last night that you could not do much more here till the ground got some drier."

"Never mind what I said," replied her husband, with some discomfiture. "A good farmer can always find work to do. But I guess I might as well join Allen. So, tell him I'll be on hand Monday."

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Kennedy. Now, I'm going right over to Ransom's, and will say you sent me; and, by the way, Richard said he was going to take seed enough to sow all the land he could plow, and feed for his own team. And you and I, Mrs. Kennedy, must have an eye on the dinner."

At Ransom's Mrs. Allen was sure of her ground, and had a quiet laugh with her friends, because Simon Kennedy was to pose as one of the originators of the scheme.

Ransom not only agreed to come himself, but vouched for two other young farmers that he knew would join them but who were too far away for Mrs. Allen to see in person. He would ride over to their farms on Sunday and tell them—"a good day for a good deed." And he would get up a spirit of friendly rivalry among the men, to see who would be first on the ground, so as to be sure of getting in a full day's work. Ransom agreed with Mrs. Allen that the field must be plowed and planted before nightfall; and his wife began forthwith upon a supply of cakes and pies, for which she was famous, so that her portion might make up for others who would have a less time to prepare.

Then Dick and his mistress went on through the bright spring morning, over many a mile of level road that wound between fair homesteads. And they carried with them such a brisk and honest air of cheery hope and helpfulness that every one, almost, gave in his word at once, promising to be on hand at Denton's on the coming Monday morning.

When Mrs. Allen returned home late that afternoon, tired but happy with the success of her mission, and looked over the list with her husband, she found that she had fourteen men and teams provided—one more than they had counted would be needed. So, even allowing for mishaps, there was little doubt but that Joe Denton's oat field would be well plowed and planted.

All that bright Saturday, Denton wandered in and out of the house, restlessly. He was anxious to go to work, and was only re-trained by the pleading of his good wife.

"Now, Joe, dear, do wait until the first of the week, at least. You will be a little stronger by then, and it won't hurt much to wait just a little longer."

"But, wife, there will be so many other things to do after a little, and I don't want to be behind-hand all the season, and I can see that Allen is finishing up his oats to-day. I hate to begin after every one else is through."

"I know it is hard to sit still when you want to work. But you must try to be patient and not begin too soon for your strength."

By dint of persuasion she managed to keep him moderately quiet; but all day Sunday he was anxious for the morrow to come so that he could begin to turn the brown furrows. He loved to work in the ground, to see his bright, plow-share glint in the long rows of freshly-turned earth. He was no laggard from habit or liking.

But early as Denton and his wife were astir on Monday morning, others were there before them. Ransom, not to be outdone at the game that he himself had proposed, was on hand long before the sky began to grow gray in the east.

Allen was not far behind him, and the others came in thick and fast.

Denton and his wife could hardly believe the evidence of their senses when they saw the array of men and teams (for not one had failed to come), and when Richard Allen, in a few well-chosen words, said that they had come to give him a neighborly lift with the spring work, and that his part of the day's duties was to be simply to tell them where and what to do. Then, without more ado, the whole force was started for the oat-field, and plowing began in good earnest.

Throughout the morning the good wives and daughters of these neighbors kept coming by ones and twos and threes until the house and the yard seemed overflowing with them, and as every one brought a basketful of eatables, there was soon enough to feed even a score of hungry plowmen. Tables were improvised in the orchard where a few trees were beginning to put out some early blossoms, and when the men came from the field at noon they found a feast spread that well repaid them for the morning's labor. Then after a rest and chat they were back at their work again, and so heartily was it followed up that before sunset the field was plowed and harrowed and rolled and sown, and the forces of nature were already busy at germinating the seed upon the twenty acres, that only the night before had stared at Joe Denton with the menace of many a day of hard toil in its untouched surface.

When his neighbors started homeward that night, Denton tried to thank them, but his voice failed, and he asked Allen to say a few words for him, which that worthy man did in about the following manner:

"Neighbors," he said, "I, for one, am very much obliged to Denton for the opportunity he has given us of spending a pleasant day together on his farm. I have learned, and I believe some of the rest of you have as well, that just as much satisfaction may be had from giving a neighbor a lift now and then, as by tugging away so continuously to just lift ourselves." Before he left, he took Denton aside for a few private words.

"Take things easy now for a week," he said. "Your corn ground won't do to work for that time at least, and there is nothing else pressing. Live out of doors for a few days, loaf, visit, (come over and see us and bring your wife), don't worry, and you will soon have a new lease of life."

Denton heeded his friendly advice, and so by the time there was work to do he was ready to do it. His crops prospered (it was said that no field of oats for miles around was so good, as his that year), and when autumn came he found himself fairly "on his feet" again, thanks to the breakfast table conversation of Richard Allen and his wife that fair April morning. —Rural New Yorker.

How It Got There.

Visitors to city hotels and restaurants have often wondered how the huge piece of ice was introduced into the water bottles with the narrowest necks—until the possibility has dawned on them that it may have been frozen in its position. But have our readers never puzzled their brains to account for the presence of the iron ball inside a sleigh bell? An exchange says that the inventor of the bell was obliged to do considerable thinking before the idea struck him.

In making the bell the iron ball is put inside a sand core just the shape of the inside of the bell. Then a mold is made just the shape of the outside of the bell. This sand core, with the jinglet inside, is placed in the mold of the outside, and the melted metal is poured in, which fills up the space between the core and mold. The hot metal burns the core so that it can be all shaken out, leaving the ball within the shell. Ball valves, swivel joints and many other articles are cast in the same manner.

DANCERS IN THIBET.

They Wear Masks and Rope, with Which They scourge Themselves.

Dancing enters into a great many of the religious ceremonies in Thibet, where the inhabitants spend a great part of their time in worship and its attendant festivals.

Prince Henry, of Orleans, eldest son of the Duke of Chartres, has recently returned from a journey of exploration in Central Thibet. With M. Bonvalot, the noted explorer, and a company of guides and servants, he crossed the desolate country between Lakes Lob Nor and Teogri Nor, narrowly escaping loss among the glaciers. In Lhasa, the sequestered capital of Thibet, which they reached after many hardships, they saw many religious dances. The most striking of these was a dance by masked priests, decorated with the ropes with which they are accustomed to flagellate themselves.

Despite the fact that Prince Henry was announced as a person of high degree, he got an occasional cut with the rope when his curiosity led him to crowd too near the dancers.

HOW HEBREW LADIES DRESS.

The Jewish women of Tunis are renowned for a certain robust beauty and for their picturesque costume, which no Mahometan woman would dare to wear. In a land where all the other women look like bales of rags, these stalwart daughters of Israel are very noticeable.

The short trousers which they wear are richly embroidered with gold and so are the broad garters which encircle their undraped limbs. All their other attire, even to their slippers, is laden with ornaments. In their hands, when in the street, they carry strangely shaped fans, in the use of which they are great coquettes.

There are many thousands of these women, generally wives of prosperous merchants, in the Regency of Tunis.

Money in Chewing Gum.

Gathering chewing gum near St. John, N. B., at the present time is considered even more profitable than anything else farmers' sons can turn their hands to. The demand is large and a high figure is assured. When it is known that last year one drug-gist alone sold 200 pounds of spruce gum a fair idea of consumption and demand may be had. For a really choice article, the price to the picker is 75 cents per pound.

A Negro Corporation.

The application for a charter for a negro trade-school association at Memphis, Tenn., indicates a move in the right direction. The object is to train colored people in mechanical trades, domestic science and sick nursing. It cannot be too often and too earnestly insisted that the future of the colored race depends largely on the multiplication of its skilled artificers, men and women who can manufacture and construct.

Washes Her Face With Her Feet.

There is a little girl in Sausalito, Cal., who makes the same use of her feet that most people do of their hands. She hasn't any arms and so she washes her face and combs her hair and boxes her brother's and sister's ears with her feet. She thinks the latter are just as convenient and useful as hands.

ART OF WOOD ENGRAVING.

The Chinese Claim to Have Known It 3,000 Years.

The art of engraving on wood was introduced into Europe from China by merchants trading with that country. The Chinese claim to have known the art a thousand years before the birth of Christ, but though that is probably not true, it is certain that they knew it before the European nation did. Early in the fifteenth century illustrations of the Bible and playing cards were printed from wooden engraved blocks. These two things were in a way the first to be printed in Europe. From printing with blocks to the use of movable type was a natural step. A full-length portrait of St. Christopher, done in 1423, is one of the earliest wood engravings. It is remarkable for the attempts at shading. Another good specimen of early wood engraving is the title page of a Sallust printed in 1481. Sallust is seen dictating to three scribes, one of whom, Joannes Britannicus, John of Britain, writes with two hands. The printing of playing cards and of Biblical illustrations became so general an industry during the fifteenth century that the Venetian Senate, in order to protect the city's own share of it, forbade the importation of them. At the same time large numbers of block books, printed by the use of engraved wooden blocks, were published. "The Poor Preacher's Bible," is among the best known of these. It contains forty pages printed on one side only. The ink is pale brown, and the transfer from the blocks to the paper was done with a rubber. These books immediately preceded the introduction of printing with type by Gutenberg and Caxton. The text and titles of the illustrations are done in handwriting in the block books. There is no indication on them of the date or place of publication, but most of them were made in Holland and Germany. "The Mirror of Human Salvation" is a book in which the illustrations were printed from blocks and the text from movable type. Each process was done separately. The inventors of printing devoted more attention to the printing of Bibles than anything else, and many of them were illustrated. The Cologne Bible, printed, somewhere between 1470 and 1475, contains 109 engravings, which show a strong improvement on any earlier work remaining to us. The borders of the volume are decorated, and the designs often deal with things far removed from the thoughts of the inspired writers. "The Chronicles of Nuremberg," 1491, contains the first example of the process of crosshatching, by which color is produced by lines crossing each other obliquely. The best of the earliest wood engraving was done in Italy, but in the sixteenth century the art took great strides through the example of the great Albert Durer. By the use of strong contrasts in black and white he did away with the need of colorings. He is best known for his four series of Biblical illustrations, The Apocalypse of St. John, the Larger Passion of Our Lord. Another series, the Triumph of Maximilian, is famous. The herald is a representative piece of this work. The beast on which the herald is mounted has the hind legs and tail of a lion, the body, wings, claws, and neck of an eagle, with a lion's face where the eagle's might be. All is very fantastic, but artistic. Holbein, who flourished a few years after Durer, carried the art still further ahead. His "Dance of Death" and "Figures of the Bible" are among the monuments of the engraving art. After Durer, Holbein, and their pupils had passed away it declined, and at the end of the sixteenth century was in its lowest state. From that time on it did not flourish greatly until the eighteenth century. Then there were some interesting revivals, including the works of Hogarth. To Thomas Bewick, the glorious illustrator of British birds and beasts, is due the creation of the present art of engraving on wood. He began to work at the end of the eighteenth century. Probably the best work is done at the present time by American wood engravers. —American Analyst.

Slippers.

It is not always pleasant to see ourselves as others see us, and it is perhaps well for our peace of mind that we cannot always read our neighbors' mental comments upon our conduct, or upon our personal appearance. Here is an illustration:

A trader named Smith, from the interior, visited Galveston, and purchased a bill of goods from a prominent firm there. He was politely received, and one of the proprietors conducted him over the immense store. On reaching the fourth floor, the customer, perceiving a speaking-tube on the wall, the first one he had ever seen.

"What is that?" he asked.

"Oh, that is a speaking-tube. It is a great convenience. We can converse through it with the clerks on the first floor without taking the trouble of going downstairs."

"Can they hear everything you say through that?" asked the visitor.

"Certainly, and they can also reply."

"You don't say so! May I talk through it?"

"Certainly."

The visitor put his mouth to the tube and asked: "Are Sam Smith's goods packed up yet?"

The people in the office supposed it was the salesman who had asked the question, and in a moment the distinct reply came back:

"No, we haven't packed them yet. We are waiting for a telegram from his town. He looks like a slippery fellow." Youth's Companion.

BABY'S WARDROBE.

How to Dress the Little Tots Comfortably and at Small Expense.

Every mother should feel that more care is due to her own physical health than to the preparation of baby's wardrobe; so, while the little clothes can be dainty and beautiful, it need not take all the mother's time to prepare it, either by hand or at the sewing machine.

A great many are now favoring the use of knitted cotton bands, as very few skins can endure flannel next it. These can be knitted like a stocking, in ribs, and should be a quarter of a yard deep. However, flannel over the bowels is very necessary to a young child, so I think they are quite as comfortable made of soft, Saxony wool and knit on coarse, steel needles. In the middle of the front and back should be knit a firm, short strip to pin the diaper to, thus keeping both in place.

Some prefer to do without socks. If they are to be left on after being wet I should say by all means have none; but with several pairs on hand there need be no neglect in this matter. These are best knit like a short stocking, and they wear best of all. Some buy the short, cashmere hose; these are very nice and wear better than those that are crocheted. However, if you can do no better, crocheted them or make a little bootie of chambray skin.

Another very necessary article for a small baby is a pad made of two layers of cotton batting between some thin material—old swiss or lawn, if you have it; cheese cloth if you must buy new. This can be fastened to a band which is pinned around the waist. This serves to protect the flannels of the baby, and the dress of the person who is holding the baby. Of course this must be changed as frequently as the diaper.

No careful mother will allow the mattress of her child's bed to ever get wet. Protect it with a piece of rubber cloth; over this lay a blanket, then a sheet. To protect these, have several of these thin pads to lay under the child. These are more easily laundered than all the bedding of the crib.

Never place a heavy covering over a little baby. Everything for the bed should be light and warm. Soft blankets, a soft comforter made of cheese cloth, never a heavy shawl. Remember, you lay your child down with all its clothes on to sleep. If you cover it heavily when you take it up it is in a profuse perspiration, as you yourself would be under like circumstances. At such a time stop to think whether it is just the thing to carry the child to an open door or stand with it in a draft of air. Many ailments can be traced to just such carelessness.

Dresses of soft wools, like the illustration, can be used on cool or rainy days, as upon rainy days the starch is taken out of white goods and it loses its freshness so soon. Long cloaks, if of good material, can be utilized as a short cloak and dress when shorter ones are needed. The best is to provide material that will work up into other garments when the change is necessary.—Farm and Fireside.

To Remove Stains from Linen.

Salts of lemon and oxalic acid are doubtless excellent for removing stains from linen, but they are such deadly poisons that one dislikes to think of their use even in the most careful of hands. A little common salt sprinkled on an ink spot, iron rust, or other stain and then thoroughly wet with lemon juice and exposed to the sun will do as effective work as the poisons. Renew the application if required.

CONVENIENT TRIFLES.

Their Possession Will Render Traveling More Agreeable.

All who have tried wrapping various articles in paper and putting them in a traveling-bag, are sure to become firm believers in the doctrine of the "total depravity" of inanimate objects. Despite all endeavors to the contrary, the paper will come off or tear at the most critical time.

On any journey which will extend through an entire day or night, certain articles are indispensable for comfort, and they should be carried in a good substantial traveling-bag, which can be purchased for a small sum and will last for years. In it should be placed towels, soap, tooth-brush, comb and brush, and a pair of slippers; if for a night journey, a loose wrapper or dressing-sack in addition.

The soap supplied at hotels and in the toilet-rooms of sleeping cars is often not such as a person would wish to use, and even if it were, the thought of all who have used it before is very unpleasant. A simple soap-case (Fig. 1) can be crocheted out of white knitting-cotton; No. 10 is a good size. It is worked in single crochet stitch with a medium-sized steel crochet needle. It is made in two pieces—case and a cover to fit over it. They are joined with a cord made by twisting several strands of the cotton tightly together. A piece of narrow linen tape ten inches long is fastened to the center of the cover to be wrapped around the case and tied. When it is to be placed in the bag a chain about an inch and a half long is first made; this is worked round and round, widening for several rows. The case is about three inches long, an inch deep and the same wide. The cover is made in exactly the same manner, only the sides are worked a little more loosely, to admit of its slipping over. A piece of soap is cut to fit and put in the case. The material used to make this little case allows of its being washed when soiled, and the stitch used makes it so thick that there is no danger of the damp soap soiling any other of the contents of the bag.

Figs. 2 and 3 illustrate simple but convenient pockets for slippers and for combs. The material is heavy unbleached linen twill. The shoe pocket is ten inches long and six wide. On the front a design of a pair of shoes is worked in outline with brown linen rope floss. The flap is worked round the edge in button-hole stitch with the same floss. A brown ivory button on the pocket and a small cord and tassel on the flap provide the fastening.

The comb-case is made of the same material, and when desired can be made large enough for the brush also. In that case a width of three inches and a length of eight will be found a good size. A case six inches long and one wide will hold a tooth brush nicely.—Margaret Rider, in Country Gentleman.

How to Cook Vegetables.

From a new cook book by Mrs. Rorer, we take some ideas on the subject. Few things show the difference between comfortable and slovenly housekeeping more quickly than the dressing of vegetables. Potatoes, one of the most important vegetables (served in nearly every household once a day), are rarely cooked in a wholesome or even palatable manner; out of every ten plates that come to the table but one will be found perfect. All green vegetables should be freshly gathered, washed in cold water, and cooked in freshly boiled water until tender, not a moment longer. After water has boiled for a time it parts with its gases and becomes hard, and most vegetables are better cooked in soft water.

FRAME FOR PHOTOGRAPH.

A Dainty Way in Which to Mount Pictures for Presentation.

If a girl intends to present one of her own photographs to a dear familiar friend, who would not wish to shut it away from sight in an album, let her frame it, according to the following directions, with her own favorite color. It will not only be doubly suggestive of herself, but will make a pretty holiday or birthday gift or valentine of what would otherwise be only a photograph.

Take a cabinet photograph or one of a larger size, put a few drops of paste on the back side, lay it on a piece of heavy cardboard, an inch and a half larger than the picture all around and rounded off at the corners, and press it firmly down so that it will adhere to the back securely.

Over it lay a square of good clear glass a little larger than the photograph card—or what is still better, a slightly convex glass made for the purpose, which may be obtained at a photographer's. Then take a strip of cambric, cheese-cloth or any thin cloth that will absorb paste readily, saturate with paste, and fold it like a binding all around the picture, letting it lap over the edge of the glass at least half an inch.

Press it on smoothly, rubbing out superfluous paste, and turn the other edge over on the back side and rub it closely down. When dried it will be firm and solid, and no air can reach the picture.

Nor is the picture marred in any way; it can be removed and put in an album. If one should tire of the frame. The back may be finished with a neat paper cover or a piece of thin lining satin may be fitted smoothly over it by being drawn closely over a little way on the right side by a strong draw-thread run into the narrowly-folded edge.

For the frame take any pretty ribbon—three-inch satin ribbon is very pretty for a large picture—and arrange it as illustrated or in any original way that is pretty or characteristic and tack it securely beneath the folds and knots through the cardboard beneath; milliners' stitches, long and loose but still firm and invisible, are better than finer ones for this work.

Bright or delicate ribbons are only suitable for framing children's or blooming girlish faces, while such colors as golden brown, old gold and olive are better for their elders.—Youth's Companion.

FAMILY SCRAP BASKET.

If the complexion is greasy and thick soap, with carbolic acid or sulphur, is excellent, and flour of sulphur, a teaspoonful to a basin of water, should be used for washing.

A little alcohol in the water in which mirrors are washed helps to give a fine polish. Never wet a mirror all over when cleaning, but dampen and instantly dry a small part at a time.

If lace is narrow wind it tightly around a bottle and pin it on. Wet it thoroughly with alcohol and let it remain until perfectly dry. It will be like new.

A MAGIC preparation for keeping frizzes, "in" is found in mixing equal parts of glycerine and rose water and anointing the hair freely with it before curling, or an equally good mixture is made of perfumed olive oil with beeswax dissolved therein.

If ink is spilled on the carpet throw a quantity of salt on it which will quickly absorb the ink; take this up and put on more salt. Keep repeating this, rubbing it well into the ink spot until the ink is all taken up by the salt, then brush the salt out of the carpet.

To TAKE coal oil out of carpet, saturate with benzine and then rub dry with a clean white cloth. If the first application does not take it out go through the same process until it is out. As benzine is very explosive be careful and not have a light in the room nor a hot stove.

ALWAYS wash baby's mouth and gums every morning with water in which you have put a pinch of borax. It keeps the mouth fresh and sweet and prevents that uncomfortable affliction, a sore mouth, with which so many poor babies are troubled when their mouths are not kept perfectly clean.

To DRIVE away roaches take three pounds of oatmeal or meal of Indian corn and mix it with a pound of white lead; moisten with treacle so as to form a good paste and put a portion down in the infested building. Repeat for a few nights alternately, and in the morning remove the paste and the corpses to a convenient place.

Rye Short-Cake Toast.

One cup white flour; one cup rye flour or rye meal; one-half teaspoonful soda; one teaspoonful cream of tartar; one-half teaspoonful salt; one tablespoonful sugar; one cup milk (about), and one tablespoonful melted butter.—Mix the flour, meal and sugar. Sift the soda, salt and cream of tartar through a very fine strainer into the flour, and mix thoroughly. Make it into a stiff dough with the milk, using enough to enable you to roll the dough. Add the butter. Turn out on the board and roll out quarter of an inch thick. Cut into rounds and bake in a quick oven. When done tear them open, pour thickened cream over them and serve at once.

AFRO-AMERICAN WOMEN.

Brilliant Examples of the Progress That Is Being Made in the Female Ranks of the Colored People.

In a recent issue of the New York Age, T. Thomas Fortune gives brief outline sketches of a few Afro-American women who have wrestled with the blind goddess and to a degree won the game. One is a successful dentist in Cincinnati; another has a large and growing medical practice, in the same city; another has made a good business out of a hair preparation. Another, Mrs. Caroline V. Anderson, of Philadelphia, wife of Rev. Mathew Anderson, pastor of the Berean Presbyterian church, in Philadelphia, is a physician and has all the practice she can attend to; there is another physician in Brooklyn, Mrs. Susan S. McKinney. She is attached to the staff of the Homeopathic hospital, and is one of the women who constitute the board of managers of the Christian home for aged and indigent colored people which has just been established in Brooklyn by the King's Daughters. A sister of Mrs. McKinney, Mrs. Sarah J. S. Garnett, is principal of one of the New York public schools. Another colored woman who has earned a reputation is Mrs. Fannie Jackson Coppin, principal of the "Institute for colored youth," at Philadelphia. She is a very interesting lecturer, and has received much praise at home and in Europe for her eloquence on the platform. Another eloquent lecturer of the same race is Mrs. Frances E. W. Harper. Still another is Miss Hallie Q. Brown, of Brooklyn. Within a few weeks another colored woman, Dr. Varina H. Morton, has begun practice in Brooklyn. These doctors are all regularly educated physicians. As the Brooklyn Times says in speaking of Dr. Morton, "The colored people are very well able to look after their own physical, spiritual and material welfare."

A Marvelous and Wholesome Change.

Said a very intelligent woman, who, when in town, stops at a hotel on Broadway: "The change in woman's position since my girlhood is astounding. Why, twenty years ago a lady would no sooner have thought of using any other than the so-called ladies' entrance to a hotel than she would now of making her way through the bar-room. Now, however, she never bothers her head to hunt up the ladies' entrance; the main entrance is good enough for her, and she walks calmly by cigar stand, the open door of the cafe, the long lines of smokers, idlers and loungers, and steps on the elevator or halts at the desk beside a group of a dozen men and calmly asks for her letters. Put, more than this, she comes alone, she goes alone, she lives alone, she is no longer tabooed and ostracised because she is a woman. Almost every other name you meet in the literary world is a woman's. She has pushed herself forward, too, in magazine and newspaper work. She has her athletic club and her social club, her artistic unions, her professional societies. What man can do woman can do. Hence the new order of 'Daughters of the Revolution' to offset the sons. Surely, the English could not have been beaten without the women."—N. Y. Sun.

A New and Practical Society.

Another new society of women of a practical kind, is one to be established for teaching women how to cut children's clothes; not only the little muslin frocks now so simply made, but coats, jackets and dresses. Many mothers have happy intuitions, which teach them all the pretty arts of the kingdom of childhood, but they lack the technical skill which makes the labor of love easy and swift in accomplishment. The projected society proposes to take in as boarders all who are anxious to learn, and to train them under experienced hands.—Boston Globe.

ENCOURAGING WORDS.

ONE hundred and fifty thousand New York girls get sixty cents a day.

ON Irish railways women are much employed as booking clerks, and in Dublin tickets are given almost entirely by women.

"Four things are required of a woman," say the Chinese, "that virtue may dwell in her heart, that modesty shine on her forehead, that gentleness flow from her lips, and that work employ her hands."

ANNIE B. SAUNDERS keeps a paint shop in Eighth avenue, New York, and makes a good living at the business. She mixes the colors and oils, looks after the cash, and takes orders, employing men to fill them.

SARAH G. O. MALLERY, who has a little farm near New Rochelle, sends enough capons and game and fancy butter to the New York market to pay the taxes and keep herself in good clothes and farm literature.

THE Ladies' Grand Council of the Primrose League contains 1,223 members, presided over by the dowager duchess of Marlborough and the marchioness of Salisbury. More than two millions of leaflets have been issued by the society presenting facts to electors.

A VIENNA dispatch says that "there is a great demand for women physicians in Bosnia, the Moslem women refusing to be treated by male doctors. The Austrian government is engaging all the female graduates of the medical school at Zurich to locate in Bosnia, guaranteeing their income up to a certain figure."

It is the deliberate judgment of Miss Mary F. Seymour, who employs numbers of women, that there is work enough in the world for all the persons who know how to do it well, and that in some measure the scarcity of work that is so much talked of is most felt by those who can not do what they pretend they can or wish they could.

DR. EMMA WYGAANT, a practicing dentist in Peekskill, N. Y., is an example of what a young woman may do in a branch of surgery requiring so much muscular strength, as dentistry. Without seeking for a special career, she grew up in her father's business, and from a skillful assistant developed naturally into a successful dentist.

KEEP BABY HEALTHY.

Follow the Advice Contained in This Article and You May Succeed.

Baby's second summer is always the most trying. It is cutting its teeth, and the irritation combined with the heat makes life no easy matter for the poor little thing. It must be carefully watched, and its ailments rationally treated if it is to be carried successfully through this dangerous season.

A baby in the country, with all the advantages of fresh air and good milk, is under the best conditions possible to resist the effects of the heat. Yet the country, like everything else, has its counter-balancing disadvantages, and often one of these is the distance from a doctor. Before leaving town the mother should ask her family physician for a few powders of pepsin and bismuth, or any simple remedy he may wish to prescribe for indigestion, with full directions for its use. She should take with her a bottle of lime-water and another of pancreatin, or one of the other preparations for peptonizing milk, so that she may be prepared for emergencies.

The purity of milk, even in the best surroundings, is always open to question, because it absorbs germs so readily. That used for food for a baby should be sterilized to make it perfectly safe. This can be done in the morning and evening by putting the milk, fresh from the cow, in bottles of a size to hold enough for one meal each. Place these in a saucepan filled with cold water and set it on the stove where it will heat gradually. After the water boils for a short time, cork the bottles and let them remain in it for half an hour. Remove from the stove, and when the water is cool take out the bottles. If no ice is to be had, stand them in a stone jar containing water, and wrap the jar in wet flannel, or put it in a brook in a shady place. When a bottle is opened and all the milk is not used, throw away the remainder.

If, in spite of care in feeding, the bowels become disordered, boil rice until very soft, strain the liquid from it and add the same quantity of sterilized milk. Sometimes one tablespoonful of lime-water to six of milk will correct the difficulty.

Keep the baby in the open air as much as possible, but do not have it out in the evening when the dew is falling. If a hammock is slung in the shade it will sleep better there during the day, covered with a mosquito net, than it will in a hot room.

Dress it loosely, with a gauze flannel shirt next the skin, and no tight bands.—Ladies' Home Journal.

The Test.

"Is Mr. Pulliam original?"

"Sometimes Pulliam says very original things."

"But how do you know when the are original and when they are not?"

"I know they are original when I hear everybody going around disclaiming them."—Life.

THE DIFFERENCE.

BY CECILY COVING.

Grandmother doted, when she was a girl,
On back-stitch and hem-stitch and cross-stitch and purl,
Was taught in her teens by her own careful mother
To make the fine shirts for her father and brother.
Bilthely she sung over distaff and reel,
And merrily tripped back and forth at her wheel.

Grandmother's granddaughter runs a machine,
Paints like a Titian on panel and screen,
Runs over to Paris to buy a new dress,
And lectures and doctors and writes for the press.
Little she knows about distaff and reel,
But dotes—oh! so fondly—on grandmother's wheel.
She decks every spoke with a fine satin bow,
And then sets it up in the parlor to show.

Patience and firm through her youth and her prime,
With precept on precept and line upon line,
Her hands full of work and her head full of care,
Grandmother managed her household affairs—
Her closets and presses by prudent forethought
Filled with the work by her deft fingers wrought.
She married her husband for better or worse
And in her whole life never thought of divorce.
From club to committee, from concert to play,
Grandmother's granddaughter hurried away.
To her church and her charities, culture and art,
She gives much of her time and a deal of her heart.
Her world is so busy, her work is so wide,
She can spare time and thought for but little beside.
Nor pauses to think in the hurry and strife
Of the peace and contentment of grandmother's life.

JASPER PRICE'S CORNER LOT.

BY J. L. HARBOR.

"I've done wid you, Jasper Price!
Yes, sah, I've done wid you for good an'
all!"

A woman's voice rose, loud and shrill, from a little tumble-down cabin by a Georgia roadside.

Evidently the person addressed had no response to make, for after a little silence, the woman's voice rose again.

"I jes' wants you to pack up your traps an' clear out, Jasper Price! An' don't you nebbeh show your face heah no mo' long ez you lib and breathe! I mean jes' zackly what I says, an' I dogn' want to fin' you heah w'en I comes back from de spring."

A moment later a short, solidly built, elderly black woman came out of the cabin, holding a tin pail in each hand, and hurried away toward a little spring,
in a ravine some distance from the house.

Her face was both wrathful and tearful, and she had a worn, tired look. A flapping, old calico sunbonnet, drooping about her face, added to her dejected appearance.

A few minutes after she had left the house, a black man, not much taller than the woman, but stouter and slightly gray, came out of the cabin and walked slowly, and with an evident attempt at dignity, down the dusty road.

In one hand he carried a small bundle tied up in a faded red cotton handkerchief, and in the other a cane, curiously carved, of a piece of gnarled wood. A green cotton bag was on his back, and within it could be seen the outlines of a violin.

It was Jasper Price, who had at last been stung to take this well-deserved rebuke from his wife in earnest.

Jasper had been born with a constitutional tendency toward slothfulness, which his will-power was quite too weak to overcome.

His wife, on the other hand, was a very industrious and energetic woman.
She worked early and late, providing by far the greater part of the support of their large family of children. She had provided for her husband's wants as well, until her patience had been quite exhausted by several weeks of needless idleness on Jasper's part.

There had been a most vigorous outpouring of wrath, ending with this command to "Clear out for good and all!"

But she did not suppose that he would take her at her word and go.

"Dar ain't no sich good luck for me as dat," she said, when she returned to the cabin and found that Jasper was not there. "He'll be back 'bout supper-time. Maybe he'll lay out ontel he gits oncomin' hungry; but he'll come home den, sho' 'nough. I 'clar' if I aint a mind nebber to gin him anudder bite to eat!"

She had no opportunity to refuse him food. He did not come back to ask for it. He did not come back at all; days, weeks and months passed without a word of tidings from Jasper from any quarter.

His wife, kindly at heart, though overworked and worried, began to reproach herself. She discovered in her memory traits of excellence in her husband's character for which she had never before given him credit.

"I reckon I was too ha'sh wid 'im," she said. "He come in a lazy family; his daddy befo' 'im was too lazy for to draw his bryf, an' some tink he died on dat count. I reckon Jasper's no-count-ness was bawn in 'im, an' I done druv
'im 'way for what he couldn't help!"

She found excuses to talk about him.
"He was mighty willin' an' 'bligun'
'bout some tings," she told a neighbor.
"He'd 'ten de baby by de hour. He'd allus carry home de washin' I done for de ladies in de town, an' my, couldn't he play de fiddle beautiful! Dar aint nobody 'round heah dat could bring out Money-musk an' 'De Swanee Ribber' to 'Git out'n de way, Ole Dan Tuckah' de Jasper Price could. I does miss de fiddle a-jiggin' away out on de hills ob a summer ebenin'."

For months after Jasper's departure she was home a stout, travel-stained black tom, slightly gray, walked slowly and manly up the trail leading to a new thr promising Rocky Mountain mining trip.

She carried a little bundle tied up in a red cotton handkerchief. The outlines of a violin could be traced within a green cotton bag on his back, and he gave his name, at the mouth of a shaft where he stopped to get a drink of water, as Jasper Price.

"Well, old pardner," said the man who gave him the drink of water, "you look as if you'd walked all the way from Georgia."

"You done struck pretty close to de trewf, sah," said Jasper, ruefully. "I've walked many weary miles ob de way, an' I'd 'a' done walked de hull ob it if it hadn't 'a' ben for dis yer fiddle."

He had heard wild stories of the ease and quickness with which fortunes were made in this mining camp, and in his simplicity he almost expected to find nuggets of gold and silver unregarded in the streets.

He found quite a different state of things. People here had to work hard for their living as elsewhere; only the rewards of energy and industry were perhaps larger and more prompt than in the older parts of the country.

Jasper could get no farther, and presently he found himself possessed of some share of the restless energy of the people around him. His dormant powers seemed to be aroused by the spirit of activity that was in the crisp and exhilarating mountain air.

No one could be supinely idle long in such a place as this mining camp. Jasper was soon busy with ax and saw and hammer, putting up a little cabin for himself on a corner lot he had staked out for his own.

When the cabin was done, Jasper nailed a pine board over the door, on which was the one word, "LAWNDRY."
He could not read or write, but he had induced an acquaintance among the miners to paint his sign for him.

In his spasmodic hours of industry when at home, Jasper used to help his wife with her daily washings and ironings, and had in this way acquired something of the wonderful skill that had given her the reputation of being the finest laundress in all the country round about her home.

Since Jasper did not know how to do anything else, and as there was a great demand for the one industry in which he had some skill, he had resolved to open a laundry.

His success was great and immediate.
There were as yet in the camp very few women, and the prejudice against Chinamen was so great that it was not safe for one of that race to come into the camp.

Before the end of the first week
Jasper was so overwhelmed with work that he hired a poor boy who had strayed into camp as an assistant. Another helper was needed early in the second week, and still a third before a month was done.

Jasper had a flourishing business, and found it necessary to enlarge his shanty. He developed a capacity for business that he himself had never suspected.

His industry increased with his success. There was plenty of money in the camp, and it was not long before Jasper was possessed of ten times as much money as he had ever seen before.
Moreover, his head was not turned by his success.

He had a queer habit of going about chuckling to himself and saying, "Imus' write a lettah one ob dese days; for a fac', I mus'. Hi! I bat hit'll be a mighty welcome lettah to de pusson what gits it, case ob what 'll go 'long wid it. Oh,
I've gwine write a lettah by 'n' by, 'deed
I is!"

Even-tempered as he had been in the midst of steadily increasing prosperity, Jasper almost lost his head when he was one day offered $5,000 for his corner
lot. It was needed for a business block.

So fast had the town grown, and speedy and great had been the rise in real estate, that Jasper's lot had become so valuable as this in less than three months. Fearing a possible decline in values, Jasper prudently sold his lot and removed his laundry.

It was then that he wrote his letter,
or rather, had it written for him.
Among his patrons was a young lawyer who had befriended Jasper on his first arrival in the camp, and who had taken an interest in him afterward. It was this friend to whom Jasper applied when he was ready to have the letter written,
and the lawyer kept his secret.

It was about a month after the letter had been sent that the crowd which always assembled to await the arrival of the two stage-coaches, which came together from the slowly approaching line of railroad in the valleys below, noted the restlessness and peculiar actions of Mr. Jasper Price, who was by far the most prominent figure in the throng.

Newly shaven and spotlessly clean, he was arrayed in a shining suit of black, and wore a glossy high silk hat.
He had given a bootblack twenty-five cents for an extra shine on his large shoes. His wide expanse of white shirt-front shone in the sunshine, and upon it was a huge breast-pin of red and green glass and a gorgeous necktie of blue and yellow.

On his hands were kid gloves of a saffron hue, while a watch-chain of mighty and shining links was stretched across his waistcoat front.

His black face was beaming with kindly smiles, and he frequently chuckled softly to himself as he moved around restlessly in the crowd.

His excitement grew intense when some one called out, "There they come!"
and a great cloud of dust rose at once and of the long, stony street.

The second of the two coaches bore such a load as it had never before carried. The driver, with his hand at the side of his mouth, had told the "boys" as he came up that "all Africa had broke loose."

At the side of the driver sat a short,
well-knit, dust-covered negro woman, with a black and happy baby in her lap. Her face was wreathed in smiles as she looked down on the crowd, and a great responsive shout came from her lips when Uncle Jasper called out:

"Jinny! Heah I is! Doan' you see me, Jinny?"

From every window and door of the coach grinning black heads of all sizes and ages, and in all sorts of hats and caps and bonnets were now thrust with cries of "Daddy! daddy! We's come, daddy! Heah we is, daddy!"

"Hit's my fambly," cried Jasper, as he pushed his way through the crowd.
"Dem's my folks, in dat stage. Halle-looyer!"

Down and out, they came into his outstretched arms.

"Glory!" he cried. "You's all heah!
Heah's Jacky! An' Lotty! An' Lib-butty Ann! An' Ab'aham—Jaws, how dey has all growed! An' de baby!
Bless my soul, I'd nebbeh knowed dat chile in all dis world—he's growed so!
An' dis ain't Washin'ton? How he am changed, too! An' heah's Matildy an'
'Minty Jane! Come an' kiss yer daddy!
"What! yo' aint 'feerd o' yer daddy kase he's dressed out so fine? I've yer daddy, all de same! William Henry aint afeerd, is you, boy?"

"Is yer all out? No, dar's little Mose
—I hardly knowed de chile, he's got so big! Well, well, well, if dis aint de happies' day I ever see!"

They made a queer procession as they walked away from the smiling crowd.
Jasper led the way with the huge baby on his shoulder. His radiantly happy wife walked by his side, loaded with baskets and bundles, while the nine older children followed, each carrying a pot or a pan or a teakettle which their mother had foolishly 'een fit to bring all the way from Georgia.

Fortunate days had dawned for the reunited family. Jasper's industry did not flag, and he and his thrifty wife showed good sense in the use of the little fortune that had come to them.

When the decline of the camp's prosperity came, and the laundry business was no longer profitable, they went to fertile valleys below and bought a ranch, that their numerous boys and girls might be trained to habits of industry.

There, I dare say, they are still—

A grizzled individual in the attire of a farm-hand prowled along the docks all day. With all the rusticity of attire there was a tinge of tar and bilge water about him that added to his swagger and stamped him unmistakably as a son of the sea. His movements attracted considerable attention as he boarded vessel after vessel and inspected the pumps and then whistled for the ship's dog. His cruise extended from the sea-wall to Harrison street, and it was at this point that he was accused by one of Franklin's runners.

"Want to ship, old man?" he asked, as the stranger climbed down from the top-sides of the Lady Cairns.

"Yes, I'm going to the sea again," was the reply, accompanied by the observation that ranching was not what it was cracked up to be.

"I'll get you a good ship," suggested the runner.

"Well, you needn't bother; I've been to sea for forty years, and maybe I knows enough to pick out a ship for myself.

"What are you looking for?"
"A fat dog and a rusty pump bolt, you bloody lubber; what do you s'pose I'm looking for?"

"Come and have a drink," suggested the runner, who was anxious to learn the connection between a fat dog and a rusty pump bolt and a desirable ship.

"Well, lads, I'll tell you," said the intimate friend of Neptune, "and you want to remember this, because 'I'll be useful some day. It took me many years to learn it, but it's yours for the sake of your kindness. Mark what old George Palmer tells you—when you want a ship to look for a fat dog; that means the old man is liberal with his duff and you'll be well fed. Look for a rusty pump bolt, 'cause that means that the craft is right and tight and the crew don't have to break their hearts and backs keeping her dry. If the pump bolt is worn and shiny, look out, lads, for she's a sieve, and your watch-below will be spent in keeping her hold dry."

Mr. Palmer kindly consented to take just one more, and then sheered off his search for a fat dog and a rusty pump bolt.—San Francisco Examiner.

"Perfection No Title."

A friend once called upon Michael Angelo while he was finishing a statue.
Some time afterward he called again;
the sculptor was still at the same work.
His friend, looking at the figure, exclaimed:

"You have been idle since I saw you last."

"By no means," replied the sculptor.
"I have retouched this part, and polished that; I have softened this feature, and brought out this muscle; I have given more expression to this lip and more energy to this limb."

"Well, well," said his friend; "but all these are trifles."

"It may be so," replied Angelo; "but recollect that trifles make perfection, and perfection is no trifle."

How They Do It in Boston.

It is risky business reporting a man's speech. He will complain if you print too much or if you print too little, and he will swear that you got everything wrong that doesn't show up well in type. The proper way is to leave out the speech and speak of it in glowing language as a masterpiece. He can't find fault with you; and then think how much easier it is to gush than to do a job of reporting!—*Boston

BALLOONING IN THE ORIENT.

Prof. Baldwin Astounded the Chinese,
but They Were Soon Imitating Him.

T. S. Baldwin, the aeronaut, who has just come back from various oriental countries, succeeded in thoroughly astonishing the Mongolian race by his exhibitions. Mr. Baldwin has traveled extensively in Asia. He has looked down from midair on the temple of Delhi, the wharves of Calcutta and the jungles of Sumatra and other oriental regions rarely treated to the excitement of balloon ascensions. It was not until a few months ago that the daring San Francisco aeronaut resolved to explore China as far as it is possible to do so, and with his brother and wife he began to gather in the small change of the Mongolian sightseers.

The aeronaut's experiences were generally of the most pleasant kind, for the pig-tailed patrons responded most enthusiastically and the novel amusement set all China agog. The attendance at some of the exhibitions in the large seaport cities was enormous. The aeronaut found some difficulty in obtaining suitable places for absorbing the cash of the native populace, for fenced grounds are not to be had, and in most places the inclosure was made by a rope and the assistance of the native police. The Mongolian deadhead has a more wholesome dread of the official guardian of the peace than his American confrere, and few persons ventured inside the roped circle without paying the admission fee. This was 10 cents for the outer circle, 20 cents for the intermediate, and $2 for the inner ring. The aeronaut found the well Chinese perfectly willing to pay this stiff tax. The only trouble was that every pig-tailed swell brought a retinue of servants with him, and when a big mandarin strutted in to see the show the army of retainers, from his teapot bearer to his grand high chamberlain, took up most of the dress circle.

Baldwin gave his first exhibition at Hong Kong, and the native shouts and yells that greeted his ascent were only excelled by the roar of amazement that met his brother when he came flying back to earth with a parachute. In all the towns the balloon proved the greatest attraction ever brought to the celestial land by the bearded white devils from foreign parts.

Having soon disabused their minds of any lurking belief that the white balloonists were possessed of supernatural powers, the Chinese set themselves to work to imitate them. Several adventurous Mongolians broke various portions of their anatomy, from their necks to their legs, by trying to descend from lofty temples and tall trees with para-chutes constructed out of native umbrellas. Toy balloons constructed with great skill and attention to detail by the natives, became part of the stock of the bazars.

At Foo Chow a native genius constructed a mammoth hot-air balloon, with flaming dragon head and great paper wings, and made an ascension which will long be remembered by his townsmen. Baldwin gave all his exhibitions with hot air inflated balloons, that style of inflation being the cheapest, quickest and otherwise most acceptable to a skilled aeronaut for such work as was there needed. The simple method of expanding the balloon pleased the native imitators, and the Foo Chow genius copied everything to a nicety, except the very important point of how to cut loose at the proper moment without accident. The result was that the balloon, which was of enormous size, shot up with such terrific and unexpected velocity that it carried with it a score or so of the Mongolians who were steadying it with the guy ropes while the aeronaut was getting ready to cut loose.

The great bag of air kept scattering
Mongolians over the suburbs of Foo Chow until it turned a regular flip-flap, being improperly ballasted, and fell into one of the large ponds in the outskirts of the city. This adventure had a very depressing effect on the native aspirants, but the mania had taken too firm a hold to be eradicated by any ordinary increase of the mortality rate, and the natives continued their practice until many have become expert.—*Free

A Wonder of Nature.

For fifteen years Joe Duffy, of the Superior Court Clerk's office, has not known that he was hurt, yet he has been carrying a part of a pane of glass around in his frame since March, 1876.

The acquirement, concealment and final delivery are equally interesting.

Nature's hide and seek game with the injured man was prolonged and filled with wonder. It kept Mr. Duffy guessing what was the matter that caused the peculiar yet not painful sensation which gathered around his wrist and ran a race up to his shoulder, making an occasional jump at the elbow and then resuming the chase all over his body.

"I attributed these sensations," said he, "to an accident which caused the destruction of a large pane of glass and left several jagged on my arm. These quickly healed, and I thought nothing more about the matter, until about a year ago I gave my arm a sudden wrench as I was getting on a street car. I remember I let go of the car, impressed with the idea that an electric light wire had come in contact with the track, and through the car with me. After that I had sensations, sensations of the sort that makes a man feel that he is a walking storage battery and all he has to do is to touch a button to make him hop. Doctors were visited.
The incident became a subject of consultation for scientists, and I don't mind telling you that I am called to the College of Physician and Surgeons to be the subject of a pow-wow. The glass was removed yesterday and is now undergoing scientific examination by microscopic and other methods known to the craft."

The piece of glass was triangular in shape with an acute angle, the longest leg of which was an inch long and the base half an inch. It had traveled three inches from the place of entry and had become imbedded between the bones of the forearm. The turning of the arm and the rolling of the bone had turned the sharp angle of the glass toward the surface, and the efforts to cut it out had caused the electric sensation, which had so moved Mr. Duffy.

Two weeks ago the arm became irritated and the foreign substance made trouble. A poultice fetched the ugly thing to the surface, and Dr. James A.
Reynolds, of No. 460 Oakley avenue, went after it with knife and tweezers.
He was successful and now the doctors and surgeons will write volumes on the facts concerning the retention of sharp foreign substance in the human body for years which will tend to upset all preconceived theories heretofore advanced on that subject.—Inter Ocean.

Miss Alcott—As Author and Woman.

Miss Josephine Lazarus publishes in Century a thoughtful sketch of the career of Louisa May Alcott, the children's author from which we quote these paragraphs:

Strangely enough, in her works, which are the counterpart of her life, her defect becomes a merit, and accounts for their phenomenal success. What was it in Miss Alcott's books that surprised and delighted the children of a score of years ago, and that still holds its charm for the childhood of to-day? Was it a new world that she discovered—a fairland of imagination and romance, peopled by heroes and enchanted beings? Far from it. It was the literal, homespun, child's world of to-day; the common air and skies, the common life of every New England boy and girl, such as she knew it; the daily joys and cares, the games and romps and jolly companions—all the actuality and detail of familiar and accustomed things which children love. For children are born realists, who delight in the marvelous simply because for them the marvelous is no less real than the commonplace, and is accepted just as unconditionally.
Miss Alcott met the children on their own plane, gravely discussed their problems, and adopted their point of view, drawing in no wise upon her invention or imagination, but upon the facts of her own memory and experience. Whether or not the picture, so true to the life, as she had lived it, will remain true and vital for all times cannot now be determined. For the literature of children, no less than for our own, a higher gift may be needed; more finish, and less of the rough-and-ready, of every-day habit and existence; above all perhaps, a larger generalization and suggestion, and the touch of things unseen as well as things familiar.

But whatever the fate of her books, Miss Alcott deserves the niche she has won, and the monument built for her in the record of a life which is a protest against the doubts of the age—the fear that duty may have lost its sway and character its foundation, and that happiness is the sole measure and rule of living.

A Big Lot of Strychnine.

A wholesale drug house in Winnipeg, Manitoba, says the Industrial World, will sell this season well up to 100 pounds of strychnine. As an order by a retail drug store for strychnine usually will not exceed one ounce, this will further show the enormous quantity the Winnipeg wholesale house has handled this season. The heavy demand for strychnine here is in the spring of the year, and it is required largely for poisoning gophers. In Southern Manitoba and the territory of Assiniboia, this poison is used most extensively.
Of course, a great deal of the drug is wasted while being used, as the quantity sold is enough to poison every living creature in the country many times over.

The Michigan Tradesman adds the following: Fifteen years ago the ground squirrels—a different species and much larger than the prairie gopher—were the pest of the more southern counties of California. In the vicinity of Los Angeles, they were so numerous that strychnine was resorted to,
to kill them. Grains of Indian corn were placed in sweetened hot water for twenty-four hours to soften, then a small portion of strychnine in solution was poured over it, while the grain was yet soft and permeable. This solution is best made by first thoroughly dissolving crystals in a small portion of acetic acid (cold). This acid may then be mixed with any given quantity of water desired and poured over the softened grain. It is now only necessary to place a few grains of this poisoned corn in and close besides the entrance to their burrows, where it is sure to be eaten about sunset or just after sunrise. A few will crawl into their burrows to die, but most of them will be found dead on the surface of the earth.

Dangerous Men.

A Cincinnati judge says of men who drink from twenty to fifty glasses of beer per day and still apparently keep their heads: "They are simply benumbed with drunkenness, even though they can talk and work, and are in no sense responsible to the law as adults. I could not hold such a man responsible any more than if he had been proven idiotic or crazy." The public must look out for itself.

Why He Lost His Leg.

John Bosacchi, a tinker, of Oakland, Cal., had his leg amputated. "In doing his work he held the article to be mended on his knee, and the continued hammering caused the bone to dry."

THE YOUTHS' CORNER.

THE MANLY BOY.

Oh, boys, you are quick and strong of limb;
You can run and wrestle and leap and swim,
And delight in your deeds of daring;
But remember, dear boys, in whatever you do,
'Tis brave to be tender and kind and true—
'Tis manly to be forbearing.

The manly boy will defend the weak;
He will guard his lips, and be slow to speak
The word that will hurt another;
In siding the helpless he'll do his part,
And he'll strive to deserve with a royal heart
The tender kiss of his mother.

The tree, we say, is known by its fruit,
And actions speak when the lips are mute,
And tell with a truth unswerving
That you are the manly boys, indeed,
Who use your strength for another's need
And delight in unselfish serving.

DORA'S DREAM.

A Little Girl's Visit to a Queen's Palace and What She Saw.

"Would you like some of this queen of puddings, dear?" asked Mrs. Reed. "Queen of puddings!" replied Dora, tossing her head; "it's only common bread-pudding with jelly and frosting on top. I don't like it, and I don't want any!" Dora pushed back her chair and started for the garden.

"We will excuse you, Dora," Mrs. Reed spoke in a tone of gentle reproof. Dora was an only child, and had lately been very ill. Both papa and mamma "made allowances" for her.

She swung in her hammock, watching two busy ants running up and down a balsam stalk.

"We are looking for you," said a voice.

The ants had suddenly grown big as she. One stood on each side of her.

"They are as black as—funerals," thought Dora.

"The queen commands your presence," said an ant.

"Dear me! What queen can it be? It must be Queen Victoria. I suppose I must be very polite and ask her how the prince of Wales is getting along. I ought to have a train."

"It's only a little way."

"A train to my dress, and feathers, and a fan. She'll think I'm not dressed up much."

The ants showed her the way to the queen's palace.

"How funny it looks! It is made of bread, and the doors and windows are soda-crackers. I never!"

The doors flew open as they came near. The ants drew back. Dora was so interested in looking for what was to come next she did not notice that she was alone and standing right before the queen on her throne! The queen was fat and round, just pithy.

Her skin was damp, a light buff in color. She had raisins for eyes, nose and mouth, and her scepter was a stick of cinnamon tipped with a clove. Her robe was bordered with raisins. Her hair was the color of currant jelly, and she wore a white frothy-looking cap, under a crown of raisins.

Dora saw all this before she had winked twice.

"Don't wink at me little girl. You ought to know better."

"Yes'm."

"Call me 'Your Majesty.'"

"My—My Majesty," stammered Dora, much scared.

"So you don't like me. You think I am common. Look at me. Do I look common?"

The queen's voice echoed loudly through her cracker halls.

"I think you look very nice," faltered Dora.

"What ho, withouts?" A procession of queer little folks filed in, bowed low to the queen and ranged themselves in a half-circle behind her. They were made of crusts of bread; their jackets buttoned up to their chins with raisin buttons.

"Open your mouth," ordered the queen. "Your teeth are good. Why do you leave your crusts?"

"Why?" demanded the funny, solemn little men, all together.

Dora jumped as if they had fired guns.

"Your teeth must be sharpened," declared Her Majesty.

"Must?" exploded the manikins again, marching forward together, each waving a saw made from a crust.

"Oh, I'll eat them! Indeed I will! Every one, every twenty-tenty bit, Mrs. Queen! I mean, my—my majesty."

Dora knelt on the step to the throne, almost crying.

"Very well. Get up. But you shall be punished for turning up your nose at me and calling me common."

"Shall!" burst out the crusts together, as before.

"She shall be put in a prison with walls six feet thick, made of bread pudding, there to stay and starve or eat her way out."

Dora fell in a faint. Then she heard a voice. Her mamma was saying: "Why, Dora, you went to sleep and almost rolled out of the hammock. I reached you just in time."

"Oh!" Dora rubbed her eyes. There were the ants on that same balsam. "I'll never go with you again to see such a hateful, hon-ly queen."—Lulu W. Mitchell, in Our Little Ones.

SOME BIG SOLDIERS.

How Elephants Are Used as Warriors in the East Indian Army.

The very biggest of the British soldiers are in the East Indian army. They are eight or ten feet tall. They weigh five or six tons apiece. These giant soldiers are not men, however. They go on four feet instead of two. In fact, they are elephants.

Mrs. GOLDBRUG: "Good afternoon, Mrs. Moneyking; I am so glad I met you. I have been reading about those horrid women of the Alliance, Mrs. Lease, Mrs. Diggs, Mrs. Emery and Mrs. Livermore; it's perfectly horrid."

Mrs. MONEYKING: "O, yes, I have heard of them, and my husband says if the women would let up they could fool the farmers and workingmen; but these women insist that the poor women should have silk dresses just as we do, when they have always been contented with a calico dress every year or two."

Mrs. G.: "Yes, and they tell them to see to it that their husbands vote the tariff off of all wearing apparel. Why it is awful! The idea! They would dress so well then you couldn't distinguish one of them from a banker's wife. Oh dear! oh dear!"

Mrs. M.: "My husband says that the only way to fetch them around all right is to foreclose all of the mortgages and refuse to let them have any more money until they give up."

Mrs. G.: "Oh we can't do that, for you see they outnumber us and would get control of the government and make their own money; and they propose to build government warehouses and store their grain and try to starve us. Oh, there will be a great famine!"

Mrs. M.: "Don't get excited. My husband says they will buy them all, body and soul, before the next election."

Mrs. G.: "Well that's good. I am so pleased that there is a way out. I am so glad I met you. Good bye; good bye."

Strange to say, the first elephants ever seen by Europeans, centuries ago, were soldiers, too. The Europeans had to fight them, as well as men, in the great wars of the east.

In those days, elephants went into battle clad in armor. Sometimes they bore towers on their backs, filled with warriors. Some of those old soldier elephants were trained to cut and thrust with huge scimitars, which they carried by their trunks. An elephant can lift half a ton with his trunk. Think, then, what a tremendous weapon such a swordsman could swing.

Now, the Europeans employ elephants in their armies, in the east. The British soldier elephants in India to-day, however, are not fighters. They are workers; they bear the baggage, and drag the heavy cannon.

Not long ago seventeen "raw recruits" were shipped from Ragoon to Madras. Most of them were newly-captured animals, purchased for the government of India up in the country of British Burmah.

One by one these huge animals were hoisted from the wharf in a great sling, and lowered into the hold of the ship. The elephants did not like going to sea in that way at all. They struggled mightily. They roared. They grabbed at the rigging with their trunks as they were slung up in mid-air. And then, down in the hold, they were so furious that it was more difficult to get them out of the sling than it had been to get them in.

If any little Burmese boys knew what was going on, and if they are like little American boys, I am sure they were there somewhere on the wharf—and I am surer still that they shouted in the excitement well-nigh as loud as the elephants roared.—C. P. Stuart, in Little Men and Women.

A LOST FOURTH.

Having Everything Handy Spoiled a Small Boy's Expected Celebration.

Link, or Lincoln, Libby was such a merry boy that he went by the name of "Bob-o-Link" at home.

He was not only merry, but careless; he wanted everything "handy," as he expressed it, which made a great deal of work for somebody; for his cap and mittens were nearly always dropped on the table or in a chair "to have 'em handy"—it was such a bother to hang 'em up; his muddy rubber boots were kicked off under the table, for he "would want 'em again pretty soon;" his books and slate were flung on the lounge to be ready when Aunt Kitty got time to assist him in his lessons; his rubber ball scudded about on the sitting-room carpet, kites and snow-shoes dangled from the hall hat-rack, his bat-stick stood in the umbrella-stand so he might "catch 'em on the fly" when he rushed out to meet a boy.

Whenever he went out or in he left the door open, only a minute, he was going right in or out again, and "twas such a bother to always shut a door"—never thinking that in the "minute" of a winter's day more cold air would rush into the house than could be warmed in half an hour. Grandma told him he ought to live in a saw-mill.

If he peeled an apple—which he didn't very often, "twas such a bother"—the skins were left in the pretty apple dish or thrown out of the window on the grass—"Tam the goat would eat 'em"—to Aunt Kitty's disgust.

That same Tam would wriggle between the barnyard bars at night, and come beneath the window in Bob-o-Link's chamber over the kitchen for all kind of eatables, which for him included everything, from apple cores and banana skins to tattered hats and the soles of Link's old shoes.

But he got "handsomely come up with," grandma said, last summer for this last slovenly habit, as you will see.

There was a wonderful Fourth o' July celebration in the little town, last year, and Bob-o-Link was very anxious to begin the day early. But he never could wake in the morning without a shaking. He did not want to disturb any one in the house, so he hired Billy Dole—"a real night-hawk"—for a spotted marble and a spread partridge tail, to wake him, by pulling a string tied around his great toe, as he had heard of other boys doing.

The string was a stout hemp cord, and in the end, tossed out of the open window, Bob-o-Link made a large slip-loop. "T'would be handy for Billy to put his hand in to pull." He tied the other end to his toe in a bow-knot, he thought, but in the dark the end slipped through and made a hard one.

Along in the night there came such a vicious twitch on the line that it brought Bob-o-Link out of bed in a twinkling.

"Oo-oo-oo-oo!" Stop that, Billy Dole, or I'll—Ugh! ugh! Ooo-oo! You'll saw my toe off!" And Link hopped heavily on one foot toward the window.

He could not untie the knot, and he had lost his jack-knife the day before—laid it down somewhere to be handy. His toe was "most choked to death," and felt as though 't would burst, while the line kept sawing it pitilessly.

"I'll lick you to-morrow, Billy Dole, 't is Fourth o' July!" he groaned. "You're just as mean as a—Noo-ooo-ugh!" Help! help, somebody! The tugs came faster and fiercer, and seizing the claw foot of the old chest-of-drawers, Link rolled on the floor and shouted with all his might, which soon brought the whole house to the scene of trouble.

Not Billy Dole, but naughty Tam was found at the other end of the line.

Toward midnight he had felt a crawling to inspect his master's rubbish heap and wriggled through the fence. In nosing over the pile he had run one of his long horns through the slip-loop and got caught.

Bob-o-Link could not celebrate that Fourth o' July, for his toe was so badly swelled and lacerated that he could not get his shoe on, and had to hobble about in grandma's big worsted slipper. But he learned a lesson which he has not forgotten yet.—Youth's Companion.

A WOMAN OF THE WORLD.

What Is Meant by This Unusual Term—the Commendable Traits She Possesses.

A woman said to a man the other day, "Mrs. White is a woman of the world to her finger tips;" and the man said, "Thank goodness, she is. I wish we had a few more like her."

And then he added: "Do you know anything of the virtues of a woman of the world—that is, the true woman of the world? She is the woman who makes life perfectly smooth and delightful. She does not say disagreeable things. She makes her likes felt and her dislikes are so well concealed that her enemies are ignorant, when they get a blow as to where it comes from. Don't imagine by this that I mean that she is the woman who does the cat act, and is given to smiling and grinning at everybody. Oh, no, she has too much sense for that. She has the art of making people appear at their best, and she knows how to be agreeable alike to old and young. Her husband respects her; her children love her; her servants fear her, and consequently they obey her orders. If she finds it necessary to mark either a man or a woman as detrimental, she can usually give a reason for it, as she does not go out of her way to make enemies.

"She would not forgive bad manners in a genius, for she very properly concludes that a genius has no more right to be bad mannered than a more ordinary man. She regrets that genius and gentleman are not always synonymous, but until they are she doesn't desire the acquaintance of the genius. She is an earnest believer in the bond of marriage, and thinks it quite as unnecessary to uphold it as it is to refuse to discuss scandals in regard to a failure in it. She does not ask that she shall have love, but she does insist that she shall have respect. She is not one of the women who make their husbands unhappy, for she is not inquisitive. She ignores many things because it is not good form for her to see them, covering in this way with a mantle of charity the half-concealed offenses of her friends.

"The man married to a woman of the world has a much happier life than does the one married to the ingenue; she is disappointed because he isn't her ideal, and he is made wretched because of the tears and moans that pervade the household. If I had a son I should prefer he would marry a woman of the world—remember, I am using the phrase in its best and truest sense, and had I to choose a husband for my daughter it should be a man who had known other women, who had seen their faults and their virtues, and who knew how to take a young and innocent girl by the hand and lead her carefully and considerately into the state of matrimony until she herself became the monarch thereof." And the woman to whom this little sermon was preached began to think that after all there were different kinds of women of the world.—N. Y. Sun.

Qualifications Necessary to Produce the Genuine Article.

We hear the phrase so often, and how hard it is to define its exact meaning. We all know the lady when we meet her, and yet her charm is as indistinguishable as the scent of a rose or the tints of the sunset sky. It might be said to lie in her utter lack of positiveness and best painted in negatives. She is not obtrusive in appearance or dress; she does not claim your attention by any effort to attract it, nor does she seem conscious of your admiration if you evince it. She is never known to speak harshly, maliciously or loudly to superior, equal or inferior. She does not laugh at anything that could by any possibility wound another, nor seek to introduce into the conversation any topic she has reason to think may prove disagreeable or embarrassing, but rather closes her eyes to whatever her keen tact tells her you desire to remain unnoticed. In her judgments she does not seek to impress you with her infallibility, but is quick to add the saving clause. She does not envy or scorn another's possessions, and would not point out the crumbled rose leaf for the world. She makes no boast of anything, but does not deery herself in any way, so that her sweet pride is humility, and her sweet humility the truest pride. She is no gossip, though she is not above taking an interest in the lowliest that cross her path, and has a womanly sympathy for every sick and suffering thing. She takes up no fad or hobby to the exclusion of other duties, but is consistent in all things, and, without being foolishly conventional, does not neglect to fulfill the least demand of her position. She is not a religious fanatic, and has no hell of excommunication for those not of her way of thinking, but is in the truest and best sense a noble-hearted, Christian woman, than which there is no better definition of a lady.—

A NOTABLE ACHIEVEMENT.

Miss Mary H. Krout's Remarkable Success in the Newspaper World.

Mrs. Antoinette Van Hoesen Wakeman, of the Illinois Press association, said at the Woman's council:

"In no line is woman less trammelled than in newspaper work. A notable illustration of this occurred in connection with Miss Mary H. Krout, of the Chicago Inter Ocean, during the campaign that resulted in the election of President Harrison. At that time she was on the reportorial force of the paper. However, the managing editor had discovered that she was not only able and reliable, but was possessed of a better knowledge of Indiana politics and politicians than any member of the staff. After consulting with her, it was decided that she should conduct the campaign for the Inter Ocean in Indiana. Miss Krout is by no means a strong woman, but for one hundred and eight consecutive days she sent from one to two columns of matter each day to her paper. Besides this, she sent numerous telegrams and private letters from which the editorial policy of the paper was shaped.

"The longest telegram sent by Miss Krout was a speech of Gen. Lew Wallace of between two and three columns. It was delivered at Whitlock, Ind., ten miles from a railway station. Her judgment was that it was a great speech; and she hastened in a carriage to the nearest telegraph office and sent it to her paper. The result confirmed her judgment, for the edition of the Inter Ocean containing the speech was soon exhausted, and to meet the demand thirty thousand copies were printed and sent to Indianapolis by special train. The papers of Indianapolis were obliged to copy it from the Inter Ocean, and it was used as a campaign document.

"The day of the election Miss Krout sent all the specials for the office bulletins, and worked without leaving her desk from nine o'clock one morning until two o'clock the next, making seventeen hours of consecutive work. She says, in speaking of it, that she was the solitary woman at the Press headquarters, but was not reminded of the fact, save by the special courtesy of the state officials. When Miss Krout returned she was made one of the editors of the Inter Ocean, which position she still holds. No more arduous and brilliant piece of newspaper work has been done by any woman in America than this."

A Busy, Noble Life.

Mrs. Aletha Coffin, of Hadley, Ind., is a pioneer of that state, whose ninety-three years are full of honor. Left a widow sixty-three years ago in North Carolina with three small children to support, she managed by hard labor and economy to save a hundred dollars in six years. Leaving her children, she rode on horseback to Hendricks county, Ind., a distance of seven hundred and fifty miles, through a sparsely settled country, and across mountain ranges. She selected eighty acres, and then rode to the land office at Crawfordsville, nearly thirty miles distant, and entered her land with her hundred dollars. After resting a few days she returned for her children. She gave them an unusually good education for that day, earning the means by tending her farm with her own hands. The land makes her a pleasant home in her old age, and is the only piece of real estate in the county that has never changed hands. Mrs. Coffin was for many years matron of Guilford college, N. C., and later held the same position in Earlham college at Richmond, Ind. She has filled many important positions in the work of her church and locality. She is well informed, and her memory remains good.—Woman's Column.

THE house in which Moltke was born in Parchim had been devoted to an educational institution for girls for many years past. It has now been purchased by a society which is to start a museum therein, and to preserve relics of the battle-thinker.

Women as Detectives.

An old detective announces as the result of long experience that women possess qualifications that fit them specially for detective work. "Men as a rule are not as close observers, and do not give what I call detective descriptions of people. I remember trying to catch a woman counterfeiter once who had been described to me by several men. I found half a dozen women who would answer to her description. Finally a woman who had seen her gave me a description with one strong detective point—the way she did up her hair—and on that description I very soon arrested the right woman. Women have peculiar observation in details, and are sure to notice and remember some small but definite point that men would overlook. It isn't pleasant work for a woman, but she has detective instincts."

WOMEN IN THE ALLIANCE.

Paper Read Before the Shawnee County Alliance by Mrs. M. E. Clark, and Ordered Printed.

Mr. President, Brothers and Sisters:

The subject of women in the Alliance is one of deep interest to us; and when I sat down to prepare this paper I wondered what I could say that would be of interest. Could I say anything new?
Ah no; but there are some things that bear repeating, and so we tell them o'er and o'er until we are sure all will understand. Why she is here and of how much benefit she may be to the order, can be answered thus: This is an organization formed for the uplifting of thousands of toil-worn men and women, who had become discouraged and disheartened at the state of affairs.
They saw plainly that something must be done, and that quickly, if we would save our homes and country; and thus they determined to organize themselves into an order and talk of their plans.
They could not do this and succeed if they failed to recognize the fact that the wife and mother were as much interested in the movement as they,
that as her counsels were sought and obtained on all matters of importance in the home, so also should she have a voice in their counsels and work with them. Long before I became a member of the Alliance I heard it said that the Alliance owed its success largely to its women. You who have been members of the order from the beginning of the organization know how much truth there is in the statement. But does it not seem strange, that knowing her true heart and wisdom, pertaining to the governing of the home, the rearing and moulding of the life and minds of their children, that she should still be deprived of a voice in the governing of our country? All things that are of interest to man are of like interest to women. Their interests should be, and are, to a marked degree, identical. The Alliance did a wise thing when it threw wide open the door and admitted women to membership in the order on the same equality as men; for well they knew that her heart and hands, if need be, were as willing to help in this grand reform movement as theirs, and I know
c that the sisters take as deep an interest in the discussions, and are as regular in attendance as are the brothers.
a Their presence and management stimulate the brothers to renewed energy;
they are here to discuss, consult and deliberate on all subjects that are of common interest to mankind; to induce the farming class to see that their best interest is to join with us, and help us to make the Alliance a success; help to w educate ourselves to the great econo mic questions of the day, and upon every a question, that is of importance to us as r a people. "Her duties?" Why should r her duties differ very materially from w the brothers? they are both bound by t the same obligations, unless it might be b that she might find time for a little more missionary work, also looking after the dilatory members, and urging upon them the importance of being more regular in attendance, telling re to them of the interest manifested in the th meetings, and try to get their promise ho that they will come and help, then try to have each meeting lively and instructive; draw out all the force possible; this is necessary if we would have no drawbacks. I know that farmers, as a rule, feel more like resting at home when evening comes, but they must not overlook the fact that this is their order and their interests are here; they should not expect others to look after their business. Perhaps upon the sister might fall the duty of looking after the social feature of the order, and this I think is of much importance. It keeps us alive and gives us much pleasure that we cannot afford to overlook it.

"All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." If we apply ourselves so closely to work that we can find no time for recreation we are apt to become narrow-minded and selfish. If we hope to succeed we must be alert and watchful; up and doing, and not allow ourselves to become discouraged. Difficulties must be met and overcome. Difficulties seem not half so hard when met with cheerful spirits; they will vanish like a snow-drift before the warm rays of the sun. So when we meet here to talk of our needs and what best to do, let all be done in the true spirit of fraternal love and good will; exercise the spirit of charity; none need sit with folded hands crying, "What shall I do?"
Just simply take the first step and the next will be plain, and ere we are aware the summit of our ambition will have been reached, and our shouts of triumph resound far and wide. And now, dear sisters, let me entreat you do your part toward making your meetings interesting and full of life. Do not say when you are called upon: "Oh, I cannot prepare a paper, and if I could I have not the nerve to read it." Why, this is one of the difficulties to be met;
meet it with a brave, cheerful spirit if you would triumph; we are here to become educated, and this is one part of our education that has been so sadly neglected, and we must be determined to conquer. Perfection comes truly in the way of doing one's duty with one's might; we can only learn duty by doing duty; as one day follows another, so one duty, and the capacity to perform it aright grows out of having performed the previous one. So I say try, do the best you can, and having done that, you will not only have nobly performed a duty, but have a good example that is worthy of praise and commendation;
another duty is the care of our brothers and sisters in sickness. If it be possible, visit them; offer your assistance, if need be, in household work; be quiet and cheerful; do all the good you can while there. Let us hope and pray that we are going to bring order out of chaos.
I heard a minister remark that the Alliance was a grand order; that an organization that had women to counsel and plan with was sure to succeed; that there never would be a better state of affairs in our country until the Alliance efforts were crowned with success, and said that he hoped that we would succeed; and my heart said, amen! We want to see a look of contentment upon the face of every man and woman in all this broad land. We are laboring to bring about a more prosperous condition of affairs, and hoping for a brighter day to dawn. "May our hopes be not in vain." Many of us know that the past is full of painful disappointments, weary toiling without a just recompense for our labor. Perhaps these trials were needful, that out of them would result great good to our country.
We should not be discouraged if we meet with failures, for we know that all great reform movements move slowly, and that excellence is never granted to man or woman but as the reward of labor. It argues, indeed, no small strength of mind to persevere in habits of industry, without the pleasure of perceiving those advantages that sometimes seems slow in approaching.
It has been said that every cloud has a silver lining. Well, clouds cannot always last; and looking at them now we can see the light gleaming beyond.
Let us look steadfastly forward. The future lies before us; and in the years to come may our hearts be made glad when the results of this movement will be appreciated and honored by all mankind, we will recognize no such word as fail. We must succeed, for upon the success of this movement depends the prosperity of this government. In every reform movement that is of importance to the people, you will find none more earnest and vigilant, none more willing and anxious to assist than women. The Grange knew this when it opened its doors to her, and I feel that the success of that order has been due, largely, to the energy and faithfulness of its sisters; and I feel sure that she will prove equal to the expectations of the brothers of this order. Perhaps she may often be silent when she should have taken part in the discussions, but be sure she is busy thinking and planning. Unity of thoughts and actions on the part of the brothers and sisters of the Alliance must result in good to us all.

Mrs. MARY E. LEASE is in Georgia this month disseminating from the rostrum the great reforms of the day, which can be accomplished only by principles adopted by the People's Party.

[For THE FARMER'S WIFE.]

Woman on the Ranch.

EMMA GILBERT CURTIS.

Woman on the ranch as she is, or woman on the ranch as she should be;
which? Well, perhaps a little of both.
Woman is never quite as she should be; she is too human for that; too much like her husband, her father, and her son. But she is a charming creature with all her imperfections, and she seldom has any difficulty in convincing the opposite sex of this fact.

A New York woman would perhaps tell you that woman's chief glory is in society—proud, brilliant, gilt-edged society. A Boston dame would doubtless insist that her sex should seek the lyceum, the club-room, and the library;
but a real, mountain loving, sunny-hearted Colorado dame would say, "O, woman's brightest kingdom is the ranch."

"But you have no society, dear," sighs New York. "And no advantages," adds soft-voiced, moist-eyed Boston.

But mountain-loving, sunny-hearted Colorado answers: "You mistake; I have society, I have advantages." And so she has. The ranch may or may not be a romantic and delightful spot; generally it is both so far as nature can make it such, but we must remember that nature can be greatly hindered by human nature. But granted that nature has done her part, and that human excellence has assisted, the ranch becomes a place of blissful, independent and worthy existence, such as has been sighed for by dreamers in every age.

Pastoral life is the ideal life. The daily bath in the sunlight, the hourly meeting with nature's children, biped, quadruped and winged, the listening to earth's ceaseless song in all its variations, from the field cricket's chirp to the thunder that rolls along the beetling hills, makes humanity full, independent and philosophic, but not satisfied.
The very beauties and caresses of nature breed in the heart of youth a romantic disquiet that leads forever onward, demanding improvement and hissing at stagnation.

The Colorado ranch is as many hues
as the State is diversified in its relief.
Down on the plains stretch away thousands of acres of grass lands where stock raising is the only possible industry. Along the river valleys of these same plains lie strips of fertile alluvium that may be easily watered from the stream. Upon these favored tracts flourish grain, alfalfa, fruit trees and cultivated grasses.

But in the higher valleys and among the foothills are the ideal ranches.
Nestled beside the narrow, swift-running creeks and the higher courses of the rivers are narrow stretches of land upon which irrigation is possible. Here will be found isolated neighborhoods, comprised of as many families as can find a quarter section of land each, whose fields bring forth grain and alfalfa, whose gardens produce the finest vegetables and fruit, and whose cattle run wild upon the adjacent hills, protected only by the brand.

As might be expected the sons and daughters of such environments are romantic, progressive, full lived, and impatient under oppression and restraint. The men are half cowboy, half ranchman in their nature, and are quite as moral, well behaved and noble as the average of mankind, in spite of the numerous stories of their roughness. The dangerous and adventurous life they lead during the riding season develops an outward appearance of wildness that is calculated to deceive, but in their ranks will be found just as many of nature's noblemen as exist in any class upon earth.

And the women—by the way, I was requested to write of these very women, and here I have been scattering ink on the subject of the men. Well, I have always been accused of admiring men as a class, and this irrelevancy may perhaps persuade the reader that the accuser is well founded. So the women will now be duly discussed and their

As a rule these mountain dames and their daughters are matchless horse-women, and are much given to out door occupations and sports. Their highland homes, with mountains often snow-capped, always steep and rugged and pine-fringed, forever within sight of the doors, compel them to draw in with their breath a wondrous amount of strength, confidence and courage.
Often they are far from neighbors, left alone, or with small children to protect;
thus every faculty is on the alert and every natural ability is cultivated to the full.

The hard times have kept them at their household tasks too steadily, but they have by no means broken their spirit or dwarfed their minds. Many of their tables are visited by the best and most helpful papers and piled high with good books. They discuss public questions in a spirit of intelligence, and not a few of them paint, play and sing.

Perhaps one of the most delicate and yet needful duties of the ranch queen is the entertainment of her household.
Be it remembered that the open saloon is at present an institution of Colorado, and that the ranch often teems with hired men and cowboys whose evenings and Sundays must be disposed of in some fashion. Be assured that most of them will spend these breathing seasons away from the ranch if the ranch is cold, dull and inhospitable. There are always a few men who are able,

with books or even with their own communings, to live out heavy hours without running into mischief; but all who observe know that these are few.

Mrs. A. has provided for her household all the healthy, entertaining books she can afford; she has put all the leading games, including two decks of cards, upon the sitting-room table, and has set up a croquet set in the yard.
Her children, the hired girl and the hired men know that in the evening they are at liberty to engage in any civil harmless game, sing, read, or converse, as they choose; they know that even on Sunday nothing will be said if they beguile the tedium of a long day at home by shaking the croquet mallets or taking up the checkerboard. Mrs.
A.'s household care but little about visiting the neighbors, and the saloons have no charms for them. The neighbors, however, visit them, and the young people often state plainly that they "came over because it was dull at home."

Mrs. A. reasons that if home is made the pleasantest place in the world that the showy, lively, inviting saloons will have less success in enticing young men to their downfall and death. She furthermore reasons that youth must and will be amused, either boldly or in secret. She still further reasons that there are too many real evils to fight for her to waste her time assailing entertaining games that are never harmful save when made so by excess and by the introduction into them of gambling—a feature that has no natural connection with them.

Mrs. B. has a few prim, straight-laced books in her sitting room, but no games; not even a checkerboard is allowed, because it might lead to something worse—cards, perhaps. Mrs. B. is very strict, very good, and very anxious for her children to be good. But there are no pleasant recreations in that sitting room when evening falls; the boys run away from its chill atmosphere, sit under the eaves of the barn and listen to highly immoral stories, of which one or two of the hired men seem to possess an inexhaustible fund.
If strict truth be adhered to it must be stated that the boys spend Sunday mornings in the seclusion of the haymow with the gentlemen who tell the questionable anecdotes, learning the intricacies of the game of poker, and wondering how long it will be before they can experience the delights of the saloon. Good Mrs. B. in the meantime would volubly assure any of her neighbors that she never allowed a card in her house, and that her boys did not know one card from another. She remonstrates with Mrs. A. for encouraging her household to play games, but the latter lady answers: "I do not encourage them, I simply permit them; I often express my belief that games are wasters of time, save when employed for needful recreation, and I encourage reading and conversation as much as possible. But both mind and body must rest and play, and a household morality that puts the occupants to flight is highly questionable. I believe that it is almost as bad to drive men to the saloon as to lead them there."

Woman is naturally and should be a reformer, but to be an effective one she must be gentle, lovable, persuasive and charming. Because she must be determined and firm it does not follow that she must be rasping, narrow and disagreeable. In no other station will she need more tact and ability than she will need as queen of the ranch. Here her success or failure is easily determined, and her influence is wide-spread.
She is her brother's keeper, and while giving that brother all the pleasant encouragement possible, she must insist that he ask no more breadth of action, either in morals, politics, or vocation,
than he is willing to grant to her.

Colorado is young—very young in the sisterhood of states. It is only of late years that her hillsides and valleys have yielded to the plow and become the homes of men. Her daughters are consequently less in the forefront of the nation than are those of some of the older states, but they are rapidly moving forward. As editors, as poets and as novelists and artists they are advancing. I predict for them a brilliant future, for if they take lesson from their picturesque surroundings, they will strive to do their part towards filling the world with beauty, healthful romance and invigorating truth.

Extracts From Mrs. Fannie McCor- mick's Fourth of July Address at Manhattan, Kansas.

"It is self-evident that the founders of this republic intended that it should be a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. They arranged a system of representation whereby every class, calling or profession should be represented in the halls of legislation, according to their numbers; and thus with every section and interest represented, they believed that the burdens of government would fall equally upon all classes, and its benefits and blessings be shared alike by all the people.

It is a good government, because when wrongs exist an effectual remedy is provided to remove them. Evils may germinate and thrive for a season in our republic, may even become so powerful as to oppress certain classes to the verge of slavery and assume the proportions of mountains of iniquity, but the will of the people peacefully expressed at the ballot-box can 'remove mountains' and recall the government again to its normal condition.

Since the establishment of this republic, each returning Fourth of July a grateful people celebrate the birthday of our national independence. We unfurl the old flag and gaze admiringly at the added stars. The bands play
'Hail, Columbia, Happy Land,' and as the people walk to and fro, with smiling faces, they seem communing with the poet who wrote:

"My country 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty;
Of thee I sing."

All have come. The merchant, the banker, the laboring man, the minister, the doctor, the lawyer, have laid aside their work to celebrate this national holiday. The Kansas farmers have left the great fields of waving wheat, already white for the harvest, to come here and show their loyalty to the nation. The ladies are here because in this grand republic woman has been according more rights and privileges, and is more nearly on political equality with man, than in any nation on earth.
They still remind their brothers, however, that 'taxation without representation' is not justice, and threaten to throw 'the tea overboard' if full suffrage is not given them.

We celebrate this day for two reasons,—because we gained national independence and because we are proud of the growth and progress of our beloved land. The United States has been an object lesson to the world for more than a century. The stability of a republic was an experiment. Other republics had existed, but they had been short lived. Athens, the school of Greece, in her golden days had neither king nor aristocracy. Every free citizen possessed a voice in the general government, and zealously maintained his rights and liberty as a member of the state. In the seventeenth century free Holland took her place among the nations. History says of her 'that her fields bloomed like a garden, her shops rang with the notes of industry, and her harbors bristled with masts.' France and England have both had brief republics, but were recaptured by loyalty, and passed out of history as commonwealths.

"The United States has demonstrated to the world that an intelligent people can govern themselves, irrespective of the adage about the 'divine right of kings.' This republic has overcome every obstacle to its progress, passed through fires of purification, and moved steadily forward into line with the powerful nations of earth. Monarchies to-day are trembling in the balance, but our republic stands firm because it is founded on the rock of justice and equality. These eternal principles are the only strong foundation for any nation; and anything short of this is a foundation of sand, and will be shifted to and fro by the incoming tide of civilization."

"Corporations have been enthroned, but the great common people are studying economic questions, morning, noon and night, and will soon be ready to throttle monopoly and dethrone corporations. Gen. Washington desired to take Stony Point, a place on the Hudson, forty miles above New York city, which the British held strongly fortified. He planned an attack to be conducted by Gen. Anthony Wayne. This man was known among the people as 'mad Anthony,' on account of his rashness and daring. At midnight the Americans in two columns forced their way into the fort from opposite sides, and meeting in the center of the works, the astonished garrison surrendered without the firing of a musket. 'We must follow the same tactics, and storm the forts of these monopolies at the ballot-box. The producers will besiege them on one side and the consumers they have robbed on the other, and they will meet in the center of their works, and the astonished plutocrats will surrender without ceremony."

THERE will be rejoicing in the land in 1892, when the FARMER'S WIFE comes bringing in the sheafs.

OUR RURAL READERS

WILL BE PLEASED WITH THIS DEPARTMENT.

Advantage of Farmers' Clubs and Institutes—Farms of the Future—A Convenient Milking Stool—Raising Pigs for Profit—General Poultry Notes—Points Pertaining to the Household and Kitchen.

THE FARM.

Farmers' Clubs and Institutes.

After securing the late crops and providing for the physical comforts of his household, as well as the needs of his domestic animals, the rural citizen may enhance his welfare by discharging important duties in another direction. During the long season of leisure upon which they are now entering American soil tillers will have rare opportunities to acquire knowledge pertaining to the practice and science of their noble vocation. Among the sources of information relative to the best modes of soil culture and farm management, the discussions and other doings (lectures, essays, etc.) of farmers' clubs and institutes are the most valuable, though rural books and journals merit careful study. Therefore, we urge ruralists to attend every session of a farmers' club or institute held within their reach, and to participate in its proceedings. Many States have provided for holding county institutes the coming season, and it is hoped these will be numerically attended and prove largely beneficial to the agricultural interest. Farmers' clubs are also increasing in numbers and usefulness. Of the great benefits derivable from these clubs there can be no question, and they should receive the encouragement and support of the true friends of rural progress and improvement everywhere.

The Country Gentleman, of a recent date prints a letter from Mr. C. Wood Davis on crops per capita, and the conclusion he draws is "that good lands anywhere in the United States will be worth $100 an acre within five years." This ought to cheer the hearts of the farmers. Mr. Davis asserts that there is an exact ratio between population and production, but that this has not been made manifest for the reason that we have been cultivating too much land and could at any time increase our product at the expense of another without making a "shortened supply of the lessened crop." But this is not to be so another decade. Indeed, he fixes the limitation in 1895. His reasoning is exhilarating:

We cannot reduce the number of cattle other than milch cows below 530 to 1,000 people without making beef so valuable that the farmers will rush into its production and thus create a shortage in some other product; nor make the milch cows less than 230 to each 1,000 of the population without making a shortage in some other direction and putting up the price of everything pertaining to the dairy. The balance must be preserved. For each 1,000 units added to the population we must add 230 to 235 milch cows and a given number of horses, and but for the surplus of beaver now existing we should have to add fifty to fifty-three cattle other than milch cows. For every cow, steer, or horse added we must add about six to seven acres to our farms, and of this two and one-half to three acres must be in pasture.

On these figures Mr. Davis, in 1891, believes that home consumption by 1895 will consume all the products of American farms, and that the price of good farm lands in the old Northwestern States will be $100 an acre.

If I Could Be Young Again.

If I were a farm r's boy intending to be a farmer, I think I would study very hard all the forms of "out-door science." Before and after school, and in the long vacations I would keep the run of all farm operations, learn from my father the reasons for his plans and operations, and try to share in the plans and the results. I would try to become deft and skillful in all the farm processes such as hand mowing, pitching, plowing, care of stock, milking, shearing, pruning, and handling farm tools and machines. I would have, if possible, and read some of the best books on farming. As soon as I had a thoroughly good education in the common English branches, I would try to spend four years at a good agricultural and mechanical college. If that of my own State was not doing good work for agriculture, or was not thoroughly in sympathy with industrial life, I would try to go to one in some neighboring State where such was the case.

I would study the conservatism of fertility, for with proper cultivation, rotation of crops and manuring, any soil is inexhaustible, and for ages on ages it will yield food for man and beast. The indestructibility of matter is the law that conserves productivity. But by continued cropping, without sense or reason, certain food elements may be removed from one place to enrich some other lands. If we raise corn and wheat in America to feed Europe for a century or two we shall certainly waste our patrimony and exhaust the resources of fertility in our lands, rich as they are.—W. L. Chamberlain, in Rural New Yorker.

Fall Plowing.

The benefits of fall plowing for all spring crops, except Indian corn, have already been demonstrated, and its great economy is so apparent to every intelligent farmer that no further discussion of the question is necessary. The inauguration and making of permanent and other improvements should also now receive attention.

Underdraining, and also surface drainage and the laying of pipes or logs for the conveyance of water, may often be done to advantage at this season, and will prove most valuable improvements. Now, also is a good time to provide a year's supply of fuel, as well as pea-brush, bean-poles, etc. And it is not too early for gathering the ice crop and making maple sugar, while those who have timber to cut and haul will do well to plan their work without delay. Forecasting and arranging in advance will greatly facilitate farm operations during the winter.

THE DAIRY.

Convenient Milking Stool.

Here is a milking stool invented by me, which is light and durable and very convenient, as it holds the pail securely in its place. It is easily made and when finished has a neat appearance. For the top of the stool take a good oak board about an inch thick and eight or ten inches wide by twelve long, tapering slightly to the front. Next take two pieces of oak or other hard wood, about two by three inches and twelve inches long, for legs. The front ones can be made smaller. A is a board half an inch thick and sixteen inches long, fastened at B by sawing notches about a quarter of an inch deep in the leg and securely fastened to it by a couple of small nails. C is a piece of metallic hoop which I have to admit the bucket easily. D is a piece of stouter iron, fastened to X and Y by rivets.—G. E. Bastain, in Farm and Home.

What an Ayrshire Cow Does.

An Ayrshire cow generally shows 13 per cent. of solids, 13 to 16 per cent. of cream, and 3½ to 4½ per cent. of butter fat. In the milking competitions of the London Dairy Show and the Oxfordshire and other shows, the Ayrshires have stepped far ahead of the Shorthorns, Guernseys, etc., in the quantity and quality of the milk which they yielded. The milk of the Ayrshire is pre-eminently suited for cheese-making from its composition and structure. All samples of milk under the microscope are seen to be composed of a homogeneous fluid, in which float little globules of butter fat. These globules vary in size, and while in the Jersey they are comparatively large, in the Ayrshire they are small and not rising quickly, but, mixing with the curd butter, make an evenly rich cheese. The quantity of cheese yielded by such animal is about six hundredweights, estimated in 56 many stones of twenty-four pounds each.

THE PIGGERY.

Pigs for Profit.

The most successful poultry raiser I ever knew, a woman whose sales of poultry and eggs reached $3,000 a year, laid down as a rule never to be deviated from, to push all stock so as to make the growth as rapid as possible, and sell just as soon as marketable. A man who has for several years grown 150 pigs yearly, and sold them at six months old, says no farmer can afford to feed a pig longer than this. I have attained a weight of 200 pounds at this age, and found the cost per pound much less than when I fed longer, and made a weight of 300 pounds or more, and the risk of loss from disease is very much less than from older hogs. If pigs are sold at this age the spring litters need not be dropped till cold weather is over, say April 1, and will be marketed before winter weather sets in, so that no feed will be wasted in maintaining vital heat. The fall litters can be dropped in time to get a good start before the cold weather sets in, and in a good hog house can be kept thrifty all winter and sold in early spring. I find it profitable to keep the fall litters till a month or more older than the spring litters, so as to finish them off for market after the cold weather is over. I find it profitable to raise two litters a year, for mature sows give the largest and most vigorous pigs, and the cost of keeping a full-grown sow is large, and the second litter will add to the profit.

To make pig-growing profitable they must be pushed from the start, and at the same time good judgment must be exercised in feeding. Milk is the best and corn the worst feed for pigs during the first few months when they are forming bone and muscle. Yet I can make good thrifty pigs without milk, and can raise fairly good pigs with corn as the main food. Next to milk I prefer bran, oats and oilmeal, and can make fairly good and palatable slop from these, and push a rapid growth. The first thing to be done is to get the pigs to eating before they are weaned, so that their growth will not be checked when taken from the mother. Until four months old the growth of frame should be pushed as much as possible, but do not attempt to fatten them, and for this reason the less corn they eat the better. At four months old begin to feed corn, moderately at first, but in ten days you may give them all they will eat, but you will get growth as well as fat, and more lean meat, if you keep up the bran-slop until they are ready for market. I believe in feeding three times a day just what they will eat, and so they will always come with a good appetite for the next meal, rather than to keep food by them all the time, as some do. I have for many years fed my own meat from spring pigs fed in this way, and I think I have a better quality of pork than it would be possible for me to buy.—New York Tribune.

Notes.

Don't breed more sows than you can properly care for.

It is poor policy to keep pigs of all ages and sizes together.

See that the sows about to farrow are not left out some cold night, and a lot of dead or dying pigs found in the morning. Don't stint the young sows you intend to breed soon. Oats, wheat middlings, and a little oil-cake will be much better for them than heavy corn feeding.

Avoid too close in-breeding, keep in a good healthy place, and do not feed too much corn, and hog cholera will go by your pens much quicker than it will go by the pens where these rules are not observed.

It is the feeling with breeders of pure-bred hogs that within the coming year breeding stock will be in great demand in many hog-growing sections. On account of the scarcity of corn farmers have sold off their stock too close. Of the extent of this error it is impossible to judge. Under pressing necessity the short supply of breeding stock retained will repopulate the farms with wonderful rapidity.

THE POULTRY-YARD.

Mating the Breeding Stock.

Unless you desire to hatch chicks, the males can be kept away from the hens. By so doing, a larger number of eggs can be kept together, instead of a male and ten hens, for if two males are put in the same pen, they will probably quarrel and fight, and be rendered useless. When eggs are desired for incubation, make up a breeding-pen of ten or twelve of the best hens in the flock; select from those known to be the layers and which have been free from disease of any kind; with them put a vigorous cockerel, not under eleven months old and of a preferred breed, and the result will be satisfactory.

Do not attempt to raise chicks by using eggs for incubation from the egg-basket, and which are laid by hens that you are not sure were the ones that deposited the eggs in the nest; but make up a breeding-pen, consisting of selected hens, with a selected male with them, and you will then know the kind of chicks to expect, and also know something of their future prospects; but unless this is done, all your efforts will be like working in the dark.—Farm and Fireside.

Poultry Notes.

No DANGER of getting the growing stock too fat. There is more liability of not giving them enough.

Powls are fond of onions chopped up and mixed with their soft food. Onions are a preventive and remedy for many diseases.

The first step towards having eggs in winter is to exterminate the vermin from your flocks and buildings and get your birds in good flesh.

Don't forget to save the best young hen turkeys for breeding purposes. Kill the others for Thanksgiving if you want to but reserve your breeding stock first.

The best market for the farmer or general poultryer, living near a city to cater to, is retail custom. Have a regular line of housekeepers to whom you deliver eggs fresh once or twice a week, and fowls whenever they are ordered.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Hints for the Sick Room.

Disinfectants should be used according to the doctor's orders, but it may be well to state that putting saucers of various chemicals around a room will not disinfect the atmosphere. Whatever is exposed to infection, such as china, or clothing, or bedding, should be thoroughly cleansed and rinsed in some disinfecting fluid. Tin or galvanized iron pails and buckets should be used in preference to wood. Such things as cannot be washed should be properly fumigated before they can be considered safe. Disinfectants cannot take the place of cleanliness.

Ventilation is of great importance, and is very apt to be either neglected or improperly done. There are many sources of impurity in the atmosphere of the sick room. The breath of both patient and attendants, the odor of perspiration, any uncleanness of either person or room, imperfect trapping of waste-pipes in the house, a dirty cellar sending its miasma up through the registers along with the necessary heat, and the foul air produced by burning gas or lamps—all combine to poison the atmosphere and retard the recovery of the sick. The standard of purity is air sufficient to remove any odor, so that a person coming in from out-doors will not be able to detect any unpleasant smell. More fresh air is required for the sick than for the well. In cases of infectious diseases, even temperature may be sacrificed for pure air, but in inflammatory diseases, such as pneumonia, the evenness of temperature is of greater importance. Fever patients do not take cold to the extent usually supposed, and their rooms should be well ventilated. Air should be introduced from out-doors with considerable caution. Never allow a draught of cold or damp air to come in contact with the patient. Windows should be let down from the top; wire gauze might be used when the wind is blowing, or a tall screen could be placed between the bed and the window. In cases where windows must be opened wide to let out smoke or unpleasant odors, the face and head of the patient should be covered with a light quilt until the normal temperature of the room is restored. A good thermometer should always be found in the sick-room, and the temperature regulated by the physician's orders.

Chemistry of the Laundry.

The laundress will find it useful to "paste this in her hat." Thirty yards of cotton cloth may be bleached in fifteen minutes by one large spoonful of sal soda and one pound of chloride of lime dissolved in soft water: after taking out the cloth rinse it in soft cold water so that it may not rot.

The color of French linen may be preserved by a bath in a strong tea of common hay. Calicoes, with pink or green colors will be brightened if vinegar is put in the rinsing water, while soda is used for purple and blue. If it is desired to set colors previous to washing, put a spoonful of oxgall to a gallon of water and soak the fabrics in the liquid. Colored napkins are put in lye before washing, to set the color. The color of black cloth is freshened if it is put in a pail of water containing a teaspoonful of

A Queer Boy.

He doesn't like study, it "weakens his eyes," But the "right sort" of book will insure a surprise. Let it be about Indians, pirates, or bears, And he's lost for the day to all mundane affairs; By sunlight or gaslight his vision is clear. Now, isn't that queer?

At thought of an errand he's "tired as a hound," Very weary of life and of "tramping around." But if there's a band or a circus in sight, He will follow it gladly from morning till night. The showman will capture him some day, I fear. For he is so queer.

If there's work in the garden, his head "aches to split," And his back is so lame that he "can't dig a bit." But mention base-ball and he's cured very soon; And he'll dig for a woodchuck the whole afternoon. Do you think he "plays possum"? He seems quite sincere; But— isn't he queer?

A Child's Peculiar Fancy.

Flossie's grandmother was a nice old lady, but she was very difficult to get along with, and this was particularly true during her last illness, and the child came in for her share of it. One day, shortly after the old lady's death, Flossie's mother observed that she was very thoughtful.

"What are you thinking about, Flossie?"

"I was just wondering," she replied, with great seriousness, "how grandma and God are getting along together."—Washington Star.

A Prince of a Boy.

"He is just a prince of a boy," said Mrs. Hatton, of Willie, and I listened and watched, for a prince, you know, is the son of a king, and I wanted to see if Willie was like a king I read of.

When he dropped his hoop and ran in to amuse baby for mamma, and did it so pleasantly, I began to get my answer. When he came out of school, smiling, instead of pouting because he had been kept late, I felt pretty sure. But when he cut his apple in two and gave one-half to ragged Ned Brown, I was satisfied.

Yes, Willie is a "prince of a boy," because he tries to do just like that King who is kind to all, and like that Son of a King who came to minister and not to be ministered unto.—Golden Rule.

Bright Little People.

LITTLE LEO, aged three, was watching the sunset. It was very brilliant, and the clouds, all crimson and gold, had a mottled appearance. "O grandma, grandma," he cried, "do come quick and see—the moon is melting the sky!"

Edna noticed that papa did not kiss the new baby, so she put her arm around his neck, and said, coaxingly, "Kiss it, papa. It won't bite."

How Did She Tell?

In little Daisy's dimpled hand two bright new pennies shone; One was for Rob (at school just then), the other Daisy's own. While waiting Rob's return she rolled both treasures round the floor, When suddenly they disappeared, and one was seen no more.

"Poor Daisy. Is your penny lost?" was asked in accents kind, "Why, no, mine's here!" she quickly said. "At Rob's I cannot find."—St. Nicholas.

Had Not Learned It.

It pays to cultivate habits of politeness and show deference to those with whom we come in contact. The boy or girl with pleasing habits is pretty certain to be chosen in preference to the one who is rude in address and manners, if both are seeking the same situation; and the same is true throughout life.

A gentleman stood in a shop the other day, when a boy came in and applied for a situation.

"Can you write a good hand?" was asked.

"Yaas."

"Good at figures?"

"Yaas."

"That will do—I do not want you," said the merchant.

"But," said the gentleman, when the boy had gone, "I know that lad to be an honest, industrious boy. Why don't you give him a chance?"

"Because he hasn't learned to say, 'Yes, sir,' and 'No, sir.' If he answers me as he did when applying for a situation, how will he answer customers after being here a month?"

And the gentleman was silent. The boy had been weighed in the balance, and because of his lack of politeness, had been found wanting. It pays to be thoughtful and pleasant.

It Pays to Be in Earnest.

A boy was once walking along a dusty road. The sun was very warm and oppressive; but, as was his usual way, he stepped along quickly, thinking that the faster he walked the sooner he would reach the end of his journey. He soon heard a carriage coming, and when it had caught up with him the driver reined in his horse and kindly asked the lad to ride, which invitation he gladly accepted. When he was seated in the carriage the gentleman, a good Quaker, said: "I noticed thee walking along briskly, and so asked thee to ride; but if I had seen thee walking lazily, I would not have done so by any means."—Morning Star.

STARS IN THE NATIONAL EMBLEM.

The Admission to Statehood of Wyoming to Be Properly Symbolized.

Another star now glitters in the national flag. This is not because of any recent admission to Statehood, for there has been none. But the law requires, that the admission of a new State shall be signalized in the national banner from the Independence Day following the admission. The new star which will find a place July 4 this year will stand for Wyoming. That vigorous young Commonwealth came in after last Independence day by just a week or so. Idaho had been more lucky, as the President had signed the bill admitting it the evening of July 3, so it has had its star all the year. With the one added for Wyoming the stars will number forty-four. It promises to be several years before any more Territories are admitted into Statehood, so that the emblem is not likely to undergo further change for some time to come. In unofficial flags the admission of Wyoming has been recognized by its extra star for nearly the year past, and the grouping of the stars has been according to the individual flag-makers. It is left for the army emblem to fix the grouping according to the Government's idea. This is done in the order just issued by the War Department, as follows:

"The field or union of the national flag in use in the army will, on and after July 4, 1891, consist of forty-four stars in six rows, the upper and lower rows to have eight stars, and the second, third, fourth and fifth rows seven stars each in a blue field."

Every flag floating as the sign of authority of the National Government will henceforth conform to this order. The flags with less than forty-four stars and with the old grouping will not be at once condemned, for the Government does not go to that extravagance. But as the new emblems are called for the new order will be observed and the old flags will gradually disappear.

Is Culture Hereditary?

The whole point at issue is whether there is a casual relation between the cultivation of the mental faculties and their development; in other words, whether the increment gained by their exercise is transmitted to posterity. Professor Weismann and most of his followers, constituting what is generally known as the 'school' of Neo-Darwinians, deny such transmission. If they are right, education has no value for the future of mankind, and its benefits are confined exclusively to the generation receiving it. So far as the inculcation of the knowledge is concerned, this has always been admitted to be the case, and the fact that each new individual must begin at the beginning and acquire all knowledge over again for himself is sufficiently discouraging and has often been deplored. But the belief, though vague, has been somewhat general that a part at least of what is gained in the direction of developing and strengthening the faculties of the mind, though their life-long exercise in special fields, is permanently preserved to the race by hereditary transmission to posterity of the acquired increment. We have seen that all the facts of history and of personal observation sustain this comforting popular belief, and until the doctors of science shall cease to differ on this point and shall reduce the laws of heredity to a degree of exactness which shall amount to something more like a demonstration than the current speculations, it may perhaps be as well to continue for a time to hug the delusion,

THE FARM.

Selecting Seed Wheat.

When I first began growing wheat I ran my wheat through a mill, grading it so as to take out about half, which would be large, plump kernels. The smaller grain was sold at the mill. At present, says T. B. Leroy, in Rural New Yorker, my practice is to select, when cutting the wheat, a half acre which promises to yield more than any other part of the lot. I notice particularly where this is and when the wheat is drawn to the barn, this is taken last and put by itself on top of the hay. Then it is thrashed first and my own seed saved from it. My soil is not uniform in quality. One could find spots yielding at the rate of, say, from twenty-five up to fifty bushels per acre. Seldom is there a year, I think, when I can not pick out a half acre that will yield at the rate of from twenty to twenty-five bushels, or twice that amount per acre.

But, now, where does the plump seed wheat grow? Where do I find the largest berries? In the thin spots every time. Where do I find berries of large average size, and more or less shrunken some years? In the richest parts of the field, where the growth is great, and the crop more or less lodged. If we thrash the grain and mix it and then grade out the largest berries, we shall be likely to get most of our seed from the parts of the field that yielded the least. Is the plump individual berry the best one to sow, without regard to the conditions under which it grew? This is what I would like to know for a certainty from a series of careful experiments. Prof. Plumb is just the man to find this out for us.

I take the wheat from the best half-acre and run it through the fanning-mill in such a way as to take out merely the screenings—the very small and badly shrunken grains. In most seasons these would amount to one bushel out of from twenty to forty. All grains of fair size are left in the seed. Perhaps you ask: Why not grade the wheat from the best half-acre? Well, which heads contained the largest grains—the small ones with a few kernels, or the longer ones that had twice as many? I have thought for some years that the former did, and I do not care to plant them to the exclusion of the others. If it were practical to select the best heads from the best half-acre, and then the best berries from them, I would like to do so; but, as far as my present knowledge goes, I do not care to grade my seed from the best of the field, except to take out the very poorest. I have not jumped at this conclusion as a matter of theory, for it is the result of a good deal of observation, and still I presume that nine farmers out of ten who go out to buy seed wheat would select fine, plump grain, from a field which had yielded twenty or twenty-five bushels per acre, rather than an inferior-looking article somewhat smaller and perhaps a little shrunken, from a field which they knew had yielded thirty-five or forty bushels per acre.

Cheap Clod Crusher.

Take five or six or more hard wood saplings of uniform size, 4 or 5 inches in diameter and straight, 6 or 8 feet long; 18 inches from each end, bore an inch hole; then take a chain and run it through as represented in the cut; fasten it at the outside pieces, and the float is ready for business. You can hitch so as to work it straight or catering.—Practical Farmer.

The Needs of the Farmer.

The enactment of a law by which a liberal increase of endowment is made to the agricultural colleges, is an evidence that Congress appreciates fully the importance of technical education for farmers. Farmers, says Henry Stewart in Practical Farmer, are to be considered in the light of public servants in a great measure. Their industry provides food and clothing for the people. It is the most important of all arts, and it is based upon scientific knowledge which is not afforded by ordinary means of education.

It is an accepted principle of our free and liberal Government that the education of the young is a public charge and duty. This was a fundamental principle of the ancient republics, and is unquestionably the basis of any free and popular government in which every citizen is at once sovereign and a public servant. This idea has been recognized in the establishment of agricultural colleges and experiment stations, and under our present system of protection to native industries it becomes a right that agriculture should receive its share, which cannot be given in any practicable way in any other manner than by giving every facility to farmers to make their industry as productive and profitable as possible.

The greatest need of the farmers of the present time is a thorough education. Agriculture is based on a vast system of scientific knowledge which is to be acquired not only through well conducted agricultural journals but by means of technical schools for the young. The schools lay the foundation which the agricultural press must be constantly building upon and enlarging; and the existing colleges need be made more efficient. The new appropriation of $15,000 annually for each college, with an increase of $1,000 yearly until the amount reaches $25,000, is thus a just recognition by the Government of what is a pressing need of the farmers.

THE STOCK RANCH.

Tape Worm in Sheep.

Reports from the West indicate that many sheep, especially lambs, are being killed by tape-worms.

The writer lost several sheep from this cause before it was generally known that sheep were troubled in that way. Lambs sometimes die in a few days after the first symptoms appear, but sheep that have got their growth will linger for months and sometimes a year. They appear dull and stupid, stand with their heads up and eyes wide open, but show no desire to keep with the flock. They grow poor and weak and finally die with the appearance of having starved to death. As there is but little hope of saving a sheep that shows these symptoms from any cause the best way is to kill them and see that they are deeply buried; or, if medicines are to be tried, put the patient in a pen where the excrement can be scraped up and destroyed. Turkeys are frequently troubled with tape worms and show about the same symptoms as sheep, but they are more likely to get rid of them and recover, and if they run over the sheep pasture may spread the trouble in that way.

Impure Water for Stock.

Dr. Young, the Secretary of the State Board of Health, has recently had sent to him for analysis, water from a well near the barnyard of a Maine dairyman. From it comes the water supply for all the stock on the farm. The water appeared clear to look at, yet when analyzed it is found to be by all odds the worst specimen which has yet been received. Five-one-thousandth parts of ammonia would ordinarily be enough to cause a water specimen to be looked upon with suspicion, and this specimen contained one and three-tenths parts of ammonia, or in other words was as much worse than water ordinarily suspicious from excess of ammonia, as five to 1,300. The question arises whether the milk from cows who drink this impure water can by any possibility escape its contamination. Knowing the condition of this water supply one would scarcely feel able to vouch for the wholesomeness of such milk. This is a matter which is open to discussion. It will illustrate the fact, however, that many farmers are prone to look upon any kind of a water supply as "good enough for the stock." Nothing could be more fallacious. If a bad water supply is a source of disease to men, one need not expect that it will prove otherwise with cattle. The stock on a farm should have as pure water as that used by the family, yet how often it is that we find wells dug—as was the one above mentioned, close to, or even in the barnyard, and receiving a large part of its drainage. Can it be expected that cattle drinking the product of such cesspools as these will be healthy?—Maine Farmer.

POULTRY YARD.

Making New Breeds.

It seems to be the craze of both amateur and professional poultrymen to either endeavor to get up a new breed or help boom one just started. It is this Yankee notion for "something new" that causes it. Of what use can it be? When we had the Dominiques, Plymouth Rocks, and Silver Wyandottes, why was it necessary to go further? Have the White Plymouth Rocks eclipsed the original Barreds. Have the White, Black, or Golden Wandottes been able to put the Silver Laced in the shade? We could thus review the new foreign varieties, but it is useless. There are exceptions, however, but they are few. We believe the Indian game is a valuable addition, but we see no use of the White Langshan. A new breed should prove themselves more meritorious than those already established. When they fail to do that, we have no further use for them. The other day a prominent fancy poultryman told us he had a new breed—the Dominique Minorca, but he admitted they were no better than the Black or White Minorca. Granting that they might create a boom, would not a swindle soon occur? Would not the Dominique Leghorns be used to catch unfortunate novices? When the White Minorca boom arrived, the White Leghorns put their best foot forward and won. And so we could continue for some time. When the speculator will cease making new breeds, we may be more able to near up to perfection in what we've got, but not before.—Lieck Stock and Western Farm Journal.

Plan of Poultry-House.

A plan of a poultry-house has been sent us by Mr. S. Johnson, Indiana, the cost of which is $18 for lumber and $5 for labor, or total of $23. It holds 100 fowls. It is 10 feet wide, 6 feet high in front and 4 feet high at the rear. The house is 32 feet long, having two rooms, each 8 feet wide, and one 16 feet wide, the room A being the laying-room; B, the feed-room; and C, the roosting-room. D, H shows steps for reaching the floor. Underneath is lattice railing, enclosing the under portion as a resort in rainy weather. W, W are windows. E, E are ventilators. The house can be made of any size or height.—Farm and Fireside.

Mistake in the Poultry Business.

The author of the following should have due credit, but it is going the rounds credited to an "exchange."

To think that a man who has never been able to make a living at anything else—who has failed in everything else—can go into the poultry business and make a "grand success" of it.

To try to keep 100 fowls through the winter in a house that is none too large for half that number.

To neglect to provide comfortable winter quarters for their poultry.

To waste food by throwing it on the floor instead of feeding in troughs or some other vessel.

To dose well fowls with all sorts of stuff to "keep them well."

To think that any "poultry powders," or any "egg food" in creation, will make your hens lay unless they have proper food, comfortable quarters, and good care besides.

To cram 50 cents worth of drugs down the throat of a sick chicken that wouldn't be worth even a quarter if it was well.

To ventilate the poultry house through cracks in the walls and floors and holes in the roof.

To put off until "to-morrow or next day" the things that ought to be done to-day.

To feed one kind of food 365 days in a year.

To keep a lot of old hens that are 3 or 4 years old.

To allow the poultry droppings to accumulate in the house for weeks at a time.

To neglect to supply green food regularly throughout the winter.

To give all the waste milk to pigs.

To buy an incubator before you know enough about poultry to set a hen.

To hatch out a lot of chicks in mid-winter, or very early spring, unless you have a suitable place in which to raise them.

THE DAIRY.

How to Make Milk Pay.

If money making is the object in keeping cows, there are times when more can be made in other ways than by making butter. During the hot weather when butter is cheap it is often better to find other use for the milk. I have in my mind one woman who makes smears, or cottage cheese, thus using both milk and cream. She delivers it to her customers in shining pails, and she cannot make enough to meet her demand. On another farm near me the milk is all made into ice cream and delivered to regular customers. It is put into cans holding a pint, quart, half-gallon or more; each can put into a pail and packed in ice, so it keeps nicely for several hours after it is delivered. I do not advise every one to rush into this kind of work, but every small town will have numerous families who do not keep a cow, and consequently must buy these things or go without. Many of these families are only too glad to make arrangements to take such things on certain days of each week, and by so doing they know what to depend on for the table, and the one who prepares it knows just how much he has sale for. To the one who delivers it in neat shape and promptly according to agreement, there are good prices to be had in almost any small town. Those living near the large cities or towns, of course, have their regular "market days" to help them disposed of such things. While on the subject of milk, let me say to those who cannot churn as often as it should be done, that every time you milk add a cupful of new milk to your cream. It seems to freshen the cream, and the butter will be far better and come easier.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Something About Carpets.

Unless carpets have been woven in breadths of the desired length and width for a room, nearly every one getting them ready to put down finds it a difficult matter to keep the edges from fraying as soon as they are cut. To prevent this, measure the breadth to be cut off, and before cutting it run a double row of stitching, with the sewing machine, on each side of the line where it is to be cut off. Cut it between the rows of stitching; it can then be bound, or hemmed, as desired, and it will not fray or ravel at the ends.

A durable and nice-looking stair-carpet may be easily and cheaply made when one is making rag carpet by having a pretty stripe of dark colors woven, as wide as you wish your stair-carpet to be, alternating with a stripe, say two inches wide, using string, warp, or old yarn instead of rags for filling.

When enough to make the length desired has been woven, stitch with the sewing machine twice across each place where the twine or warp has been woven in, cut the stripes apart between the rows of stitching and hem the warp stripe down; then sew the ends of the stripes so formed together, and you will have a stair-carpet that not only looks well but that will wear as long as two of the ordinary kind.

Household Hints.

A small bag of sulphur kept in a drawer will prove an absolute preventive to red ants.

Sprained ankle has been cured in an hour by showering with hot water poured from a height of a few feet.

Common washing soda and boiling water should be used to rinse all the waste pipes at least once a week or ten days.

It is said that whole cloves put into a chest with woolen goods are a better preventative against moths than cedar shavings, tobacco or camphor.

Silver spoons and forks in daily use may be kept bright by leaving them in strong borax water several hours. The water should be boiling when they are put in.

Fuel can be saved on ironing day by placing over the iron an old tin bucket or similar vessel bottom side up. You need a thick iron-holder, lined with paper, to handle them with when heated in this way.

Of course any ingenious woman can devise ways to adapt the ideas embodied in this and the other toilets to her own requirements.

The second toilet sketched is composed of a bodice and trained skirt of pale-pink satin, brocaded with a feather design in black velvet. A band of feathers is placed round the hem of the skirt, while the bodice is finished with black fringes. This belle, like the others, carries a fan, for that is a necessity for the purposes of evening dress. White fans are no longer in vogue, unless delicately painted, and with pearl sticks of that rosy white hue, or of deep coral, which certainly adds to the beauty of a deep rose-colored fan, upon which spangles of even pearl may be sewn. a most delicate invisible wire, which dangles in an artistic fashion; and yellow goes almost invariably with black. The third summer dance dress has a bodice of pale-blue satin, embroidered with white, and having a pattern on it in pale yellow and darker blue. The petticoat is also in pale-blue satin, embroidered with flowers and leaves in pearls as designed. The train is of pale-blue brocade, while the sleeves and bodice trimmings are of white silk crepe de chine. A necklace is the chief jewelry worn with this gown. As to such adornments, few people have any idea of the extent to which rich women wear paste jewels.

The two pretty heads of little girls are topped with two typical summer hats, the shapes of which give ample shade to the face. One has its brim turned up behind, above the childishly braided hair, and is trimmed with ribbon and a few flowers. The other is more severe in outlines, but an abundance of white gauze softens the effect, and it is becoming to the juvenile face and the loose hair.

Headgear is an important feature of dress at all times, and especially in summer, when elaborate and ornate embellishments are seasonably permissible.

A SUMMER DANCE TOILET.

A mere head covering had a primitive excuse for its existence, but that has long been lost sight of in its object of framing, settling off, or concealing the face. The hat whose wide brim is drawn down at the sides, and held down by strings passing under the chin, always will give demureness and modesty to a visage. With many women such demureness and such modesty is most bewitching coquetry. Any style of hat that gives an oval frame to the upper part of the face imparts this suggestion of sweet simplicity. Any head covering that has strings passing under the chin, or that by any device covers the portion of cheek and neck from tip of ear to beneath the chin gives the same effect, because it further suggests the oval. Since that most dainty part of woman, the nape of the neck, is awkwardly concealed by the down-reaching brim in the back, this brim must be cut away, and cut as high up away as seems pretty. Of course, if modesty again assails the wearer, she can hang a semi-transparent curtain over that pretty rounded bit of neck and its curl or so. But let us hope modesty will not assail her in that way. Robbed of the shielding arched brim, the hat begins to savor confessedly of coquetry. When the brim flares from the face it becomes a challenge to attention instead of a shy deprecation of it, so much so that strings tying under the chin seem out of the question. Such a hat is daring, saucy, bold, heroic, majestic, as the temper and temperament of the wearer makes it. Directly the brim disappears, or half droops, the head covering grows coquettish, half demure, half provocative. The lofty crown gives height and quaintness, and, if Dame Fashion says so, "style." The hat that is reduced to a mere crown becomes an ornament and not a covering, and by its adjustment and the decrees of fashion is or is not becoming.

The present style of headgear is by all odds coquettish, by reason of the closing brim, the bits of airy, erratic, and independent upright points, the crisp fluffiness, the pointed turns of the brim, and the open crown, displaying the hair it is supposed to cover. The hat whose brim turns up abruptly at the back, and slants or points down in front, has—whether the wearer will or no—a dashing, devil-may-care effect. The hat that sits roundly on the forehead, either brimless or like a sailor hat, is bound to be jaunty and business-like, if it is worn at all in the spirit of its shape. The hat which, when tipped back, displays the fluff of front hair is confessedly a bid for admiration of that fluff. The leg-horn hat will always be ingenious, modest and young-looking so long as its wide, flexible brim droops free and its low crown avoids suggesting height or dignity. A mannish hat is utilitarian, trimmed jaunty or rakish, as the wearer may make it. A hood drawn close emphasizes the oval of a face and without relief—if, then, a face is plump and young, a close-drawn hood becomes it well. If it isn't, oh! how such a hood reminds you of the fact. Whatever hood hides the face loosely in its folds, letting the hair about brow, neck and ears add to the softness of the shadows, is picturesquely becoming in its suggestion of protection and reserve. Any hat that follows simply the lines of the head, the close-drawn, smooth hair doing the same, is trim, gentlemanly, or lady-like, as the wearer makes it. The hat with transparent brim, which, though drooping, lets the eyes glance through, is bound to be deliciously seductive, unless worn by a woman who does not appreciate the possibilities of her chapeau. The narrow brim, which from the hat's being tipped forward makes a sharp line across the eyes, sets them off well, and makes a glance upward piquant, while the same glance toward the edge of a brim curved around the face would seem saintly. Whatever headdress conceals or covers closely all parts of the face except the features of sense (eyes, nose and mouth) is austere, religious or childlike, as the wearer conveys it, but it can hardly be coquettish. These general rules of effect do not change, though fashion makes her own adaptation of them.

DAISY DART.

"My husband is the dearest, most considerate man in the world." "How does he show it?" "He knows I hate tobacco smoke in the house and so he goes to the club every night after supper and smokes there."

It Gives Each Month

A FEW of the most Notable Events, especially in the line of Social Reform. Some of the best things said and done by good men and women of the land. STORIES and poetry for our young folks.

EVENTS and interests, Out and About.

SELECTIONS for declamation in schools and public recitation.

HINTS on good health and household interests.

Our Intention.

The desiderata for a paper intended for family reading are simple. They consist simply of the best reading at the least expense; and not only the purest and most innocent reading, but with an interest unimpaired by its harmlessness. Such a paper must be spirited and interesting, without being viciously or unhealthily stimulating. It must avoid prossiness on the one hand and sensationalism on the other.

It is this sort of a publication that THE FARMER'S WIFE is, and it is alone in the field.

Every line of type in this paper is the result of deliberation and close, critical scrutiny. The subjects of its stories are selected with abundant care, and their execution guarded by every precaution towards the production of a perfect publication for the family circle. To make THE FARMER'S WIFE worthy of its name is no easy task.

Facts are indisputable evidence. Study this number of THE FARMER'S WIFE and be convinced that ours is no idle boast.

Our Purpose.

The purpose of the publishers is to provide the amplest variety and scope of brief fiction, both for the purpose of increasing the variety of this paper and of affording opportunities for comparison and criticism as to the styles and methods of the masters of modern light literature. The stories selected and pledged for publication will, in every case, be completely representative of their authors in their happiest form.

We want the girls to act as agents. To every one that will send us five subscribers at fifty cents each we will send a copy free for one year.

Our Future.

We are unable to forecast, to any certain extent, the program for the future. Suffice it will be a most brilliant one for it will include the best in its line that the literary and intellectual activity of the day provides. No source of supply has been left unexplored. The brightest talents have been levied upon, and a long list of favorites in the field of fiction, and of new men and women whose merit is destined to place them, among the favorites, is the result. That the program will receive constant applications and improvements goes without saying, but even in its present form it will be found exceptionally attractive.

Our Field.

In the field of short stories, complete in one number, provisions have been made for representing writers from all parts of America, letters from some of the best woman writers in the land.

Our Correspondents

Are among the most illustrious names in the world of letters. These will be like the other works, varied in character and only of the loftiest merit. An exacting critical taste has been brought to bear on their selection, with the effect that they represent in themselves the choicest literature of the time.

THE various departments of this paper have also been carefully considered with a view to their revision, expansion and improvement. They will be found in every way up to the high standard established by the rest of THE FARMER'S WIFE, and to display the same qualities for originality, brilliancy and freshness. Other departments than those already in existence will be added. We desire to make THE FARMER'S WIFE the best publication of its kind in the country; we propose also to make it the most widely known and popular.

THE papers opposing the Alliance are gloating over the fact that this year is a year of abundant crops and fruits, and that such being the case it will break up the Alliance. Queer isn't it. Just as though these old parties had anything to do with the production of crops. Do they want to infer that they also control the power of the Almighty and can have an abundant yield or no yield at all at their option. We will admit that they control the markets of the world, and fix the price and grade the quality, but this is rapidly drifting out of their hands and into the hands of the producers. No, the farmers and laborers are not blaming you for poor crops, nor are they giving you credit for their success in this direction, they blame you for the unjust laws that you have passed against them, and when they ask a remedy you say it is unconstitutional; that they have no rights that you can or will respect, and when the farmer is hard up you say, "Oh it is a failure of crops;" when there is an abundant crop you say, "Overproduction; we will take all you raise for about one-half the cost of production, store it in our immense warehouses. You must let us have it for you have your taxes and interest to pay, and if you don't pay we will foreclose, and then when you have fixed everything up square, we will loan you money enough back at about twenty-four per cent. to buy enough grain, at three times the price you sold to us, for your seed and to keep your family and teams another year. We will attend to this, it is our business. You just attend to your farming. If we run short of money we will call on Wall street, if Wall street runs short they will call on the government, and the government must respond or there will be a great panic, you know." And so it has been going, year in and year out until us farmers are tired of the whole business and have quit the old parties for good. We will go to the government ourselves direct and see if we can not have the warehouses and the money, and see whether the constitution provides for the speculator alone or whether the producer has not got a living show on this earth.

Mrs. MARION TOD, of Michigan, is now in Iowa addressing the people on behalf of the great farmer movement. The people of Iowa are rallying in great numbers, and Mrs. Tod is gathering them in by the hundreds. Let the good work go on; the women are in it.

Farmer's Wife—Then you don't think a woman can keep a secret?
Banker—Well, that has been my experience with them.

F. W.—I know thousands that can and do keep secrets.

Banker.—I don't know where you would go to find them.

F. W.—Why, they live right here in Kansas, and belong to the Farmer's Alliance.

NEXT to the Alliance women there is probably no one thing that has hurt the Republican party in Kansas as the Topeka Daily Capital.

THE freedom of woman should never be interfered with so long as she does nothing to destroy herself or injure others.

THE woman's voice will be heard all over the land, and in all political gatherings from now until the close of the great political war in 1892.

THE FARMER'S WIFE is your help-mate in time of need. Every woman should take it and read it.

THE men have done the voting since the foundation of the government, and a pretty mess they have got us in; don't you think so, brothers.

"God helps those who help themselves." The farmers in Kansas last fall organized for self-protection, and went to work in earnest and by their votes showed that they were sincere, and the Lord answered their prayers, not only by giving them control of the State government but by sending them a bountiful crop. Remember, dear readers, to vote and work for those that earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, and in 1892 our heavenly father will send his blessing to those who vote against the money-changers and for the rights of the common people.

THE State lecturer of the Minnesota Farmer's Alliance is a woman.

SENATOR PEPPER owes his election to the brave women of Kansas.

It is said that John Sherman, of Ohio, after the election of 1892 will be like Ingalls, a statesman out of a job.

The farmer gets but little here below;
His share is always small,
For doesn't everybody know
The shlylocks and railroads get it all.

THIS paper not only circulates largely in Kansas but scores of subscriptions are coming in from every State and Territory.

Mrs. ANNIE L. DIGGS is in Washington, D. C., where she will make her headquarters for the summer.

Mrs. S. E. V. EMERY addressed about 10,000 people on the fourth of July at Emporia, Kansas.

THERE are twenty-two Alliance papers in Kansas edited by women.

Mrs. EMMA GHENT-CURTIS, of Colorado, is a member of the National Committee of the People's party.

A JOINT debate between a man by the name of Dunbar and Mrs. Lease took place at Concordia on the 22nd of July. Dunbar says he will never tackle a woman again on the money question.

WE would advise McKinley and Sherman to stand aside, for the train is coming around the curve, it is loaded down with Alliance women who will rally around the flag in Ohio next month. Their mission will be in the interest of Katie and the babies. The Alliance harvest is already at hand, the reapers will be many, and the women will carry in the sheaves, and save Ohio from the jaws of death and sorrow, and redeem the state from democracy and out of the control of Tariff McKinley and Wall Street John Sherman. Yes, they are coming, look out for them.

Penwomen.

Many women are to-day employed in earning their living with the pen. In 1702 a lady established a newspaper in London, as she said "To save the people from one-half the impertinences they received." The first newspaper in Rhode Island, was established by a woman in 1722. One of the first and ablest law journals was established by a woman. The Union Signal is edited by women and is one of the best and most successful newspapers published. During the last decade there has been a large influx of penwomen on the daily newspapers. The public demands gossip and light reading. Woman's taste and acquisitions fit her for the work.

Woman can thus be a blessing or a curse. If she has a low idea of the mission of the daily newspaper, her writings will be low. She can either lift up or hurl down. But penwomen have not attained unto good positions as writers or reporters without overcoming difficulties. One lady in applying for work on a daily newspaper, was sent to report a horse race. Before going she spent several hours in reading "horse" and did her work so well that she was employed. Another did likewise about mechanics and was equally successful. One of the best lady writers on the Mail and Express is a colored woman. When Mr. Nickerson, the proprietor of the New Orleans Picayune, died it was burdened with a debt of $30,000. His wife took hold of the paper, paid off the indebtedness and now has a good paying property. Mrs. Frank Leslie has been equally successful. So also has a host of others in all departments of literature. If she is first womanly, she can be what she will with success.

MRS. HERRICK'S BABY.

Its Advent Causes a Genuine Sensation in Carterville.

[Written for This Paper.]

THIS is a hot, dusty summer day, and along the whole straggling length of the one street of the little mining camp but two living creatures are visible. From the open windows of the Mermaid and White Elephant saloons comes a hum of lazy voices whose owners are doubtless playing freeze-out for the drinks; aside from this, the motley cluster of log houses and "A" tents partakes largely of the silence popularly attributed to a cemetery.

Of the two animate objects on the street, one is "Gawge," the huge Ethiopian who officiates as presiding genius of the culinary department at Peter Hoskins' boarding house, near by. He, after the fashion of his race, is lying on a bench, face downward, taking an audible siesta, with the dense rays of the scorching sun beating unheeded upon his broad back. The other creature is the saddle-horse belonging to Doc Starr, the physician from the neighboring camp of Anaconda; this animal, tied in front of the one-story and two-room residence of Homely Herrick, is busily engaged in brushing off the torturing armies of flies which beset him.

Homely Herrick is a leading citizen and a very important personage, indeed, in Carterville and all the camps around. Not that he possesses any unusual charms of mind, manner or person—not in the least; for he is lazy, ugly, drunken and shiftless to a degree seldom known. But, what exalts him in the eyes of all his fellow-citizens is the fact that he is the proud husband of the only woman within a hundred miles or more—hence he is a person to be looked up to, and his opinion, even at his drunkest, is accepted as the utterance of an oracle.

Mrs. Herrick is not a goddess, although any man in Carterville or anywhere else who says anything calculated to cast a shadow of doubt upon the divinity she is supposed to possess, might as well select his last resting-place about the time he utters the sacrilegious words. In fact, this fair creature is a fat, coarse, densely ignorant Cornish woman, who sometimes uses cuss words, and is as unprepossessing personally as her spouse—perhaps more so.

"BOYS, BABY AT HERRICK'S!"

She also has a very depressing effect on the scales in Carterville, inasmuch as she tips the beam to the tune of something like twenty-two stone.

But she is a woman, and, as the sole representative of her sex in this wild little camp, is gazed upon by the four hundred men of Carterville with feelings akin to worship; and the lucky man who is so fortunate as to receive the lady's gracious permission to carry her bundles home from the store is for days thereafter the object of vividly-green jealousy on the part of his companions.

A figure emerges from the front door of the Herrick mansion. It is Doc Starr, who hastily mounts his horse and gallops wildly up the street, followed by a swirling cloud of white dust.

"Gawge," snoring on the bench, awakens from his slumber and gazes at the coming horseman in blinking surprise, for Doc Starr is usually merciful unto his beast, and this unwonted haste on his part, on such a hot day, astonished the colored gentleman.

The physician draws rein at the Mermaid, throws his reins over a post, and rushes into the barroom, where he brings all the miners to their feet by yelling, in a manner entirely at variance with professional ethics: "Boys! Baby at Herrick's!"

There is a wild rush, and the bar and the card-tables are deserted, the bartender coming with the rest, and they almost crush the bearer of the wonderful news in their eagerness to get near him.

"Sho!" "Do tell!" "Great Scott!" "By gosh!" "Why in Texas don't you give Doc a chance?" "Boy, or girl?" (This Doc hesitatingly.)

"Girl!" yells Doc, proudly, "born last night. Come on, boys—let's liquor up." But in the wild shout which follows his announcement the invitation passes unheeded.

Then there is a brief consultation with the physician. Yes, Mrs. Herrick is sitting up, and is well enough to receive visitors, he thinks. The news spread like wildfire, and in less time than it takes to tell it, there is an excited mob of men—almost three hundred of them—in the street, whither they have flocked from saloons, stores and boarding houses.

Doc Starr, Pete Hoskins and Heavy Fairbank, the rotund proprietor of the Mermaid, are appointed an interviewing committee to appraise the happy parents of the intentions of the mob and are hurrying down the street toward the Herrick abode. They return soon with the desired permission, and the eager but now quiet procession moves rapidly along, headed by the committee and Clip-car Tomkins, the gentleman who runs the White Elephant.

The doors of the Herrick home are opened wide, the one for the worshippers to enter by and the other for an exit. The procession halts and the four gentlemen leading it enter to take their look at the little, red, ugly, blinking thing which Mrs. Herrick proudly holds in her arms.

Doc Starr has seen it before, and may see it any time, so he does not linger; Hoskins and Fairbank, being bachelors, merely look curiously at the little creature and pass on, feeling queer. But Tomkins is said to have a wife and family somewhere back in the "states," and a hungry, heart-starved feeling wells up in his breast and two big tears start from the keen eyes that have not known them for years. Tomkins looks long and wistfully—then the crowd outside tells him to hurry. He stoops hastily over the babe, kisses it bashfully, and, with something like a sob, grabs a handful of coin and nuggets from his pocket, throws it into the lap of the astonished Mrs. Herrick and says: "Git somethin' fer th' kid," and rushes out.

And so all the rest of the afternoon the wondering, curious throng goes in and out of the little room, each one leaving a remembrance behind him, until Mrs. Herrick's lap overflows, and then a vacant chair and a wooden table are strewn with little sacks of gold dust and littered with nuggets and coin. It is more money than the poor couple ever dreamed of having all at once, and Mrs. Herrick sits in stupefied amazement and her wondering spouse hastens down street to spend part of his suddenly-acquired fortune for whisky.

And the miners come in, four at a time, to see and be conquered—old men, young men, ignorant miners and men whose faces, if shaven, would be token their owners gentlemen by birth and education. Married men, some of them whose throats feel choky and stifled as they look upon this tiny creature and think of their own little ones at home, far away, and they leave the house lingeringly and sneak off by themselves to have a good, lonesome, comfortable think. Young men, some of them hardly more than boys, also come in and see this baby with strange feelings in their hearts, and go away ashamed of themselves, somehow, though they know not why. As they join their friends afterward they endeavor to assume an air of cheerful nonchalance they are far from feeling.

There is no procession back up the street. The men who marched together down to Herrick's awhile ago go away alone, or in quiet groups which soon separate. Somehow nobody feels sociable, and Heavy Fairbank and Clip-car Tomkins as they sit before their respective places of business in the evening, think a great deal, but do not notice how dull trade is.

The little red baby, in the midst of plenty where poverty has reigned before, squalls and howls and makes night hideous just as other babies do, never knowing how many sweet and tender recollections she has caused to wake in the rugged breasts of the throng of hardy, reckless, careless men who gathered this day to do her honor.

And Mr. and Mrs. Homely Herrick have issued "P. P. C.'s"—verbal—to their many friends. They are going back to the "states" and Carterville mourns.

The "Glove Tree."

The extremely particular woman will find use for what the clever designer calls the glove tree. This is a plaster cast of the owner's hand, over which she stretches her gloves as she removes them. Of course it is necessary to have a pair of the models and several gloves may be drawn over them at the same time. The virtue of this invention is said to be in the fact that gloves so cared for retain their shape and flexibility much longer than when they are rolled into the customary careless folds.

[FOR THE FARMER'S WIFE.]

TRIBUTE TO GENIUS.

Respectfully dedicated to Mrs. M. E. Lease.

I have heard of a dog that barked at the moon
And disturbed the sweet stillness of night;
His envious howls, like the cry of the loon,
Were sent forth 'gainst the sweet queen of light.
But tranquil and fair sailed the beautiful moon
O'er the trackless expanse of the sky,
And disdained not to shed on the envious cur
Her luminous beams from on high.

I have heard of the mud-fowls and harsh-voiced jays,
Who watched the proud eagle on tireless wing
Soar fearless and far in the deep blue away,
While their envious noise hid a covert sting;
But the eagle sailed on through empyrean blue,
And unflinchingly gazed on the fires of the sun,
While the jackdaws and jays, and fussy hens, too,
Groveled down in the earth, searching foul scandal crumbs.

I have seen the foul spiders, loathsome and black,
Gather poison most deadly from beautiful bloom,
While the bright, busy honey-bee with gold on his back
Would glean riches most sweet where the spiders found doom.
Oh, thus it is ever foul envy and malice
Would fain spread their shade on genius' stamped brow—
Would fain turn the wine in life's golden chalice
Into tears sad and bitter if they but knew how.
But high on the ramparts of fame and of learning
Thy footsteps shall press o'er the plottings of hate;
The lamp of thy genius still steadily burning,
Revered, loved and honored; this, this be thy fate.

Woman's Opportunity.

MRS. NETTIE S. NUTT.

Few women realize the grandeur of the age in which we live. Standing upon the threshold of a new era, opening up to man grander opportunities and higher and nobler civilization. It is given to woman to guide the child-like, uplift the fallen and encourage the weak. A no period has woman's influence had a wider scope than at the present day. As the dispenser of Christian charity, the universal healer of the sores of the world, the field of opportunity is large; while new opportunities are constantly opening up as we near the approaching dawn. The world-wide industrial agitation which is testing human civilization, is daily crying out to woman for her aid and influence, and she who fails to see in it but a political struggle for party supremacy is shortsighted and misses the glories of the dawn of an era in which we have the promise of the "restitution of all things," when woman purified and ennobled, shaking off the accursed garments of sin, shall be restored to her original position beside man, not as a necessary appendage to his happiness, but as his companion, his helpmeet and his equal. To woman it is given to aid in the ushering in of this new age. The crying need for the services of woman in this industrial agitation—which is the great heart throbs of the world climbing upward towards the plateau of perfect civilization where love and justice are the rulers of mankind. The convulsions of mother earth as she travails in the birthpains of earth's crowning era, which shall restore perfect manhood and place woman in her rightful place as the beauty and glory of the human race is daily increasing, and no woman of to-day need fold her hands and feel that life is vain.

The great Alliances open to every farmer's wife the door of opportunity to cast her mite into the treasury for the support of Christian principles as the ruling force among men. The rapid increase of destitution, intemperance and crime, cries out to woman with a loud wail for the oil of Christian charity and the scourge of righteous indignation which shall drive out their producers. Upon every intelligent woman of to-day rests a mighty responsibility since to woman it is given to aid in the enlightenment of the sons of men, swinging outward the gates of a glorious future as the inward swinging gates close in a buried past. O, woman! lift up thine head and gird thy loins anew! Stretch out thine hand to grasp the mighty opportunities, and, pouring the oil of womanly sympathy upon earth's sores, heal them and restore to the race the virtues of perfect manhood. As by woman's temptation man fell, so by her influence let man be lifted up and restored to purity. Let no woman say earth hath no need of her work, but lift up your eyes and view the grandeur of the age in which you live; thrust in your sickle to harvest the golden grain of the closing age; and march rejoicing with labor's triumphant host through the open gateway of the new era. Give voice, O, woman, against the crying evils of our land, and by your sympathy and influence help struggling man to drive out the prejudices of ignorance, seat liberty again upon her throne and lead justice within our legislative halls. Bring in your sheafs through the open gateway of a grand future, and share in the feast given by an enlightened people in honor of liberty and justice, newly crowned by a universal fraternity.

DAWN.

ANNIE L. DICOS.

The night is gone, the day is here;
Let no one doubt, let no one fear.
The child is born that as man shall see
The slaves of drudgery all set free.
Free to learn, to labor, to strive
On a higher plane to keep souls alive.
The body has claimed all the bread of life
And the hungry world lies fed on strife.
But sure as we breathe we soon shall find
The new struggle will be of nobler kind.
Thank God, the strong will soon help the weak.
Thank God, the lowliest soon may speak.
And the listening ear of the elder brother
Will soon heed the cry of child and mother.
Then the glad old world will upward bound
With courage and hope on the next high round.

A NOVEL DEFENSE.

How a Frightened Girl Saved the China Bank.

YES, it was rather a novel defense, and the strangest part of it is, that she never thought of using it as such. Alice Weston lived in an old fashioned country house, built some five or six miles distant from any other habitation. Her father and mother, being old-fashioned, too, always retired to bed at nine o'clock; her brother and his wife did the same, and generally she was the last waking thing about the place.

On this particular night Alice was sitting before the halfburned embers of the parlor fire, after all the rest had retired, leisurely combing her long, black hair, and dreaming, as maidens will, of anything and everything.

The room was in a sort of lurid darkness, illuminated now and again by transient flashes of light from a bank of unburned coal at the very back of the grate, which now and again sent up spears of white flame to play upon the warm, red window curtains, and the dark tablecloth, and the crimson wall paper.

Everything glowed red in the room save one small white mound in the corner beside a wide sofa, and Alice knew that to be Baby Weston's little cradle, where he generally spent his days kicking or vocally employed while his mother pursued her usual household avocations.

Baby Weston was now, of course, sleeping upstairs, and the cradle was empty.

When Alice had dreamed to her heart's content, and was preparing to leave the room, it suddenly occurred to her to gather up the glowing heap of coals into the shovel and carry them up to her own bedroom stove, as the night was chilly.

She proceeded to do so, and raised the sulphurous pyramid in her hand.

As she elevated the shovel a light flame burst all over the top of the pile, and for an instant the whole room was illuminated by it.

In that instant Alice, looking by chance toward the cradle, thought she saw a second white object in the corner. She lowered the shovel so that the fumes might escape up the chimney, and looked more carefully.

Assuredly there was something white beside the cradle—something surely not there a few minutes ago!

Alice's heart, which was as timid as that of a hare, began to beat very fast. What could it be? Had they forgotten to take the baby up to bed, and had he fallen out of the cradle?

All at once she saw, or thought she saw, the cradle move.

Scarcely waiting to reason, only conscious of a horrified conviction that Master Baby had been overlooked, and had consequently overtaken by way of revenge, Alice, shovel in hand, went over to the corner, and stooped to examine the mysterious white object.

She found a man's face. His eyes staring up in mute terror, his countenance ghastly and bloodless, the rough black hair which garnished cheek, chin and lips fairly bristling—this agreeable image glared up at the fiery avalanche about to be thrown upon him, and at the wrathful woman with the long, flowing hair, and opened his mouth in a frantic but dumb appeal for mercy.

As for Alice, she was as far from thinking of aggressive measures as the mouse beneath the paw of its devourer.

If she could have run away she would thankfully have done so, but her limbs seemed petrified.

Here was some terrible robber in the house, with intent to steal the contents of her father's wallet (it was well known that he had sold a pair of fat oxen the previous day, and that he would put his money in a china savings bank on the parlor mantel), and the intruder had crawled under the sofa until the family should have retired, and fallen asleep, and, doubtless, the noise she had made in putting the coals on the shovel had awakened him.

Of course, he would arise and make an end of her, and then carry off the spoil, and her afflicted, bereft and beggared relatives would find in the morning a bleeding piece of clay.

"For Heaven's sake, let me off," gasped the monster, breaking in upon her sad reverie, "and I'll never try the like again."

With the blue flames flickering upon her white, set face, and the red cinders dropping unheeded, the puissant avenger moved back, and the man crawled out from his hiding-place and gathered himself up.

When Alice saw the size of him (he was at least six feet) she would have got into a nutshell, had it been within the bounds of possibility; but she could only gaze up at him, her eyes wide and awful, the shovel unconsciously clutched in her hand.

"Show me the way out, ma'am," muttered the robber, "and on my Bible oath I'll not lay hand on the value of a pin's point."

Urged to flight by the impetus of great fear, the panic-stricken captor moved among the dusky furniture as if her legs worked by galvanism, and the panic-stricken captive slouched close beside her, his eyes bulging at every sound, the drops of perspiration streaming from his forehead.

Also the sulphurous smoke, which now plentifully wafted backward in his nostrils from that shovel, caused such an insupportable tickling therein that it required much caution to avoid loud and fatal sneezing.

Through the long, draughty hall where the boards creaked appallingly beneath their tread, these two timid ones passed, and reached the locked front-door, and while Alice gazed up the bedroom stairs in a silent agony of longing, the rascal clutched the key, in a spasm of thankfulness.

"SHOW ME THE WAY OUT, MA'AM."

"By golly! you're a good 'un!" muttered he, wrenching round the lock, "an' I'll never come after the old chap's chancy bank as long's you're here, so help me Bob!"

With one terrified, backward glance at the dread vision of wrath and its fiery weapon, he tore out at the door, and clattered down the frozen road, leaving Alice staring after him like a person in a trance.

Of course, she recovered herself in time to alarm the household and have the rascal caught?

Not she. She carried the shovel of cinders back to the parlor, put them in the grate, and sank down on the hearth-rug in a swoon, while the cold winter wind blew in at the open hall door, and a dozen thieves might have plundered the house twice over.

But at last her brother, roused by the repeated slamming of doors and the whistle of the icy air through his own keyhole, came down to reconnoiter, found affairs as described, and filled with amazement made all fast.

Never was there so timorous a guardian, never a house so effectually guarded, and yet she never dreamed of defense.—Annie Ashmore, in N. Y. Weekly.

It Depends on the Child.

A man down east has invented a washing-machine, the motive power of which is a swing in which a child is placed. The child swings to and fro, and the motion causes the machine to run, with the result that the family washing is done up in good shape. As long as the child does not know that it is doing any work it would seem that this would be a good scheme; but those who are familiar with the nature of children will readily see that as soon as the child finds out that the swing is connected with a washing-machine, it will suddenly take a strong dislike to the amusement of swinging and get out of it by some excuse or another.—Peck's Sun.

THE LITTLE LASS IN PINK.

A peerless pearl of beauty,
A jewel of romance!
Who would not ride in tourney
To gain her winsome glance?
Who would not be a minstrel,
The golden rhymes to link,
And sing her praise in merry lays—
The little lass in pink!

So tiny are her glovelets,
So dainty are her shoes,
I throw the pinks wrought them
Beneath the midnight moon;
And o'er the elfin stitches
They sang, with many a wink,
"We twine a twist that none resist
The little lass in pink."

She hath a witching dimple;
Now was it not a sin
That when the fairies crowned her
They put that dimple in?
The heartaches it hath given
It grieves my soul to think;
She hath no care how lovers fare—
The little lass in pink.

Her smile is like a dewdrop
That glistens in the morn.
Her frown—no eye hath seen it:
She never looks in scorn.
Her footsteps fall like rose leaves
Beside the fountain's brink.
The gallants sigh as she goes by—
The little lass in pink.

After the revel's over,
When stars grow dim above,
And slumber's drowsy fingers
Have kissed the eyes we love,
Her gallant cavaliers,
Her parting beakers clink:
"May time tread light and never blight
The little lass in pink!"
—Samuel McInturn Peck, in Harper's Bazar.

THE TRUNDLE-BED VALLEY.

I know a little valley, in among the mountains
A trundle-bed for Natur's babes with grass green coverlid,
All buttoned down 'th tulips, an' all trimmed with dandelion,
A crib for Natur's child, like me, to toddle to and fro on.

I love to watch the coverlid sewed with the lily's stem
An' the trout brook is its bindin' that curves
'way aroun' its hem.

W'en the burden is too heavy for my heart an'
han' an' head,
I jest choke down my tired sobs an' seek my trundle-bed.

Four big mountains are its bed-posts, an' down through its awning high
The sun shines like a drowsy-plin in the buzzum of the sky,
An' it shines so warm an' frien'ly where my coverlid is spread Thet I don't need any candle w'en I seek my trundle-bed.

Mother Natur' loves her child'en, so the good of soul has spread Tiger-lily-tangled bed-quilts over my big trundle-bed;
An' to give her fretful youngster no excuse for being cross,
She has stuffed a lazy piller with the softest kind of moss.

So, w'en I'm torn an' tired, do my weary footsteps tread
Up the pussy-willow valley to my trundlebed;
Mother Natur' bends her face down, and she seems to love me so Thet I rise, and toddle bravely all the way I have to go!

SPECIAL FOR The Farmer's Wife. DOINGS OF WOMEN FOLK

NEWS, NOTES, AND GOSSIP ABOUT FEMININE AFFAIRS.

Typical American Woman—Lace Curtains—How One Woman Lives—Woman's Greatest Danger—Curing a Sore Throat.

How One Woman Lives.

THERE is no reason nowadays why any woman with brains shouldn't make a good living. The Ladies' Home Journal tells of a young lady who turned to practical account her fondness for ordering and supervising an elaborate menu, and is now a professional "table-dresser." Her duty is to superintend the details of a stately breakfast, luncheon or dinner. If desired, she makes out the bill-of-fare, for which she does the marketing. Everything goes on under her direction, from the garnishing of the dishes to the serving of the coffee. She arranges the flowers, attends to the lighting and into each function interpolates some dainty original conceit. Perceiving that another service was needed she has joined to her first profession that of decorating the drawing room and the dressing-rooms for company. With her help the house-mistress is able to be occupied with her friends until it is time to dress, and yet have no solicitude concerning the preparations. Of course it costs something, but there are wealthy people who think nothing of that.

Typical American Woman.

At the centennial exposition in Philadelphia woman was artistically represented only by this famous "butter statue," "The Sleeping Iolanthe," but at the Columbian exposition the women of America will have better recognition.

DESIGN FOR BUST OF MARY HAMILTON.

In addition to the proposed statue of Queen Isabella, for which Harriet Hosmer has been engaged as sculptress, there will also be a statue of the typical woman philanthropist and a bust of the typical woman reformer.

The money to place these pieces of sculpture at the Columbian exposition is to be raised by the Woman's Memorial Fund Association, organized for the purpose by the Ladies' Art Association, of New York, which was the prime mover in collecting the exhibit in the woman's pavilion and art annex at the centennial. The typical woman philanthropist has been chosen in the person of the founder of the school of design in the United States—Mrs. Mary M. Hamilton Schuyler, better known in the art world by her maiden name, Mary Hamilton, a descendant of Alexander Hamilton. She died about ten years ago.

Mary Hamilton also organized the society for the purchase of Mount Vernon as a national memorial and raised $200,000, going about from city to city as an organizer among women. She was a little over five feet in height, her face was delicately beautiful and patrician, with soft hazel eyes and black hair. She was much beloved by all who knew her. The sculptor, Jonathan Scott Hartley, A. N. A., has been engaged to make the bust, which will be in the finest Vermont marble and will cost $15,000.

The typical woman reformer will be represented by a bust of Miss Susan B. Anthony, a plaster model of which was made some time ago by Mrs. Hartley. This will cost $1,500.

Both pieces of marble will be placed after the Columbian exposition in the Metropolitan Art Museum, the bust to remain there permanently, the statue until such a time as the Ladies' Art Association has a suitable building in which to shelter it.

Lace Curtains.

Lace curtains are of the utmost significance in interior decorations. Should the curtains be too long, as is usually the case, it is better to cut them off allowing about a quarter of a yard for the hem and shrinking; but when the customer objects to cutting, the surplus can be left at the bottom and the curtains caught up into fan-shaped plaits; to do this, take the lower back corner up to the tassel hook and gather the curtain into plaits, as shown in the illustration.

LACE CURTAINS WITH VALANCE FRINGE.

Another way is to plait the curtains at the top, or shirr them on a tape and sew lambrequin hooks to the tape. In this case slip the hooks into rings on the pole. When hung in this way the surplus length of curtain can be disposed of by folding up until it occupies but from 6 to 8 inches, and letting it hang back of the curtain. Very rich effects are to be had by using the deep valance fringes, of which there are a great variety of styles on the market. The illustration also shows a pair of lace curtains with a valance fringe attached by hooks in the same rings with the curtains.

Paying Dear For a Nickel.

Speaking of the curious foibles of woman-kind reminds me of another incident of the street cars. A lady and little girl sat side by side. The conductor eyed the woman sharply as she tendered him the customary nickel and requested another coin for the child.

"Why, you don't charge for such a little child as this, do you?"

"How old is this child, Madam?"

"She isn't four years of age yet," was the reply.

The conductor looked incredulous, but murmuring something to the effect that it was all right, went gloomily to his post, looking as if his unspoken thought was that the woman had unmistakably lied. Then the little child had her inning.

"Mamma!"

"What dear?"

"Ain't I more than four years old to-day?"

"Hush!" She tried to quiet her. But the scheme didn't work, for the child came back to the subject in the next block.

"Mamma!"

"What, dear?"

"You know you told Aunt Sally yesterday that I was six years old next May?"

This was said in a piping voice that went through everybody in the car, failing only to reach the conductor, who was on the platform. The mother mounted a blush, but it was very faint, indeed, to the one which crept over the child's face when it got slapped on the back and hustled out of the car.

A Pretty Lamp Shade.

A correspondent tells how to make that inexpensive, pretty and useful knickknack, a tissue paper lamp shade, as follows: Take a sheet of French tissue paper, leave it double as you get it, then double in the middle, making almost a square; fold each side back, making it triangular shaped, and continue so to do, pressing each fold down firmly till it is too small to fold further. Take out all the folds loosely, and by taking hold of the paper at the point draw through the hand till it is very finely creased. If for a hanging lamp leave the full sheet with the points to hang down, or use two such sheets, and the points alternating will make it many pointed. Cut a hole in the center and slit it up the side to get it on the hanging lamp, then fasten together with mullage.

Curing a Sore Throat.

Sore throat is a frequent accompaniment of cold, but it also often arises from some derangement of the digestive functions. Attention to the diet is always important in this affliction. If the throat is merely red and inflamed, with no spots on its surface, a simple gargle of salt and water, or chlorate of potash, one tablespoonful in a glass of water, will probably relieve it. Use the gargle frequently. A cloth dipped in cold water, squeezed until it ceases to drip, wrapped around the throat and covered with a bandage of flannel will assist in reducing the inflammation. It should be changed when it becomes dry. Meat should be avoided for a few days—gruels, beef tea and light articles of diet being substituted for it.

Mrs. PETERBY—Can you wash? Matilda Snowball—Oh course I kin wash, if it has ter be. Can you cook? If it has ter be, ob course I kin cook. Are you honest? You bet I'se honest, if I has ter be.

FOR OUR LITTLE FOLKS.

A COLUMN OF PARTICULAR INTEREST TO THEM.

What Children Have Done, What They Are Doing, and What They Should Do, to Pass Their Childhood Days.

A Well-Trained Fish.

One must prepare the fish himself by blowing out an egg, then the body of the fish is cut from a piece of flannel and the two pieces are sewed together in the manner shown in our cut. The little pocket thus obtained is filled with a few grains of shot to give it necessary weight. One of the holes in the egg-shell is closed up with sealing wax, while the other is left open. Two eyes are made with a red or black pencil on either side of this little opening, and the shell, which is the head of the fish, is fastened with sealing wax to the body of flannel.

The fish is now completed and we can proceed to show how smart and obedient he is. A glass with a broad mouth, a fruit jar for instance, is filled with water, the fish is put in and the opening of the jar closed with a piece of bladder or rubber. By laying one's hand on the bladder and at the same time bidding the fish to go to the bottom of the water, it will immediately do so. Commanding it to come to the top again, it will respond just as promptly.

"How can this be?" the incredulous reader will ask. The first time we simply press upon the bladder by which the air between it and the surface of the water is compressed. The pressure caused the water to enter into the shell through the little hole, and the body of the fish becomes heavier and sinks to the bottom. As soon as the pressure is relinquished the water flows out of the shell, the fish resumes its natural weight and returns to the surface.

A Handkerchief Doll.

Here are some sketches of a dancing figure that can be made of a pocket handkerchief:

Figs. 1, 2, and 3 show how the head and hands are formed, the head by a knot in the middle and the hands by knots at the upper corners. Then the two untied corners are held in hands, and the handkerchief rapidly revolved to form Fig. 4.

The untied ends form the feet, and it will be easy for any one with a few minutes' practice to form the figure. It is made to dance by a thread from side to side of the room, as shown in Fig. 6.

A Little Thief.

Mrs. Plumb, across the alley, thinks her yellow cat, Buff, the most knowing cat in the world. I begin to think so, too.

I was sitting at my up-stairs window this morning when the milkman came and left milk in a bowl on the table on Mrs. Plumb's back porch.

Buff was sunning himself under the table, and never opened his eyes till the milkman was gone. Then, as quick as a wink, he hopped on the table and began lapping the milk, often stopping to look around at the window, as though he feared his mistress might see him.

Two or three times he seemed to think he heard her coming out, and he jumped down and curled himself under the table as if he were asleep. But no one came out, so he hopped up again.

He ate till he had enough, evidently, then he jumped down, washed himself, and lay down to sleep. Just then his mistress came out.

She looked sharply at the milk, as she took it up, and then at Buff. And would you believe it? That cat opened his eyes and began to stretch and yawn as though he had been asleep a week, then followed her into the house, moving to bed!

Later in the day, when my window was open, I heard Mrs. Plumb say to her husband:

"We must get a new milkman. He cheated us shamefully this morning." Buff was near by, and it seemed to me he looked as though he understood—but he said never a word. Wasn't it too bad?—Youth's Companion.

A Careless Doll.

Virginia Cleveland, I declare you're nothing but a constant care! Such habits I must try and cure! This time you'll get a scolding sure. Of course you're old enough to know (How many times I've told you so!) It's very wrong to run away. Besides, it wasn't nice to say That Maud and Ethel teased you too. For shame! A doll as big as you!

Dear me! this muddy stain, I guess, Will spoil your dotted muslin dress. I have to put it in the tub And wash, and wring, and scrub, and rub. Perhaps you weren't all to blame. But you were careless, just the same. I might have dropped you in the sand That time I heard the circus band; And Rover ran—he heard it, too—And possibly he stepped on you. Oh, if he did, why, then, you see, I was the careless one, maybe. To scold myself will never do; But then—too bad I scolded you!—Youth's Companion.

Printing Shops at Sea.

Very few persons outside the shipping business are aware that there are now more than a dozen ocean-going steamships with a printing department on board. They are fully equipped, and can turn out anything in the printing line, with the possible exception of a highly colored lithograph or a gilt-edge playing card. The City of Paris and the City of New York of the Inman line, the Teutonic and the Majestic of the White Star line, and a number of craft in the North German Lloyd fleet have a large space set aside for the use of the printers.

On every trip of the City of Paris a newspaper is printed at sea. It is newsy and breezy, and smells of Old Neptune as much as a South Sea whaler does. It is a four-page sheet of the color of old parchment, and everything of any note that occurs during the passage from port to port is faithfully recorded. The passengers and officers supply the "copy." Everything is contributed free. There are poems by women passengers, fairy tales of the sea, written by landsmen, and records of this or that concert held on board or incidents of the dinner table.

Turning out this newspaper is not the only thing that keeps the printing office of the Paris busy. An abstract of the ship's log has to be made, giving the dates, directions of wind, distances, and courses traveled, position of vessel by latitude and longitude at noon the end of each day, and the general remarks as to the condition of sky, air, and sea. Several thousand of these have to be prepared and delivered to the mail steambot on the arrival of the steamship at each port. As the mail boat always reaches the company's pier in advance of the printing department, the abstract of log is generally at the company's office down town, for newspaper reporters before the steamship reaches her dock. All this printing is free of charge to the passengers, the steamship company meeting the expense.

So popular has this printing shop become aboard ship that "plants" have been placed aboard other than regular liners. There is an A1 shop aboard the United States man-of-war Chicago, the flagship of the Squadron of Evolution. On a recent cruise of the White Squadron this "plant" was used in printing a sheet called the Chicago Bulletin, besides doing other official service for the officers of the fleet. Nine numbers were printed during the cruise, the last at Norfolk, Va., on May 23. In the publication were printed articles on "Hayti as a Nation," "Our Naval Cadets," "Is Jack a Grumbler?" "Our National Flag," and "Squadron Target Practice." The late Rear Admiral Geo. F. Preble, Rear Admiral Thomas H. Stevens and the late Commander W. F. Spicer also contributed three clever poems to the sheet. The officers and crew of the fleet say they could not get along without the Bulletin now.

ANCIENT LONDON.

What Lies Beneath the Pavements of the Modern City.

To form a true conception of the Roman city we must sweep away all the accumulated results of modern art and industry. We must create a tabula rasa, and remove, as the mere figments of fancy, the Cathedral, the Abbey, the Tower, the swarming throngs of Cheap-side, and the endless squares of brick buildings that shelter the millions of the London of to-day; dissolve the splendid vision, and think only of the past. Confined within the narrow limits of these walls, its greatest length the river-front, its greatest breadth between Cripplegate and the Thames, we see the Roman city. It is enclosed by a wall of stone-work and cement from twenty to thirty feet high. Towers or castella appear at intervals. It was built upon the plan of all other Roman cities, and resembled Pompeii or Lindum. Its four chief streets, at least forty feet wide, met in its forum; they were perfectly straight, and led directly to the gates. At their side were narrower limites, or lanes, all equally straight and free from sinuosities. The Roman engineers laid out their strata with unchanging regularity. Every street was paved with smooth stone, like those of Pompeii. Beneath the streets ran the sewers and the water-pipes—we may assume—so invariably found in every Roman city.

It is impossible to determine exactly the site of the London forum; it is only probable that there must have been one. We may, however, infer, from evidence too detailed and minute to enter upon here, that the forum stood upon the oldest part of Roman London, viz., south of Cornhill and east of the Mansion House. It is by no means certain that there was a forum. But an inscribed tile seems to show that the seat of government of the province was at London. Those, however, who consider the latter importance of Roman London can hardly believe that it had no public buildings. At first an insignificant town, although a port of some trade, for more than two centuries it controlled the exports and imports of the entire island. Its wharves were filled with animation, its harbor with ships of burden. All the authorities point to London as a center of commercial activity.

So complete was the security in which South Britain remained for centuries, under the protection of Hadrian's wall and the fortified cities of the west, that London was left without any other defense than a strong castle on the banks of the river until the age of Constantine. Unlike nearly all the other Roman cities, it had no walls, was unprotected even by a ditch, and lay open on all sides to attack. At last, however, at some unknown period, but between the years 350 and 360, by some unknown hand, the Roman wall was built. Its extent may easily be traced; fragments of it still remain; and recently, at an excavation made by the railway company, a party of antiquarians were enabled to study and explore more than 100 feet in length of these ancient defenses. Saxon and Dane, Norman and Englishman, have in the long course of fifteen centuries altered, overthrown, or rebuilt them; but their course and circuit were never changed. The Roman wall fixed the limit of the city, and its venerable fragments still recall the days when, the last Roman legions marched down the Dover street, when Alfred restored the wall, or when Pym and Hampden found within its shelter the citadel of modern freedom.—Harper's Magazine.

Spectacles.

'He period of putting on spectacles is often long deferred by middle-aged people, who "hate to seem old," or dislike confessing to themselves that they have reached one of the significant turning points of life. People have, however, different ways of accepting the inevitable. One charming woman, who has passed this visual limit, declares that her comfort is thereby daily increased.

"I was always so lazy!" she says. "Nevertheless, I had to do a thousand things I hated. Now when I go out for an afternoon, I can leave my glasses at home, and so, when I am asked to look at photographs, try a new crochet stitch, or read 'dear Mary Ann's last letter,' I can refuse with a clear conscience. And it is such a rest of mind and saving of tissue!"

Another woman, and a very pretty one, owns to a bit of tacit deception in wearing her cross.

"I try to put my glasses on with the air of having always worn them," she confesses. "I can't help hoping that people will think me near-sighted from childhood."

But a dear old gentleman, who can't see without glasses, actually goes to the length of declaring that he doesn't need them at all. He proves his case by standing at a distance from print, and reading it without difficulty.

"There's the matter with my eyes," he then explains, humorously. "The only trouble is, my arms aren't long enough!"—Youth's Companion.

Specks in the Eye.

Whenever a speck or splinter lodges in the eye never try to expel it by rubbing, as that simply irritates the eye, and drives the substance still farther into it. It is better to draw the upper lid over the lower, so that when returning to its place the lid slides over the lower eyelashes, which will sweep it clean, as it were. This process will, in the majority of the cases, suffice to remove the splinter or other foreign body; if not, the object may be gotten out with a strip of white paper or a camel's hair brush. Never, however, let any one use a hard instrument. If the case requires this it is most advisable to send for or go to a physician.

RAILROAD PROFITS.

By Congressman John Davis.

Having raised freights on the one side and suppressing wages on the other until the margin of profits is large, then comes the opportunity to swell "capitalization" by the sale of manufactured or forged stocks and bonds. These are known as "watered stocks." An agent of the company orders printed blank stock certificates and blank bonds. These blanks, which cost merely the price of printing, are then filled out with large amounts, signed and sold for cash in the market at the market price—at par, more or less. If sold at only 50 cents on the dollar, the transaction is bold robbery. A bit of paper costing the company only a cent may be sold for $50,000 (cash to the corporation). Then, after that sale, there will be $100,000 more "capitalization" for the public to pay interest or dividends upon. To meet this increased demand freights are crowded a little higher and employees are crushed a little lower, in order to provide for the obligations of the company! In this way the railroad burdens of the United States amounted in 1889 to $8,931,453,146. As the amount is increasing over half a billion annually, it is within the truth to call the present total burden ten billions. According to the best railroad authorities, one-half of this incomprehensible sum is fraud—watered stock! Five billions of water! If sold at par it brought enough money to pay five thousand new millionaires! At 4 per cent per annum the income is enough to make two hundred new millionaires each year from this watered capitalization, which represents no honest value.

The proposition that I make now is this: Let us cut down freights and fares on the railroads in the interest of the farmers; in the interest of all merchants and business men; in the interest of all the men, women and children in this land who eat victuals and wear clothes; also at the same time let us shorten the hours of railroad working-men until about 50 per cent more men are employed, and raise wages until about one hundred million dollars more money per annum shall go into their pockets than now finds its way there. I would do this shortening of hours and raising of wages, primarily, in the interest of the laboring men; secondary, in the interest of the farmers, making larger and better markets for farm products; and, thirdly, in the interest of all business men. I would then lower freights and fares, leaving more money in the channels of business, while, through increased sums paid to railroad employees, more money would be returned to the channels of business than the laboring men now have to spend on themselves and families. Is it not plain that this would make better times for all of us?

Do you ask who would suffer from this process? I reply that the millionaires of London and New York would collect less money on watered stock! What a hardship! I would provide for them less liberally! That is all! When a farm is water-logged the sensible farmer cuts a ditch to the nearest river and leaves the water to exercise its own option, to go or to stay. Our water-logged highways might be so managed by means of lower railroad charges to the public and better wages and terms to the men! Two hundred millions of money per annum saved is an item worth mentioning in any discussion. This leaves five billions of alleged bona fide capital in railroads in this country at 4 per cent per annum, with nothing for water, or 2 per cent on the whole ten billions, and the corporations can divide their income as they like. We should quit paying two hundred millions per annum on water! When the farmers, merchants, railroad men and the general public come to understand this subject as the people understood chattel slavery in the sixties, it is safe to say that we will quit turning our pockets inside out on the demand of public robbers!

JUST THE SAME HERE.

From the Journal of Knights of Labor.

The bacarat scandal has furnished food for thousands of vigorous articles in the American press in condemnation of English monarchy. It has been very justly pointed out that the Prince of Wales and his boon companions are the products of the monarchial system, under which an idle class are encouraged to imagine that the world was made for them, and that the rest of society only exists for the benefit of the privileged classes. American public opinion is practically a unit in condemning monarchy as a system which, by exalting one family above the rest of the community, and placing enormous wealth at their disposal while relieving them from the responsibilities attaching to ordinary citizens, furnishes them with every incentive to lead lives of uselessness, luxury and debauchery. The surprising part of the matter is that while every amateur moralizer and cross-roads journalist can see that the Prince of Wales' evil courses are due to a vicious system by which he is maintained in luxury on the labor of others, hardly any of these sapient critics, who are so keenly alive to the demerits of monarchial institutions as tending to foster vice and prodigality, can follow out the matter to its logical conclusion. The Prince of Wales is probably not a bit worse than the average man of wealth and leisure. "Society" in both Europe and America abounds in just such individuals, who, having ample means, no useful occupations, and a natural tendency toward vicious pursuits, spend their lives in the pursuit of pleasure and devote their days and nights to eating and drinking, gambling and debauchery. Obviously, if the vices of the Prince of Wales are chargeable against the monarchial system, the equally reprehensible habits of the "Four Hundred" of New York, the "pleasant vices" of the men and women of the privileged classes everywhere are equally due to the social system which enables some to live on the labor of others. It becomes Americans to throw stones at Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, and his dissolute companions of the British aristocracy, while they at the same time uphold a system which in every large city is rearing by the thousand men and women who imitate the vices of European courts, and who, if they are not called princes, lords or ladies, enjoy practically the same privileges of living simply to enjoy themselves as parasites upon industry.

THE FIRST BUSINESS.

By R. T. Van Horn.

Have you ever stopped to think what the leading business of this country—of the world—is? It will sound strange to some, but it is true, nevertheless, that the first business of civilization, the ruling business, is money lending. It was not so once, but it is now. Men carry on business to earn money to pay interest with. When interest is 4, 5 and 6 per cent they can do business; when it is 10 to 20 they can't make a living at anything.

For a period of seven to ten or twelve years money-lenders let their goods—cash—at the lower rates, and the people of the country build up wealth and increase the value and forms of property. Then some Baring firm makes a scare, loans are called in, interest runs up, men can't meet their paper, securities must be sacrificed, mortgages foreclosed, and the accumulated profits of those years swept into the hands of the men who loaned the money.

That is the short way of saying it, and it is possible because our laws make the money lenders' interest paramount. Let us see. The state of Missouri and the state of Kansas issue bonds bearing interest payable semi-annually. So do the counties, the townships, the cities and the towns. Then there are school bonds, court house bonds and all sorts of bonds. Next, corporations, for manufacturing and all sorts of enterprises—even to run newspapers—issue bonds. And all these have first to pay interest and the law makes the claim paramount. It even sends county judges to jail for refusing to levy a tax, though the men never did a wrong act in their lives.

Does not all this prove what we say—that the first business of civilization is money-lending? What is the effect? That the profits of labor, the first fruits of all business, go into the hands of the money-owner, and what is over to the man who makes the money. It is, under this system, only a question of percentage and time when this class of men own the other class. So perfectly has this transformation taken place that even reformers propose a system of loans as a remedy. There is only one remedy—the state, society, must loan the money to the individual instead of borrowing from him. If the whole duty of human government is to pay interest, what is the use of having any rulers but the lenders? Alexander is emperor of Russia, William of Germany, Francis Joseph of Austria, etc., but Rothschild, Hirsch, and their like are emperors over them. Albert Edward, playing bacarat, is heir to the throne of England, but the men he owes his millions to are kings over him—the Bank of England rules the British empire.

The struggle to rid the industry, the trade, and even the currency of the world from the vassalage to the usurer is the one master issue of modern civilization. If we in America want to save ourselves we must change the system.

THE MIDDLEMAN.

From the San Francisco Plowshare and Pruning-Hook.

He is everywhere, in every branch of industry. But where he does his slickest work is in the legitimate lines of business; here he reaps a harvest. On the stock or wheat exchange he looms up as the consummate rascal and deprecator. If anyone gets "squeezed," you may be sure it will be the customer, seldom the middle man. In this phase of his life he is more slippery than the eel. His mission is to shear, not to be shorn. In the real estate business he reaps a handsome profit by vibrating between the buyer and seller. He makes the liveliest pendulum that the world has ever seen, and is such a swingeing liar that he often makes more out of a bargain than do either of the contracting parties. He is a cold calculator. He will insure your life and beat the insurance company or boat you; it makes no difference to him so long as he gets the money. There isn't a character in the world who has such an eye to business as the middle man. In the produce business if he can't get a fair profit on consigned goods, why, without the least hesitancy he will dump them into the bay, advise the consignor that the market is glutted and the goods have spoiled, and laugh when told that the produce would have fed many poor families. What does he care for poor families?

Now what are we going to do with this fellow; this blood-sucker; this vampire; this rogue? He is simply imposing on ignorance and good nature. He isn't necessary to the community. He never produced anything in his life, but is like the English sparrow imported into this country, which spends its time in fighting with its kind and picking the seed sown for the harvest. Let us get rid of the pest! Discard him! Snub him! Kick him out! Starve him awhile if that were possible! But get rid of him anyhow, for he clogs the wheels of commerce, which must be adjusted upon an equitable basis by bringing the producer and the consumer face to face. The middle man is a "back number;" his scalp is due.

WOULD BE ALL RIGHT.

From the American Farm News.

Here it is again: "If the farmers would stick to their work and let politics alone, they would be all right. A good crop or two will put them in better humor." Commenting on this, the Farm, Field and Stockman says: "The man who uttered that sapient opinion belongs to a race who never till the soil and very rarely engage in any productive industry. He was traveling salesman for a wholesale whisky house. That is the kind of beings who impudently assume to look after the interests of farmers better than they can look after their own. Farmers are about done with having their industries guided and rewarded by men who were never industrious; with trusting public morals to men who never had morals, with allowing labor to beg while laziness grows fat and impudent; with paying taxes on all their homes and food and clothing, while arrogance and intrigue have free gifts thrust into their pockets by corrupt legislation." It is but a matter of history that when the farmer paid no attention to industrial agitation, but worked from early morn till late at night, day after day, and year after year, he seldom found the time when he was "all right."

HAVE SCANNED THE HORIZON.

From the Pendleton, Oregon Alliance Herald.

The farmers of the country "feed all," not only the home population but the surplus product of the farms of America is the principal item of our foreign commerce. Rates of transportation are so high that as a rule profits are comparatively nothing, and with scarcity of money, exorbitant interests on their investments in farms and implements, bankruptcy and ruin are, in many cases, staring them in the face, even in prosperous Oregon. This grievance, as is shown by state and national statistics, is not trumped up, is not a vagary, but a grim fact, and farmers have organized for the purpose of finding a remedy. They have scanned the political horizon from north to south, from east to west, and athwart the rolling seas, and have discerned plainly emblazoned on the dial-plate, in figures of haughty men, many evils that must be set aright.

THE YIELD AND PRICE OF GRAIN.

From the Farm and Fireside.

From the report of the secretary of agriculture for 1890 we take the following statistics: In 1890 the production of corn was 1,489,070,000 bushels, from 71,970,763 acres. The total value of the crop was $754,433,451. The average value per bushel was 50.6 cents; the average yield per acre was 20.7 bushels, and the average value per acre $10.53. For the past eleven years the average yield per acre was 23.8 bushels, and the average value per acre $9.58. Did it pay? No.

For the past eleven years the average yield per acre of wheat was twelve bushels and the average value per acre $9.91. Did the average wheat crop pay? Count up the cost of production and see if you can make it less than $10 per acre.

For the past eleven years the average yield per acre of oats was 25.8 bushels, and the average value per acre was $8.24. Did it pay?

It is safe to say that no profit is made in raising the average crop of corn, wheat or oats. What, then, can be said about the crops that run below the average? In order to make the average half the crop grown must fall below it. A crop of wheat, corn or oats less than the average is certainly produced at a loss. It was a loss of labor or money, or both. The aggregate value of the corn, wheat and oats crops for the past eleven years is nearly $1,230,000,000. Think of over $600,000,000 of business being done at a loss. No other business in the world besides farming would stand the strain so long. The fact is, farming cannot stand it. Is it any wonder that farmers complain of hard times? Is it any wonder that farm-mortgage indebtedness is steadily increasing?

GROWING EVERYWHERE.

Now and then a great partisan newspaper prints an "interview" with some man in public life, and a prominent feature of every such interview which appears nowadays is an opinion on the alliance. It seems that these "public" men keenly relish every opportunity they can get to announce that the alliance is "waning," or "dying out," and the partisan papers take no less delight in spreading these opinions broadcast throughout the land.

The alliance is losing ground nowhere and is growing almost everywhere.

First—That in view of the great social, industrial and economical revolution now advancing upon the civilized world, and the living issues confronting the American people, we believe that the time has arrived for a crystallization of the political reform forces of our country and the reformation of what should be known as the people's party of the United States of America.

Second—That we most heartily endorse the demands of the platform as adopted at St. Louis, Mo., in 1893, Omaha, Pa., in 1893, and Omaha, Neb., in 1891, by the industrial organizations there represented, summarized as follows:

(A)—The right to make and issue money as a sovereign power to be maintained by the people for the common benefit, hence we demand the abolition of national banks as banks of issue, and as a substitute for national bank notes we demand that legal tender treasury notes be issued in sufficient volume to transact the business of the country on a cash basis without damage or special advantage to any class or calling, such notes to be legal tender in payment of all debts, public or private, and such notes, when demanded by the people, shall be loaned to them at not more than 2 per cent per annum upon imperishable products, as land or income.

(C)—We demand the passage of laws prohibiting alien ownership of land, and that congress take prompt action to devise some plan to obtain title upon land owned by alien and foreign syndicates, and that all land held by railroads and other corporations in excess of such as actually used and needed for their business be sold to the government and held for actual settlers only.

(D)—Believing in the doctrine of equal rights to all and special privilege to none, we demand that taxation, national, state or municipal, shall not be used to build up one interest or class at the expense of another.

(E)—We demand that all revenues, national, state or county, shall be according to the necessary expenses of the government, economically and honestly distributed.

(F)—We demand a just and equitable system of graduated tax on income.

(G)—We demand the most rigid, honest and just national control and supervision of the means of public communication and transportation, and if this control and supervision does not remove the abuses now existing, we demand the government ownership of such means of communication and transportation.

(H)—We demand the election of president, vice president and United States senators by direct vote of the people.

Third—That we urge united action of all progressive organizations in attending the conference called for February 22, 1892, by six of the leading reform organizations.

Fourth—That a national central committee be appointed by this conference to prepare a platform and to be elected by this body, and of three members from each state represented, to be named by each state delegation.

Fifth—That this central committee shall represent this body, attend the national conference on February 22, 1892, and, if possible, unite with that and all other reform organizations there assembled. If no satisfactory arrangements can be effected this committee shall call a national convention not later than June 1, 1892, for the purpose of nominating candidates for president and vice president.

Sixth—That the members of the central committee for each state, where there is no independent political organization, conduct an active system of political agitation in their respective states.

A BEAR-BACK RIDE.

The Entertaining Adventure of a Beaver Trapper in Alabama.

"Beaver Jack" Smith, the hunter and trapper, who roams all over Georgia and Alabama trapping beaver and otter, had an exciting adventure with a big black bear not long ago, says a Birmingham (Ala.) correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. Smith had his traps set along the banks of the Tallapoosa River, in Randolph County, and had been catching a number of fine, fat beaver. One morning he went to one of his traps, which was a mile down the river from his camp, and was surprised to find that he had caught a bear instead of beaver. He was just in time, as the bear had pulled the light steel trap from its fastenings and was making off with the trap hanging to his foot with a grip he could not shake off. Smith had left his gun at the camp, and, seeing that the bear was in an ugly humor and disposed to show fight, his first impulse was to let go. But it would carry off his steel-traps, and steel-traps cost money. Then Jack suddenly remembered that a strolling showman who was in the neighborhood had offered him $50 for a live bear. This decided him; he would capture the bear alive and secure the money. Smith decided the safest and best plan to capture the animal would be to get hold of one end of the steel-trap chain and fasten it securely to a tree. This would hold him until he could go and get help enough to tie him. The bear was walking off down the bank of the river, occasionally turning to snap and growl at the steel-trap that held one hind foot in a viselike grip. Smith ran up and secured the end of the chain without trouble, but as he stopped to fasten it to a tree the fun commenced. The bear, with a savage growl, turned and made a rush for him. He dodged behind the tree just in time to save himself from an embrace that would have been fatal. In a moment the bear had turned and was after him again, and then began a race around the tree, Smith all the time holding on to the chain. Finally they got away from the tree and nearer the bank of the river. Smith caught his foot under a vine and fell. He rose quickly, the bear stumbled, and then some way, Smith says he will never know just how it happened, he found himself astride the animal's back. He still held to the chain. Bruin tried to shake off his rider, but getting a firm hold on the long hair of the beast Smith held on. A new idea suddenly entered the head of the bear, and with another growl he plunged into the river. Still the now thoroughly frightened hunter held on, and the bear, with only his nose above water, struck out for the opposite bank of the river. He swam about 100 feet from the bank, and then, seeming to realize that he was handicapped by the weight on his back, he turned and went back. As the bear struggled up the muddy bank Smith leaped off, and wrapping the end of the chain attached to the steel-trap around a small tree he fastened it, and then he had bruin a captive. He lost no time in going after help, but when he returned in an hour the bear was gone. The animal had pulled its captive foot out of the trap. A quantity of skin and flesh had been pulled of the bear's leg, but it was loose and gone. Smith did not attempt to find the animal again. He says bear-hunting is not his occupation.

How He Broke the News.

You say that I'm pale and flustered, and shivering in my shoes; I'll be hanged if you wouldn't shiver if you had to "break the news." I suppose you have heard how Quimby is stretched on a bunk down there, with a pint or more of his own blue blood mixed up with his Auburn hair? Well, they made me a joint committee to go to his house and tell his wife all about the scrimmage and what to her man betel. I went to the house up yonder, not maddled on the job, you bet, and my classic and blue-veined forehead was bathed in a quart of sweat. The woman was in the kitchen, a-singing a plaintive song, but she dried up when she saw me, for she knew there was something wrong. Then I coughed and I hemmed and stammered, and "madam," said I, "be brave! your husband is now a-lying—"

"Oh, Lord! what a shriek she gave! And she walked up and down a-groaning and wringing her furrowed hands, and her hair fell down like sea-weed adrift by the ocean sands. "Oh Heaven," she cried, "my husband! They've taken my love from me," and the way that she reeled and staggered was a sight for a man to see; "so brave, so kind and so noble! So loving, so grand and strong, and now must I wait his coming in vain all the dark day long? And his children will wall in sorrow, and never again in glee troop down in the misty twilight and cluster about his knee." And so she went on raving; her screams for a block were heard; and I like a graven image stood there, without saying a word. It seemed like my tongue was frozen or glued to my pearly teeth, and hardly a breath came upward from the paralyzed lungs beneath. But I braced up all of a sudden, and "madam," said I again, "I am sorry—I'm deneed sorry—to have caused you this needless pain; let up on your frenzied screaming; you don't need to weep and wail; your old man ain't dead by a long shot; he's only locked up in jail." She glared at me for a minute—for a minute or two, and then she said: "So the darned old loafer is down there in jail again?" Then she picked up a tub and smashed it all over my princely head, and I saw she was getting ready to paint the whole landscape red. So I skipped through the gate and moseyed so fast that I tore my shoes; and they don't make me a committee in the future to break the news.—Lincoln Journal.

PRETTY FANCY WORK.

Design Suitable for Center or Corner of a Toilet Cushion.

Fig. 1 is a design suitable for center or one corner of a lovely toilet cushion. Select a square of satin of a cream or pearly tint. Color the design in pale blue Paris tinting; work with veining stitches in blue silk and outline the whole with Japanese gilt thread. The cushion can be edged with a silken cord of blue, or white with some of the Japanese gilt thread twisted around it. A pompon on one or more of the corners gives a pleasant effect, or a bow of satin ribbon may take the place of the pompons, and a full jabot of oriental lace around the edges will look as well as the cords.

Lamp shades will add to a room's attractiveness. A charming one is made of fine white lace over a rose-colored lining. It is gathered at the top so as to leave a heading of lace. Sprays of white and pink tissue paper flowers are arranged to fall like a fringe from the top, where a wreath hides the gathers in the lace. Another very pretty shade has two rows of lace sewed one above the other over a yellow lining, and yellow ribbon, which hides the shirring below the heading, is tied in a pretty bow. These may be made over ordinary wire frames, such as are made for the purpose, or they can be thrown over a common shade and produce a very neat effect.—Ohio Farmer.

VEGETABLE FATS.

Why They Are Healthier and More Nutritious Than Animal Fats.

It is a physiological fact that a certain amount of fat is necessary for the proper nutrition of the body. Fat is derived from the carbonaceous elements contained in sugar, starch and grains. The digestive process is carried on better with the aid of a little fatty matter. But it is not necessary to go to the animal kingdom for this, and it is a fact that vegetable oils are more easily digested than animal fats. They do not become rancid so easily. Rancid fat is exceedingly poisonous. Nuts furnish an excellent natural oil and it is a mistake to suppose that they are difficult of digestion. The reason for the prevalent idea that nuts are hard to digest is that they are taken at improper hours and are not thoroughly masticated, often being swallowed in chunks. But if taken with a bit of bread or hard cracker, the firm, fleshy substance of the nut can be so finely divided that it will not be retained unduly in the stomach, but will pass along to the duodenum where, by the action of the bile, the fatty substances contained will be digested and fitted to be passed along further in the alimentary tract.

Corn meal contains the largest percentage of fats of any of the grains. Peas, beans and lentils also contain forms of vegetable oil and are very nutritious, wholesome foods. Going into the animal kingdom, the yolk of the egg is very rich in oil, being thirty per cent. of its substance.—Extract from a lecture by Dr. J. H. Kellogg, of Battle Creek Sanitarium.

CARVED FURNITURE.

Elegant Chairs for Parlors, Reception Rooms and Libraries.

The carved walnut furniture which comes from Venice is especially attractive to curio hunters. The massive hall chair illustrated is an example of the criss-cross style of seat known as a "Savonarola chair." The austere style of the chair in this instance has been relieved by ornate carvings in renaissance style. The armrests, mounted on the back, on either side, are in pure Italian fashion, though they hardly seem in keeping with this severe style, looking better suited to a lady's boudoir chair, and lions' or boars' heads are often substituted. The mask of Pan is a grotesque carving frequently used in Venetian carvings, where heathen mythology and churchy figures are sometimes mingled in an odd sort of jumble. One meets the figures of all the heathen deities in these carvings, in close associa-

Waiting for the harvest in eighteen ninety-two,
We will come rejoicing, bringing in the sheafs.

CHORUS—

Bringing in the sheafs in eighteen ninety-two,
We shall come rejoicing, bringing in the sheafs.
Bringing in the sheafs in eighteen ninety-two,
We shall come rejoicing, bringing in the sheafs.

Sowing in the sunshine, sowing in the shadow;
Fearing neither parties, demanding equal rights.
The harvest is surely coming when labor gets its dues,
We shall come rejoicing, bringing in the sheafs.

CHORUS—

Going forth a sowing for the people's cause;
Singing hallelujah when we make the laws.
Then we will be welcome, the farmer's wife and all.

How to Clean Dark Wood.

Any sort of dark wood may be freed from all traces of dirt and grease by a good sponging of strong tea, just warm; it will not, however, answer for light, unpainted furniture, as it would stain it.

MARRIED WOMEN'S CONTRACTS.

What the Law of the Different States of the Union Is Regarding This Matter.

There are few if any states where the common law rule now prevails in its old time severity concerning married women's contracts, but in some the right of wives to contract is much more restricted than in others. In many states married women may now make all kinds of contracts with nearly or quite the same degree of responsibility that a married man or a single woman may do. There are slight restrictions on these powers in some of the states I shall name, but space will not allow of my going into minute particulars here. These states are Alabama, Arizona Territory, California, Colorado, both Dakotas, District of Columbia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Utah Territory, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia and Wyoming.

In a limited number of states husband and wife may make valid contracts with each other, namely, in Alabama, California, Colorado, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan (in cases where equity would sustain them), Mississippi, Nevada, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, South Carolina, Washington and Wisconsin. In other states such contracts are not legal or binding. Thus in Massachusetts, although a wife may make any contract of any kind and with any person—that her husband may, a contract or conveyance of any kind directly between husband and wife is absolutely invalid and can not be made binding, and if a promissory note be given by one of a married pair to the other, it is utterly void and can not be collected from the maker of the note or from his or her estate.—Lelia R. Sawtelle, L. L. D., in Chautauquan.

Author and Educator.

Mrs. H. B. Goodwin, author of "The Winged Series" and of "Dorothy Gray," is a native of Maine, but has been a resident of Boston for many years. She is the daughter of the late Benjamin B. and Elizabeth Lowell Bradbury. Her school life was spent mainly in Farmington academy under the tuition of Alexander H. Abbott. Before her marriage she had written many short stories and sketches, which were published in magazines and papers over her initials, H. E. The kind and judicious criticism and commendation of her teacher, Prof. Abbott, first stimulated her ambition to be known as a writer, but her pen was mainly inspired by her desire to assist in educating young women. For the last fifteen years Mrs. Goodwin has been intimately associated with Wellesley college. She is an active member of its board of trustees and of its executive committee, and has also written and read to the students of Wellesley many essays upon art. The studies for these essays were made in the great art centers of Europe.—Chicago Post.

IN WOMAN'S BEHALF.

HOW THEY DRESS.

Tastes of Some Literary Women in the Matter of Apparel.

Mrs. Ella Dietz Clymer, ex-president of Sorosis, is always becoming and tastefully dressed. She is fond of the delicate shades of mauve, heliotrope and gray, which harmonize beautifully with the sea-shell tints of her complexion and with her blond hair. Mrs. Clymer's bonnets are dainty, small and close fitting.

Mrs. Lizzie Champney dresses very plainly, and with a studied negligence, almost always wearing black or some dark color. Marion Harland is also a very plain dresser, appearing usually in black cloth or silk costumes.

Fannie Aymer Mathews, a vivacious and sparkling brunette, is addicted to browns and grays, her street costume for the winter having been a rough brown cloth bordered with fur, and her reception costume of an exquisite pearl-gray tint, bordered with gray fur, and with a long mantle of gray, fur-lined to match.

Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox is an eccentric dresser. She chooses the Josephine, Recamier, and Kate Greenaway costume, always wearing a loose, clinging gown indoors. Many of her gowns are made of white satin, with Watteau backs and puffed sleeves. She wears little jewelry, but possesses a historic bangle, which has a romantic history. It was given her by her husband, and each coin marks a stage in their courtship. Mrs. Wilcox is greatly addicted to gray.

Miss Elita Proctor Otis is a stunning-looking woman, whose toilets are always conspicuous. Entire costumes of bright scarlet, pink, and white are her delight, and her favorite street dress last summer was a gown of lurid tartan silk.

Grace Greenwood wears black and gray, and on state occasions is quite the dowager, in black velvet and point lace.

Kate Field, who runs over so often from Washington that she can be classed among New York literary women, imports many of her costumes, and yet at the same time is an encourager of home manufactures. Her gowns are picturesque and unique, decidedly unlike any other woman's.

Dolores Marburgh favors the Josephine and Recamier style of dressing, and is said to make a very pretty picture in one of these loose gowns, coiled upon a rug in front of an open fire, which is her favorite position. At the Authors' club she wore a gray satin Josephine gown with immense puffed sleeves.

Mrs. Croly is a very plain dresser, usually wearing black.

Gertrude Atherton is devoted to all shades of green, both for gowns and room furnishings, and very becoming it is to her ivory tinted skin, amber hair, and beryl-green eyes. For the street the lady dresses most severely in dark colors.—N. Y. World.

INITIAL LETTERS.

A Leaf-Scroll Design Which Produces Very Pretty Effects.

Embroidered initials, though always liked, have never been more popular than at present. For bed and table linen there are many designs shown, but none of them are as large as those used for the purpose a few years ago. But if one desires a larger initial for marking fancy articles with heavy silk, floss or wool, the model, or any other letter or design, may be enlarged to any size as follows:

Copy the design on paper, inclose it in four straight lines (a parallelogram),

and rule it off with a pencil into small even squares; then, in the same proportion, draw another parallelogram large enough to inclose a letter of the desired size, mark it off into just as many squares as the first one; in each square lightly copy the portion of the letter inclosed in the corresponding square of the small parallelogram. Very little practice is required; one can hardly go wrong in so small a space. When the enlarged copy is drawn in every square go over the whole letter more heavily and smoothly with the pencil, and when perfect go over it again with pen and ink, and afterward erase all the pencil marks.

Designs may be decreased in size just as easily by reversing the operation just described.—American Agriculturist.

HOMEMADE SALVES.

Some That Are Better Than Those Usually Sold by Druggists.

There are a great many excellent salves which are prepared at home and are far better than anything to be found at the ordinary druggists, for chapped hands, sunburn or any simple roughness of the skin. A lettuce cream is one of the most efficacious of these. The healing effects of lettuce are well commended. Chop enough young tender lettuce to fill two cups; add it to a cup of melted mutton tallow. Let the lettuce cook in the mutton tallow for about ten minutes; then strain the cream through a cheesecloth strainer into a clean earthen bowl. A little essence of violet may be added for perfume if you wish.

A camphor ice is one of the best preparations for chapped hands. Take three drachms of camphor gum, three drachms of white beeswax, three drachms of spermaceti and two ounces of olive oil. Put them in a cup on the stove where they will melt slowly and form a white ointment. If the hands are very severely chapped, it may be necessary to anoint them with this preparation and put on a pair of soft kid gloves. Cut out the palms and the finger tips of the gloves, however, to allow ventilation. The practice of sleeping in gloves to whiten the hands is now said by the best authorities to injure the hands, causing them to wrinkle very soon and take on the look of old age before they should, because of the want of ventilation.—N. Y. Tribune.

MISS GENEVA ARMSTRONG, a young lady who owns a farm in Western New York, has invented a machine for feeding cattle on trains. She recently addressed a meeting of railroad men, before whom she had placed the invention. It is patented, and she hopes to have it adopted for use during the transportation of live stock.

Civil engineering is the only profession in which women have not as yet figured conspicuously, but it is known that for some years the sisters of J. Edgar Thomson, the railroad magnate, have worked with their brother in the father's office at civil engineering. And in the office of the surveyor-general at Denver women are employed, and have, with the exception of the heads of two departments, filled as high places as any of the employees of the office.

[FOR FARMER'S WIFE.]

ONLY.

BY MRS. N. S. NUTT.

Only a care-worn woman,
With hair thickly sprinkled with gray;
Bearing ever life's burden,
Calmly, from day to day.

Only a heart of sorrow,
Hidden within the breast,
Quietly waiting Death's summons
To lead it to peaceful rest.

Only a pitiful yearning
For a return of the love it has given;
Proving each day life's lesson,—
True love liveth only in heaven.

Only a nameless sorrow,
Only a vague unrest;
Only unsatisfied longings,
And wishes never expressed.

The world passes by unheeding;
The heart bears its sorrow alone;
Only a grave in the church-yard,
With rest found beneath its stone.

[FOR FARMER'S WIFE.]

MY BOY.

BY MRS. FANNIE MCCORMICK.

My boy has quite outgrown his crib,
And sleeps in a room by himself;
But I miss the crib and the curly head,
And the playful little elf.

No lark ere rose at peep of day
More punctual than the boy;
And his ringing laugh, so clear and sweet,
Filled all our hearts with joy.

Twelve years have come on the baby's head,
And now he's quite a boy;
And still he is as in years gone by,
His parents' pride and joy.

Each night before I close my eyes,
I go with lamp in hand,
And gaze on the boy so sound asleep,
Smiling sweetly in his dreams.

Once something whispered as I thus stood Faintly gazing at my boy,
"Why he always be thus pure and good,
Like gold without alloy."

"The drunkard once had a pure, sweet face,
And the felon in his cell
Can tell of a mother's love till death—
Of a mother's tears which fell."

Ah! methinks the world is full of sin
And temptations all the way;
God pity the mother whose darling boy
Tempted, has been led astray.

Let Women Study Politics.

BY MRS. MARY A. LIVERMORE.

The intelligent women of the middle class in England—the class with which Americans are chiefly brought in contact—take a very lively interest in politics, know what are the public questions of the day, and are accurately informed concerning them. They are ready with a defense of Gladstone's course in dealing with the Irish question, or if they think it defective, they will tell you where and why. Since church and state are one in England, they are versed in the affairs of the English church, even when they are non-conformists. They are familiar with colonial affairs, and have an opinion of their own concerning the wisdom or unwisdom, justice or injustice, of English management in India. And all the while they are never unwomanly, and one is held entranced by the charm of their intelligent speech.

It is surprising that the great body of American women can rest contented in utter ignorance of the affairs of their country. Women are already voting in more than a dozen States on school matters, and it is only a matter of time when they will be invested with full suffrage. And if women were never to vote in America, they will always be the mothers of voters. For mothers to abjectly renounce all hold upon their sons when they arrive at the voting age, and to scornfully refuse to acquire the information that would enable them wisely to advise them at critical periods, is to win the contempt of the young men. For women to be indifferent and ignorant when their own affairs are the subject of legislation, and laws are being formulated concerning their property and their children, their advice in the matter not asked, nor their approval sought, is to justify the category in which women are frequently mentioned—"women, children and idiots."

But the women are learning to keep step with men in scientific pursuits, in knowledge of arts, and a study of social problems. And this is a stimulant for them to go farther. If the partial education of women has been productive of such good results, what may not be anticipated when women share with men every incentive to noble achievement, every opportunity for growth, with the right to debate and act with them on the great matters that have a bearing on the future of the nation?

Rev. Dr. Mark Hopkins, the beloved and venerable president of Williams College, Massachusetts, in 1875 wrote as follows: "I would at this point correct my teaching in 'The Law of Love' to the effect that home is peculiarly the sphere of woman and civil government that of man. I now regard the home as the joint sphere of man and woman, and the sphere of civil government more of an open question between the two." A concession of this kind from so eminent an authority as Dr. Hopkins indicates a great change of public opinion. It shows which way the changing current is setting. "I go for all sharing the privileges of the government who assist in bearing its burdens," said Abraham Lincoln, "by no means excluding women."

A host of men and women content themselves with the utterances of this belief. But another host—mighty when estimated by the largeness of their moral purpose, their intellectual strength, and their tenacious persistence—move steadily forward towards the practical realization of this doctrine.

To fall into the rear of this onward-marching column is unworthy of intelligent women, whose native land, with all its imperfections, is the noblest, the most humane, and the most just the world has ever seen. Especially is it unworthy the women of the W. C. T. U., who have seen their idols of seeming fine gold deteriorate to filthy clay under the debasing influence of the dram-shop, and the unwary feet of their young sons caught in its nets. For the dram-shop is the creature of legislation, and is protected by law, the ballots of the great parties upholding it as firmly as though they were bullets and bayonets.

To work for the anti-saloon movement is well. To work for prohibition is better. But to work for the extension of the suffrage to women, that will give them the right to vote on all questions relating to the dram-shops, is best of all. For that will bring the anti-saloon movement to a successful issue. It will make prohibition an accomplished fact. It will not only sound the knell of the dram-shop, but of the mighty liquor traffic that now dominates the nation as never did the deceased slaveocracy in its palmy days.

[FOR FARMER'S WIFE.]

The Cook-Stove and Wash-Tub.

BY MRS. D. A. OTIS.

Both are essential to the life and comfort of every human being, but they form a combination that makes a slave of the majority of the farmers' wives, and sends many of them to a premature grave. A combination that deprives her of time for intellectual improvement, thereby dwarfing the intellect and lessening her opportunities to exert influence for good in the community in which she resides, her ability in the home; and as intellectual development is necessary to the fullest measure of happiness in old age, she is deprived of that peaceful contentment in her latter days to which she is entitled after a life of activity. A combination that makes farmers' wives prematurely old, and sears instead of the joyous queen of the household, the able counselor and companion of her husband and the guiding genius of the present happiness and future destiny of her children.

When we are confronted by the hard times of the present day and the difficulty to secure indoor help on the farm, there seems to be no alternative but that the farmer's wife must perform the necessary labor to give her own family, as well as the hired men, that healthful and nourishing food necessary to life. And to this must be added the strength to give the family clean wearing apparel, and these augmented by the cares of motherhood and house-keeping, and social duties with an occasional visit from a city cousin, accustomed to be waited on by servants, but desirous of a rest in the country through the heat of summer.

This routine continued for a few years will surely furnish the inevitable piece of humanity, composed chiefly of nerves, with an indefinite hope of rest sometime in the future, and perhaps pride enough left to carry a cheerful face for the casual observer.

This is more than any American woman is able to accomplish; and we are not surprised that the wife of one of Shawnee County's most successful farmers should say that "I feel that I am about worn out," and her looks certify to the truthfulness of her remark; and this at a time when her children need her companionship, council and encouragement.

We are sometimes led to think that the reasoning was good of a young man with whom we were once acquainted, who said when criticised by friends for marrying an Irish girl, that it was easier to marry one than to hire one, as he would have to do if he married an American girl.

In this age of steam and electricity, it would be well for us to halt and consider the structure of the society in which we live, and glance back to the time of our grandparents and see the progress that has been made in the last fifty years, and from it obtain a glimpse of the future.

We live for the coming generation. Our highest ambition is to provide for our children, that they may develop into full manhood and womanhood, physically, mentally and morally. We believe that this will be accomplished when we can so organize society that every able-bodied person can labor one-third of the time, rest one-third, and spend the remaining third in study and recreation. This may seem an idle dream to the woman who has been laboring eighteen hours each day in the farm house; but times are fast changing: inventive genius is coming to the front more and more each year; scientists are studying how to make death easy for criminals; the thoughtful and progressive men and women of the present day are studying how to reach a state of society so as to produce fewer criminals and make life more desirable and lessen the number of suicides.

For many generations we have been developing avice, and to-day we are reaping the seed we have sown; and the harvest is an increased number of inmates of the penitentiaries, reform schools and insane asylums, and we are spending the money that ought to be used in developing the good of mankind in restraining the wicked.

Co-operation in caring for the criminals and the unfortunate of our race is being successfully practiced, which proves that it can be done for the balance of mankind. We believe that electricity will, eventually, assist us to reach the co-operative laundry and kitchen: who dares to say what can't be done? If some thoughtful, progressive person had suggested to our grandparents what is being done to-day with electricity, they would have been denounced as a crank, fanatic, insane and unworthy to associate with respectable people. Who dares to attempt to prophesy what may be accomplished in the future? But we will venture to make the assertion that the time is coming when the farmer's wife will no longer preside at her table with the tired, scalded face obtained over the cook-stove and wash-tub, and that statistics will cease to tell us that the greatest per cent. of the inmates of the insane asylums are from the farmers' wives; and future generations will reap the benefits of better mothers and have less household slaves.

The mother of the coming time will be able to give to her children what she can not do while the present conditions of society exists, but is what they most need: that is, more of her time.

A Kansas Farm.

BY MRS. FANNIE MCCORMICK.

John Thompson arrived at home about 6 o'clock. Mary saw him coming afar off, as it were, and meeting him with a cheerful face, took a seat beside him and began a recital of the experiences of the day. At the supper table she continued the information that church services would be held in a school house only five miles away, on the following Sunday; also that Mrs. Green had told her that the neighbors living three miles west of them were a young couple from the State of New York; that the wife was a frail, delicate creature, who had been reared tenderly in an elegant home, was very homesick in a sod house, and Mary expressed a determination to visit her on the morrow.

Soon after daylight breakfast was over and John was in the field turning over wide furrows of prairie sod. Next day an additional team was worked, then several neighbors came to exchange work a few days, and soon three hundred acres of the section had been broken up.

John and Mary were an industrious couple. They devoted all the spare moments to some improvement of the premises. It is simply surprising how much can be accomplished toward giving one's surroundings the appearance of thrift and neatness without much expenditure of money. Here a little and there a little at odd times will transform the most barren and uncouth premise into a comfortable looking home. They set out an abundance of trees. If the choicest grafted fruit could not be obtained, they utilized such as they had at hand, and set out long rows of forest trees, planted walnuts, chestnuts and acorns, by no means neglecting the quick-growing cottonwood. By such methods, the wild prairie will soon put on the appearance of an eastern home.

The year 1876 was one of beautiful harvest. Kansas is a wheat growing State. Much has been written about this, but the half has never been told. Without fencing, the land is plowed, the wheat drilled in and left to take care of itself until harvest time. Five hundred or a thousand acres in one field is not an uncommon sight, while many fields are much larger.

At a conference of millers held at Newton, a short time ago, some English millers are reported to have said that the quality of wheat grown in the central counties of Kansas produced the finest flour in the world.

With the beginning of harvest comes the hardest time of the whole year for women folks on the farm. When the heads of wheat begin to turn brown, the housewives bestir themselves to lay in large stores of supplies to cook for harvest hands, and to try to secure help in the kitchen during the busy season.

Improved machinery for reaping grain lessens the number of hands required for harvesting, and the steam thresher increases the amount required at threshing time, but compensates somewhat by shortening the time of their stay. Threshers are looked upon as a sort of plague, or necessary evil and the common enemy of woman kind. They drop in unexpectedly before breakfast or just after supper, and always at dinner. The unsuspecting family may be taking a quiet breakfast when eight or ten men will walk in, wash their faces and sit down to the table. The horrified house-keeper knows full well that this means twenty men for dinner and for every meal until the great wheat stacks are exhausted, which takes sometimes two or three weeks.

New machinery has done much to lighten and lessen the work of men on the farm—riding plows, patent drills, self binders, headers and steam threshers all tend to do this; but machinery has as yet wrought but little benefit to farmers' wives. Dishwashing, cooking, scrubbing and ironing, like perpetual motion, seem to be beyond the skill of inventors. Women's work on the farm is constant, unceasing toil—a never-ending, recurring round of duties, "world without end." All the hard work consequent upon the harvest, which is mostly cooking, has to be done in hot weather, the hardest time of the whole year to do this kind of work, and also at a time when it is next to impossible to obtain help for the kitchen. Many a farmer's wife with a babe lying in the crib and two or three small children to be cared for, patiently gets through the herculean task all alone, except such help as the men folks can give morning and evening. The farmers' wives are not merely "help-meets" in subduing the wilds of this western country, but have done their full share of solid, hard work as equal partners; and if there is a credit balance on either side, it is in favor of the women.

The women on the farms are intelligent as a class. They work, and read and think. They devote what leisure time they have to reading, instead of fashionable dress and society calls. Consequently they are well informed on the leading topics of the day; and many a woman now living on a Kansas farm, in her girlhood attended the best schools in the east. Yet these women are disfranchised. The legislature of Kansas passed a law called the "Municipal Suffrage Law," which granted to women living in cities the right to vote for municipal officers, but neglected to provide any privileges for this great army of women who reside in the country; and if in the campaign of 1890 the farmer women massed their strength and energy to elect the candidates on the People's ticket, no one can blame them. It spoke well for their political sagacity and excellent knowledge of "ways and means." Under an old law women are allowed to vote for school directors in the country.

On the morrow Mary went to visit Mrs. Gray, as she had proposed, and found her indeed homesick and ill. She spent the afternoon with her, and was so cheerful that even Mrs. Gray began to laugh and take a more hopeful view of life in Kansas.

"John," said Mary, when they had sat down to the supper table that evening, "Mrs. Gray is a beautiful woman, an accomplished musician, a graduate of an eastern seminary, and a lover of beautiful things. She pines for the lace curtains and soft carpets of eastern homes. Just think of such a woman living in a sod house! Is it any wonder she is homesick? I fear the sod will soon cover her grave if they do not return. He does not like or understand farming, and they have made a mistake in moving to a new country. We were brought up on farms. I am strong and well, of a cheerful disposition, and get amusement out of everything that comes along; but I am sorry for Mrs. Gray. She made me promise to come to see her three times each week."

Faithfully Mary cared for her new friend, and entreated Mr. Gray to take his wife back to her eastern home for a while; but they thought the expense was too great to be incurred. A terrible storm came on and Mary could not get over to see her friend, but heard she was very ill, and before the week had passed, word was brought that Mrs. Gray was dead. On a damp bed in that sod house, for the rain had dripped through the roof so badly that an umbrella was raised to keep it off the sick, lay the lifeless form of this young mother and her dead babe lay beside her. Mary fell upon her knees beside the bed and wept bitterly. The neighbors gathered in and sang with subdued voices, "Shall we gather at the river," the minister said a few words about the sad dispensations of Providence, and then Mrs. Gray, and the babe were buried in a lonely cemetery on the great prairie.

Travelers to California rush to the windows and platforms of their train to get a glimpse of what is called in the guide-book, the Maiden's Grave. The story goes that years ago, while a wagon train was passing over the wilderness, a young girl died and was buried in some lonely spot, and travelers will brush aside a tear over what seems her sad, sad fate.

Oh, women who dwell in elegant mansions where there are lace curtains and soft carpets and beautiful surroundings of every kind, will you not drop a tear of sympathy for this young mother who perished for the lack of a warm, comfortable house, a skillful physician and a loving mother's care? The sod of the western prairie covers very many such graves, and in many an eastern home white haired parents are bowed with grief because their daughter is no more. Never until the recording angel opens the book, shall the heroic deeds and sacrifices of women who have striven to build up homes on this wild prairie be fully known or appreciated. Their names will be among the noblest names recorded and among the "blessed and holy" who "hath part in the first resurrection."

WOMEN AT THE FAIR.

Their Assistance a Great Factor Toward the Success of the Kansas State Fair.

The influence and help of the women is indispensable in any great undertaking, and particularly so in the work of making a successful fair or exposition of any kind. The Kansas State Fair association has never failed to recognize this fact, and as a result can point to a list of lady exhibitors of which any fair might be proud. Their exhibits are not all confined to the art or fancy work departments either. In this progressive agricultural State are found women engaged in farming and stock raising, and it is not uncommon to receive a large number of entries in the horse, cattle, and live stock divisions from them. The agricultural hall is also made to look beautiful by the deft fingers and artistic directions of the ladies. As they are a power in the household, so they are when it comes to choosing the best samples and directing their arrangement for display. It pays, too. Last year there were found ladies who came prepared to do a "land office" business by entering for premiums in every department to which their handiwork was eligible. Some had fancy work, and lots of it; others had cakes, jellies, and pantry stores; other made butter, and still others who had a fine display of garden truck raised by their own hands. There were to be found women who entered articles in all of these departments, and showed a few nice coops of fine poultry besides. It is a matter of business with some, while others take pleasure in adding their mite to the general show, as they say, to "help out," but are always happy to find blue ribbons decorating their entries after the judges have passed upon them. The fair management are glad to pay premiums on worthy articles, and the greater the number the more complete the exhibit. There must be competition in order to win, as without competition but fifty per cent of the premium is awarded.

Mrs. B. A. Otis, who has won so many friends and constant exhibitors in the household articles and pantry stores department, as assistant to Superintendent Otis, is again in charge, and it is believed will have an exceptionally fine display this year. The great fruit crop insures a big show of canned goods and the revision of her department the premium list by Mrs. Otis will add materially to the effectiveness of the displays.

It will be seen that the woman's department of the State Fair is being looked after, and that there are hundreds of places where the ladies of the State can make paying entries and at the same time add their share towards a successful show. The lady who paints on canvas or china, the lady who models in clay, or who makes any kind of fancy work, quilts or rugs, can find at our fair due consideration. She may desire to make a few entries in other departments; there is no objection, they are open to all. Even the young mother who cannot or hasn't the time to paint, make fancy work, bake a cake, or put up a glass of jelly, may have a fine baby that will win the $100 baby cab for the best Kansas baby under one year old.

HAS ALWAYS ENRICHED THE NATION.

F. E. Cairnes, professor of the University college of London, in a work on political economy, in 1874, says:

"Government paper money has always enriched a nation when properly issued, restricted and secured. It has ever been a success. Specie, for a domestic currency, or as a basis for paper, has been a failure without a solitary exception. Napoleon, at St. Helena, claimed that England beat him with her spindles, but it was her paper money that kept her spindles in motion. Specie in its stead would have given him the victory. England's entire disregard of specie and copious issue of paper money after the suspension of specie payments in 1797 till 1819, were the most prosperous days that England ever saw. This wise policy, to which she was driven, by necessity, together with the bills of credit issued by the united allied powers, and which were not only as good as, but superior to, gold from Kamschatka to the Rhine, turned the tide of war against Napoleon, and won the decisive battle of Waterloo, saving England from becoming a province of France.

LEGISLATION AND PRICES.

From the Kansas Farmer.

We are met on every side by persons, who insist that legislation does not affect prices. They say "you cannot legislate men rich or poor." These persons ought to know that we have been legislating one class of people rich and the other classes poor for many, many years. The census reports are making this matter very plain. One-fourth of our farmers were renters ten years ago; the proportion has grown to one-third now. The writer of this, a few days ago, heard a well-informed person say that one-half the farms of Sangamon county, Illinois, are owned by persons living in Springfield, the county seat, and capital city of the state. Some of the owners are retired farmers who made money when times were good, and now have money out at interest besides their farms which are rented; but by far the most numerous classes of land-owners in town are bankers and lawyers. The case of Sangamon county is that of hundreds of others, and they are the result of legislation. Our census reports show that the general progress of the country, including all the productive industries, has not exceeded 3 per cent annually, and that the development of agriculture has not exceeded 2 per cent per annum. Turn to an interest table of the United States and you find that legal rates for the use of money are 6 per cent or above in every state of the Union except one—Louisiana. Our laws have always discriminated in favor of money and against all other property. Money is the only property whose profits are even attempted to be regulated by law. I have money and my brother has land or machinery; the law says I may charge my brother 6 per cent or 10 per cent for the use of my money, but it does not provide how much rent he may demand of me for the use of his farm or mill. Interest rates being higher than profits on productive industry, money has a perpetual advantage over other property, and this accounts for the absorption of wealth by persons who lend money largely. It is a constant drain upon labor.

But take another illustration. In 1867, Senator John Sherman, in a report on the contraction of our circulating medium, used this language: "Legislation concerning finances affects the value of all property, thus it touches the heart and the home of every person in the United States." And in the following years—notably in '69, he repeated the proposition and warned the people of the consequences to follow in the wake of contraction. He told the people that disaster would surely follow. And Senator Sherman was not alone in the warning. Other Senators—Morton, Logan, indeed all our public men understood the situation the same way. There was no difference of opinion on the subject. Everybody who was fairly well-informed foresaw what must inevitably follow. And so it came to pass. The first year after the war nearly $400,000,000 of our circulation was withdrawn, and by the end of '69 we had no currency except greenbacks and bank notes. All the rest—some $1,500,000,000—had been converted into bonds and in 1873 the crash came. Prices had been tending downward. The re-funding act of 1870, the silver demonetization act of 1873, and the resumption act of 1875, completed the work of "getting back to a specie basis." It cost the people countless millions in depreciation of values. From '73 to '79 we had "hard times." Resumption was supposed to have taken place January 1, 1879, and banks began to expand their currency at the rate of $8,500,000 a year, and kept it up to 1882. Under the Bland silver law of '78 we had a yearly increase of about $26,000,000. Business took on new life, prices rose, labor was employed and the common people prospered. But in '83 contraction was again begun, that time by the banks, and it continued to the present time. The turning point in business was 1884. From that year to this farming has been unprofitable. Prices dropped just as they did from '66 and '67 to '73.

All this was the result of legislation. Contraction had been provided for by law. Rich men became richer, while working people of all classes grew poorer while the contraction continued. Money became scarce and costly, wheat and corn and cotton, though abundant, dropped 25 to 50 per cent in value. Scarcity of money causes low prices and brings bankruptcy to the people. Abundance of money in active circulation brings good times; prices rise, labor is employed, and the people prosper.

We have had experience enough along this line. We have legislated low prices in the interest of the rich; now let us legislate high prices in the interest of the poor. We have taken care of the money-changers a long time and find it unprofitable work; let us change methods and legislate some in the interest of the people at large. With plenty of money and low rates of interest all will be well with the workers.

WHY WE GROW.

From the Kansas Farmer.

The unrest among the people out of which the farmers' movement grew was the result of legislation in the interest of protected classes of citizens, legislation discriminating in favor of money and against other kinds of property. The end of the great war found the southern states destitute of money and needing large amounts. The demand there was fully equal to the surplus left among the people of the north occasioned by a cessation of war requirements; but instead of keeping the circulation at what it was when the war closed, 75 per cent of it was withdrawn and put into long-time bonds within four years after the armies were disbanded. Whereas we had $1,900,000,000 of government paper currency out July 1, 1865, there was only about $450,000,000 out on the 30th day of June, 1869. [See report of secretary of the treasury, 1869.] As had been foreseen and foretold by Senators Sherman, Morton and others, great depreciation of property followed the excessive contraction of the currency, and debts had been increased accordingly. Bondholders, bankers and stock-brokers amassed fortunes in a few years, while the producing classes became correspondingly poor. The same influences still operate. We have not more than one-third enough money to do the business of the people, and as a consequence the same debt is now about three times as large as it was eight years ago. Rates of interest—8 to 10 per cent in 1867—amount to 24 to 30 per cent now, because of the depreciation of property. A bushel of wheat then paid $2 worth of interest; now it pays only about 75 cents' worth.

It is because of these facts—not because of short crops—that farmers do not cease to study the science of "economical government;" and it is because of these things that the alliance continues to grow. Until our financial methods are improved the growth will not be stopped. The causes which originally brought the alliance into existence are now more plainly visible and are better understood than they were then, and logically political action becomes necessary on our part. The leaders of the two great parties are wedded to the philosophy which has brought disaster to us. There is no room for hope in either of those directions. No source of relief is open to us except such as we ourselves shall open. Understanding this, farmers and wage-workers are combining everywhere for independent political action. The people's party is growing as fast as the alliance did in 1889 and '90. The elections in Kentucky, Ohio and Iowa this year will surprise everybody. The democratic majority in Kentucky will be greatly reduced, if not utterly wiped out, while republican in Ohio and Iowa will show the work of the toilers there. In Texas, if a vote were taken to-day, the people's ticket would receive at least 60,000 votes, and democracy would be about 50,000 short of its old strength. So it is going in more than half the states. The heaven is working.

HOLDING WHEAT.

J. B. French, says the Topeka Journal, describes the scheme by saying: "It is little more than was done last year in our co-operative stores where one man bought everything needed by the rest and sold it at cost, receiving a salary for such service. Our plan now is to let the business agent of each alliance manage the shipping of wheat sent out by alliance men to elevators to be held in storage. For example, if two men belonging to the same alliance have wheat of the same grade and are compelled to market it and together they can make a car-load, they put it together and ship the grain to a place of storage in the same car.

"The business is done through the business agent of the sub-alliance, who sends the grain to the Kansas alliance exchange at Kansas City. The exchange places the grain in some elevator and holds it until he can get the price asked by the farmer, or is instructed by the business agent of the sub-alliance. We have storage-room for millions of bushels at our disposal, and 75 per cent of the value of the grain is immediately advanced by the elevator company. We could handle half the wheat crop of the state if necessary.

"As far as possible, however, the farmers are stacking their wheat and holding it until fall before threshing. When a brother is pinched for money and is compelled to sell or make a loan, the other members of his alliance club together and raise $50 or $100, as his needs may require, and loan it to him to be repaid when his wheat is marketed. Our plan is to form a perfect system of co-operation, and this is but another step in that direction. There is no reason why our alliance exchanges should not be able to handle everything that the farmer needs to purchase or sell. The elevator companies co-operate, not because they love us, but because they know that we can control a large business for them. I receive letters every day telling me that the alliances have taken action and have determined to hold their wheat together."

SIMPLE JUSTICE DEMANDS IT.

A letter to the San Francisco Argonaut says: "Careful estimates show that on January 1, 1890, of the $66,000,000,000 of wealth in the United States 30,000 leading capitalists possessed $36,250,000,000 leaving $29,750,000,000 for the remaining 63,000,000 inhabitants. It will be seen from these figures that although our farmers, artisans and other toilers produced the increase of $22,000,000,000, a few capitalists absorbed most of it. If this thing is to go on, in about twenty-five years a few thousand plutocrats will practically own the whole country. The toilers of the country produce all that we eat, drink and wear in a year, and in addition add 4 per cent annually to our wealth. But the capitalists own the factories, machinery and appliances used by laboring men. Capital should obtain a fair share of the increase of wealth. As it is, it takes the entire increase and exacts so much that the laborers have to mortgage their little property and live on the proceeds. This is a true statement. During the past ten years the capitalists lived in luxury at the expense of the toilers. During the same period our farmers and other workers lived very plainly, although they increased the wealth of the country 50 per cent. Now, simple justice demands that the increase should be equally divided between the two classes. There is something wrong somewhere. In fact, nearly everything is wrong. Monopolies, plutocratic legislation, gold-bug contraction of the currency, and our extravagant government are building up the classes and pulling down the great, toiling industrial people of the country."

CALAMITY IN POLITICS.

From the Emporia Republican.

The uprising of the farmers in the west and south is too general and widespread to be attributed to mere local or temporary causes. Such movements do not originate from whims or caprice. Occasionally there are spurts of popular demonstration here and there, which promise to overthrow existing systems, but they are local in character or insignificant in proportion and speedily die out. The breadth and earnestness and energy of the present farmers' movement indicate that it is not to be of ephemeral existence or unimportant in results. It is evidence of a deep-seated conviction on the part of the producing classes that they have not asserted the influence upon legislation and government in the past to which their numbers and the character of their industry entitled them, and of a determination to do more toward shaping politics in future.

This decision is one with which no fair-minded observer can find fault. It has a substantial foundation and is warranted by facts. As to the wisdom of forming a new party to carry out these purposes, the question is one which will admit of honest difference of opinion, and one that the farmers are abundantly justified in deciding for themselves. They have not yet decided it, a portion of them approving the new party scheme, and another—the larger—portion as resolutely opposing it. But however the question may be determined, matters not so far as regards the significance of the movement.

PURER POLITICS.

From the Farmers' Friend.

We hear a great deal these days about purer politics, but we fail to discover any action that is likely to bring about any change in political methods. All the talk on the subject reminds one of the attempt of the mice to bell the cat, and results in about the same way. If we want purer politics we must select purer men for party leaders and nominate men for office who will neither accept nor give a bribe. It is a well-settled fact that a man who will offer a bribe will take one, and that he who buys votes will sell his own, if opportunity occurs, and the price offered is large enough.

Now are we going to get purer politics so long as candidates for office are compelled to pay to ward-workers, window-men and heelers a sum almost as large as the salary or income derived from the position? There must be some way by which the successful candidate can recoupe himself. Does any sane man doubt that such a way is found? We can only get purer politics when the voters become purer, when for a man to accept money for his vote and influence will be regarded as a sufficient cause for social and political ostracism; when the man who buys a vote and the man who sells it shall both be disfranchised for the offense. We will get purer politics when we apply heroic treatment and cease to praise and flatter the men whom we know have secured office through the corrupt use of money.

ALLIANCE CHARTERS.

TOPEKA, KAN.—The numbers of local corporations which are filing their charters with the secretary of state, the avowed objects of which are to purchase and ship grain, is most positive evidence that the farmers are organizing systematically for the purpose of holding their wheat and other products until such time as they can secure satisfactory prices. Three of these companies placed their charters in the hands of the secretary of state yesterday morning. They are the Clyde Farmers' alliance and Shipping association, capital stock $25,000; the Farmers' Purchasing association of Plainville, capital stock $10,000, and the Esbon Farmers' Shipping association, capital stock $20,000. The incorporators of these companies are all active farmers with capital, which they are using to assist their neighbors who are less fortunate. Before the expiration of thirty days it is believed by alliance men who are in a position to know what is being done, that from one to ten of these companies will be in operation in each county in the state.

FARMERS IN CITIZENS' ALLIANCE.

COLBY, KAN.—The county central committee of the people's party met in Colby and settled preliminaries for the holding of the county convention and arranged for the fall campaign. It is generally conceded that the people's party has gained from 15 to 20 per cent in Thomas county since last fall's election, and applications for membership in the local alliance are coming in rapidly. Great effort is being made by the old parties to create a spirit of envy and strife between the farmers' alliance and the citizens' alliance, the latter of which was recently organized in Colby, but the scheme fails flat. The membership of the citizens' alliance is principally made up of members of the farmers' alliance, and a general invitation is extended to the farmers to join with their city brothers.

THE LADIES RUN THINGS.

A country where the women own the houses and lands, where gold and silver are common as the flowers in the spring, where everybody is happy and nobody does wrong, is the burden of the story that W. J. Shaw brings from far-off Sumatra, says the San Francisco Examiner.

"In all my years of travel," he said, "I have never found a happier people than those who live in Sumatra, in the middle part of the island. The people all over Sumatra are believers in the Mohammedan religion, but the peculiar customs which make this particular people unique and different from all others are confined to one community.

"It would not be correct to term this branch of the Sumatra people a tribe, for they do not live in tribal relations at all, although there is a chief and under chieftains. These rulers, however, are not despots, and if the people do not like the way in which they manage things they dispose of them very shortly and put other men in their places.

"Although men are the ostensible chieftains, the women are the real rulers. The customs of the country forbid the giving of a man's property to his children after his death. If a man dies the property he owns is given to his father and mother. The woman's property, on the contrary, is given to the children. Probably that is the custom that is responsible for the turning over of the wealth of the country to the women.

"It is the constant aim of the men to enrich their wives. Each man has but one wife, and each wife one husband, and they live a perfectly moral life. The teachings of Mohammedanism are followed upon the question of divorce. The husband has the right to divorce his wife whenever he chooses; but must allow her to retain the property in her possession. Divorces are not frequent, though, and I believe that in proportion to the population divorces in this part of Sumatra are not one in sixteen compared to the number in California.

"The people are happy there—happy as they can be. The children live at home with the mother—the boys until they are 13 or 14, and the girls until they marry.

"When the daughter gets married she does not leave her mother's house. An addition is built—a new roof, as they call it—and the newly married girl makes her home there and brings up her children. This custom, of course, results in forming quite large communities where there are many children.

"I knew one of these communities where there were a mother and several daughters living with their children. The original house had grown with each marriage until it spread over a large piece of ground.

"When the boys get old enough to leave home they are taken to a compartment house which is set aside for them until they wish to marry. The girl has the right to choose whom she will wed, a privilege delegated to her in few Mohammedan countries.

"Once married, the husband for the rest of his life is his wife's lover. He lives apart from her and visits her home only in the evening to chat with her and the children. All the money he gets he turns over to his sweetheart. She dresses herself and the children and shoulders all the petty family cares.

"He bothers only to earn the money to pay for the things they eat and wear.

"To get things for them to eat need not worry him much. The portion of Sumatra in which these strange people live is very fertile. It is a fine country, with beautiful mountains and streams and magnificent scenery. All sorts of fruits are grown, and in the higher altitudes many of the grains.

"To find dresses for the family must be a difficult matter, for I never saw such elegantly attired women as in these communities. They are very beautiful, boasting the finest and fairest complexions and the brightest eyes.

"I have seen women there wearing dresses of pure gold and others wearing silver gowns. Both these metals are mined in Sumatra and natives possess sufficient knowledge of the arts to smelt and form the ingots into wire. The weaving of these handsome and costly cloths is quite the principal occupation of both the women and the men.

"Never in Christian countries do women dress as extravagantly.

"I remember that once the chief told me he would have two pretty maidens dress as they would on their marriage. The two bright-eyed girls were gone some time, and came back wearing one a dress of gold and the other one of silver. They had bracelets one above and another from the hands and above their elbows. At their elbows they wore peculiar bracelets, jointed to permit easily moving the joint. In brief, their arms were armored with precious metal. They had necklaces of gems and other costly ornaments, and the cloth-of-gold and cloth-of-silver dresses were made loosely fitting above the waist, and their skirts in flounces.

"They are not an ignorant people, for the children are taught in their homes, and many learn to read the Koran. They observe the proprieties, too, as is apparent from the rule as to widows.

"When a woman's husband dies she plants a post in front of her particular door in the family house and hangs a flag upon it. While that flag waves she may not marry again. But when the winds, blowing softly off the sea, have torn it into shreds and scattered the bits on the ground, her term of mourning is over, and she may accept a second lover's proffer."

UMBRELLAS have a widespread popularity.

NO MAN CAN SERVE TWO MASTERS.

From the Kansas Farmer.

Our alliance friends are fast learning that party politicians are not safe custodians of alliance principles. A large number of men have been elected to office within a year on pledges of sympathy with our doctrine, yet, as far as we have been able to ascertain, none of them are firm believers in the measures which we regard as vital. The first of the seven demands adopted at St. Louis, December, 1889, condemns national banks of issue and favors the substitution of treasury notes for bank notes, the money to be issued to the people directly, without the intervention of any sort of interest-charging agency. What one among the distinguished men who have recently been taken out of the old party ranks and put into prominent places of public trust has ever publicly indorsed this, our first demand? Governor Tillman, of South Carolina, was a democrat when elected, and he is a democrat now. Democrats are not opposed to national banks, and they have never announced themselves in favor of government paper issues as a permanent currency. General Gordon, recently elected to the senate by alliance votes, now announces that he has no intention of adopting any views other than those of his party. General Palmer, elected to the senate by the aid of two F. M. B. A. men, declared himself in opposition to the alliance idea of cheap money. Similar cases are reported in other quarters, and we may expect to hear of them continually as long as we support men who think more of their parties than they do of the alliance.

The Kanss Farmer, in answer to questions propounded by party friends, as to whether the party or the alliance should be supported in case of conflict, has uniformly put the proposition thus: The alliance is right or it is wrong; if it is right, whatever is in conflict with it is wrong. It follows logically that if we prefer to be right rather than be in accord with a party, we will follow the alliance lead if we believe it to be right. No man can serve two masters. We cannot serve the alliance and either of the great parties, because they differ in important matters. Both of the parties approve of existing financial methods, and the alliance not only does not approve them, but opposes them and believes them to be both wrong and vicious. As alliance men, we charge that congress has legislated $2 wheat into $1 wheat; 90-cent corn into 45-cent corn; 15-cent cotton into 7-cent cotton; and that the legislature which brought about those results effected equally damaging changes in the market values of other products. Now we favor a reversal of legislation which has thus diminished our ability to pay debts. We would legislate prices up to where they were when our debts were contracted, so that we may be placed as nearly as possible in the same relation with our creditors that we enjoyed when we borrowed their money. Let us change 40-cent corn into 60-cent corn; $3 beef into $5 beef; $3.50 pork into $6 pork; $1 wages into $1.50 wages, and so on. This will even things up to the level of seven or eight years ago, and it can be done by reversing our financial methods so as to favor the debtor equally with the creditor. But who among the distinguished men above mentioned or referred to believes with us touching these matters?

The time has come to act upon the advice given in these columns more than nine years ago—to raise up a new party if the old ones will not give us what we are entitled to. The differences between the demands of the alliance and the platform declarations of parties are radical, and they cannot be made to harmonize. One or the other must be abandoned. If alliance people would incorporate their principles into law they must not intrust the work to men who think more of their party than they do of their principles.

THE OLD PARTIES WILL NOT HELP.

From the Missouri World.

Free silver coinage is one of the mildest of reform measures. It would be only a short step in the right direction. Yet the democratic politicians of Ohio, in state convention assembled, adopted the measure by the close vote of 11 to 10 in committee and 399 to 300 in convention. Going east from Ohio, probably not a state will be found in which a majority of the democratic politicians favor free silver. It is quite clear to us that there is not much hope of even that little reform from the democratic party.

PROPER SUBJECT FOR DISCUSSION.

By R. T. Van Horn.

Another promising indication in Kansas is the tendency of the farmers to help one another. They are talking business more and politics less. The proposition to make their aggregate capital a protecting power in cases of individual misfortune is a move in the right direction. The associated banks in the great cities make their aggregate capital of service in protecting individual concerns. Why can not the farmers make their capital a protecting influence against unconscionable demands and temporary stringency in the money world.

In pursuing the policy of which we speak it is not necessary for the farmers or the alliance people to abandon their principles. The acme of political and financial wisdom has not been reached in any part of the world. New propositions are in order from all comers. With the German government advancing money on a two-thirds valuation of crops, no one in this country can be so illiberal as to say that the sub-treasury scheme is not a proper subject for discussion.

But in the meantime the every-day interests of society should not be sacrificed to the personal aims of men who think they can gain or hold power by making a football of individual and state credit.

AGREED ON THE MAIN QUESTION.

From the Kansas Farmer.

Concerning the great question of the time—money—both of the old political parties are agreed, and are working in perfect accord. The only shading of difference which appears anywhere is in the matter of silver coinage. While most republicans favor free coinage, no state convention of that party held this year has declared in favor of it, and there is no indication that it will be done next year. Several democratic state conventions have so declared. But when it comes to formulating national party platforms there will be no difference on this subject except in the manner of stating the party's opposition to free coinage. All the great newspapers of the country are one in opposition to any "tinkering with the currency." They all believe, with Senator Sherman, that legislation concerning finance affects the value of all property in the country, and that it "thus touches the hearts and homes of every person in the United States." It is, presumably, because property values are thus affected by legislation that there is this argument. Public interest in the "money question" is becoming so intense that men who are interested in maintaining a single monetary standard and in keeping that standard limited to the smallest possible quantity, are alarmed lest the people take hold of their own financial affairs and legislate a little life into labor.

The metropolitan press is particularly critical and severe upon those persons and papers that are advocating a large and prompt increase in the volume of our circulating medium, insisting that they are ignorant and malicious. The strange thing about it is, that the interest of the masses is not regarded by these critics as worth looking after. They all know, or they ought to know, that the depression of agriculture and the low wages of labor are direct results of our financial methods; they know or ought to know that congress has legislated about one-half the value of property and labor out of existence, just what our statesmen told us long ago would be done, yet they insist that nothing shall be done to change these conditions and to prevent their growing worse. Take up the leading papers of the country, of both parties, and you will find them all preaching the same doctrine in relation to finance. They are quarreling about the tariff and our foreign policy, but when the interests of our working people are brought forward for betterment, this great power of wealth—the press, is one in denouncing the movement as dangerous and the movers as demagogues and evil-doers, too ignorant to deserve respect yet too troublesome to be let alone.

It is fast dawning upon the average mind that the " portentous contest" which Senator Ingalls spoke of a dozen years or more ago is indeed upon us. Wealth on one side, poverty on the other. Let the people prepare for it.

CITIZENS' ALLIANCE IN CHICAGO.

Chicago.—At the Grand Pacific hotel last night were taken the first steps toward the establishment in Chicago of the people's party.

Last night's conference was a secret one, held because of the presence in the city of W. F. Rightmire of Kansas, secretary of the national citizens' industrial alliance as well as the national board of organization of that body.

For three months, the preparatory work has been carried on in Chicago and the leaders claim that in almost all of the wards secret clubs have been formed while nearly 10,000 names have been pledged to support the principles and candidates of the third party. Last Sunday a local assembly was formed, but its officers have not been made public, it being claimed that the order is a secret one and not yet ready to have its affairs generally known.

The work of organization has been carried on by Moses Hull, but a certain lack of familiarity on his part with regard to the educational plans of the alliance made necessary to-night's conference and the result of the latter will probably be a third party ticket placed before the Chicago voters this fall.

Mr. Rightmire presided at the Grand Pacific meeting and Amos W. Simpson, one of the leading workers, acted as secretary. Delegates from the various ward organizations were present. The conference was stated to be eminently satisfactory in its results. Mr. Rightmire leaves to-day to carry on in Wisconsin the same work he has been engaged in in this state. Returning to Chicago he will probably be met by Thomas W. McGilruth of Kansas City, president of the national citizen's industrial alliance, who will take part in the work of the organization in Chicago.

TIT FOR TAT.

From the National Economist.

For some time past the Boston Herald has been making frequent and bitter attacks upon the alliance and its demands. Realizing that such a long distance contest would prove fruitless, especially as emanating from the seat of New England plutocracy, it has adopted a new method of warfare which it believes will be more effective. It advises and threatens the south and west with a financial boycott in case the demands of the alliance and free silver are persisted in. It makes the open threat that New England will lend no more money south or west unless payment of both principal and interest are made in gold; and also that the borrowers of this eastern money shall both work and vote to wipe out this demand for currency reform. This article came to the Economist marked, and in a separate envelope from the publishers' and has no doubt been sent throughout the country. This boycott has been secretly going on for some time, as the gold mortgages and gold notes given by western farmers disclose. Now the case has become desperate, and the heretofore secret methods have been discarded. In some cases this threat will be effective, but taken as a whole the people will revolt against such infamous proceedings, and the reaction will be disastrous to New England. Suppose the farmers and planters of the west and south should declare a counter boycott and refuse to consume any of New England's products, what would become of their factories and shops? Suppose a similar boycott should be declared against the insurance companies of the east, where would their syndicates and monopolies obtain their vast working capital? If the threat contained in this plutocratic paper is carried further, it may be well to teach that bleak and barren fragment of the national domain a lesson in the effectiveness of a system of reprisals. The people of the great west and south can live, thrive and be happy without even coming in contact with New England greed or assumption, but without the tribute from the south and west that New England now receives, the near future would see its bleak hills deserted, its villages abandoned, and its manufacturing and shops inhabited by the bat and the owl. If a contest of this character is to be made, the south and west are able and willing to care for themselves.

DEMAGOGY.

From the Montgomery, Ala., Herald.

One of the peculiar functions in which the plutocratic press refers to the leaders of the alliance is to class all as selfish demagogues. The good and pious statesmen who have been leading this country to destruction the last twenty-five years are not demagogues, tricksters and political charlatans. Oh, no! They have not deceived anybody.

While all this iniquitous financial system was being born, fostered and encouraged under the tender care of these statesmen they could foresee that it would result in 90 per cent of the people being placed under mortgage and 91 per cent being involved in debt. They told the people all the time that this glorious future would soon dawn upon them! They were not demagogues! They just kept the people watching the revision of the tariff they never made, and showed them how beautifully they would save the country from vandal hands every two years, with punctilious regularity drawing their large salaries, and at the end of twenty-five years these statesmen are in very fine condition, financially, and the people they have been saving are awake to the fearful reality that these statesmen were saving themselves, whom they call the country, and the great mass of the people with their great and manifold interests had gone to the demitition bow wows. That was statesmanship—not demagoguery! Probably it would not be a bad idea to exchange that kind of statesmanship for its antipodes, demagoguery. If that is the sense in which the alliance leaders are referred to as wholesale and retail dealers in demagoguery, it is probable that they can stand it and the people will indorse it.

WILL NOT PAN OUT.

From the Three Rivers, Mich., Reporter.

The land-currency and the sub-treasury system, of finance has shocked the national bankers of New York and New England out of their wits. Large contributions of money have been made by the national bankers and sent down south to be used in cities where national banks and newspapers have a controlling influence. The southern states have, as compared to the north, but a few cities and national banks through which an overwhelming influence can be arrayed against the farmers. The alliance farmers of the south comprise three-fourths of the voting population. They are well-organized, vigilant and desperately in earnest. To all appearances the money contributed in the east and sent to the cotton states will not pan out as it was expected. When the daily press of the south opened fire on the alliance all at one time, there was no surprise or shocking effect. The farmers were posted when parties from the south went east for boodle, with which an assurance was given that the alliance craze should be checked, if not squelched. There need be no fear for the alliance at the south except it be through over-confidence in trusted leaders who are susceptible of briber influence. Betrayal of confidence may not be as safe in the south as it is here, but there are those who will take the chances, the alliance may rest assured.

ONLY ONE PARTY THERE.

From the Topeka Journal.

The following letter has been received by Mrs. Otis, wife of Congressman Otis, from Mrs. Lease:

DOUGLASSVILLE, GA.

DEAR MRS. OTIS:—In this land of balmy air and whispering pines, I have not forgotten for a moment my promised line to you. I have made speeches before Chautauqua three times more than they had contracted for, and had each time larger audiences. I wish I could tell you the royal reception given me by the Georgia people. They have taken me to their hearts and homes. They are more enthusiastic than the people of Kansas. Have no fears for the reform movement here. There is but one party here—the party of the people. Col. Livingston is as strong in the faith as Congressman Otis, but he is hampered by pledges to wait until the February convention. His people, in my opinion, will come out for a third party at their convention this month.

I remain yours,

MARY E. LEASE.

NOT IN RANGE YET.

From the Spirit of Kansas.

The hope of the republican politicians is that the people's party will get into a quarrel over the sub-treasury scheme and will split upon the rock. Trouble has already been made in Missouri over this question. It is one that by common consent should be held in abeyance. It is not and can not be a vital question before the new party gets into power. There are yet different views in regard to it. Its principle has been acknowledged by the action of the government, but it does not now present the weak point in the enemies' position. Let us throw no shot until we get within range.

FOR OUR LITTLE FOLKS.

A COLUMN OF PARTICULAR INTEREST TO THEM.

What Children Have Done, What They Are Doing, and What They Should Do to Pass Their Childhood Days.

Jack's Resolution.

"Oh, dear, dear! Was there ever such a boy before, I wonder?" sighed Mrs. Brown, as she unpacked the market-basket one warm morning in July.

"What's the matter, mother?" asked Sally, who was working with her in the kitchen; "has Jimmy forgotten anything?"

"Yes; he has gone and forgotten the baking-powder again, and this is the third time he has been to the village this week, and your father can't spare the horse now in haying time to go again, and Parson Dermot's donation party is to come off to-morrow afternoon, and I can't make anything unless I have that powder." And Mrs. Brown sunk in an exhausted fashion into a chair, after her unusually long speech.

"Well, mother, I don't see what you can do, unless you let Jack take the colt and go up to Dr. Gray's and have Mrs. Gray send you some in payment for the eggs you let her have last week, and, besides, he can get that new pattern of lace that I want, and that will be doing two errands in one trip."

Jack's blue eyes brightened as he thought of the trust that his mother and sister had in his not forgetting anything, and a four-mile ride on his father's handsome young colt Caesar had not the last place in his thoughts.

"Now, Jack," said his mother, as he was all ready to start, "be sure and go straight there and back. It is a pretty long ride for a little chap like you, so do be careful."

"Little chap, indeed," thought Jack; "I am thirteen years old, and I can remember what I am sent for, anyhow, and that's what Jim can't, if he is sixteen." But alas! for boyish resolutions. As he was passing Mr. Randall's house he wondered if he should see Rex. Rex was his chosen friend and companion. "Won't he stare, though, when he sees me on Caesar?" he said to himself. He had gone almost out of sight of the house when a voice called: "Jack! I say, Jack, wait a minute, I want to see you," and Rex jumped over the fence and came panting up.

"Hurry up and fasten your horse to a tree, and come with me. Jip has found a woodchuck's burrow, and I want you to help me catch him. I am all alone; my folks have all gone away. We will sell his skin, and I will give you half of what I get."

Jack's interest was roused immediately at the promise of money, for he was saving all that he could get to buy a second-hand bicycle that he had seen advertised at the village about a month before. Before he could think of his resolution to go straight, he was off of Caesar and had him tied and was over in the field with Rex. It took the boys longer than they thought to get the woodchuck, and to Jack's surprise three hours had elapsed since he had left Caesar tied to the tree, and the horse gave an impatient neigh when he saw the boys. Jack being in as much of a hurry as Caesar, bade Rex good-by and was off like the wind for Dr. Gray's, which was still two miles distant. When he reached Mrs. Gray's she would have him stay and have him eat some of her nice ginger cookies, of which he was very fond, and kept asking him innumerable questions about home and his mother. When at last she let him go, and he rushed out to get Caesar and go home, he saw a large black cloud coming up from the northwest. "Oh, dear!" thought Jack, "there is an awful shower coming, and I have Jim's new saddle, and it will be spoilt."

When he did reach home the horse, boy, saddle and everything presented a sorry-looking spectacle. They had begun to get worried about him, and his father was just going out to look for him. After he had changed his wet clothes for dry ones, there was an indignation meeting, and Jim said that Jack should give him all of his bicycle money to help him get a new saddle. Jack's father and mother decided that what Jim asked was but just and right, as nothing would have happened if he had obeyed orders. So poor Jack reluctantly handed over his precious five dollars and mentally said good-by to his bicycle, and came to the conclusion that resolutions were a good deal easier made than kept.—New York Tribune.

A Fair Saintess.

There was a somewhat mixed crowd at a masquerade ball given in New York. Clamwhooper was present, but Mrs. Clamwhooper was not. Approaching a veiled nun, he playfully tapped her on the shoulder and said:

"Fair saintess, I recognize thee by thy sylph-like form."

To his amazement he recognized the voice of his cook, Biddy Muldoon.

"Plaze, sor, don't tell the ould lady at home that yez met me here."

"That's all O K, Biddy, and don't you tell the ould lady you met me here. Ta ta, fair saintess."—Texas Siftings.

Our Intention.

The desiderata for a paper intended for family reading are simple. They consist simply of the best reading at the least expense; and not only the purest and most innocent reading, but with an interest unimpaired by its harmlessness. Such a paper must be spirited and interesting, without being viciously or unhealthily stimulating. It must avoid prosiness on the one hand and sensationalism on the other.

It is this sort of a publication that THE FARMER'S WIFE is, and it is alone in the field.

Every line of type in this paper is the result of deliberation and close, critical scrutiny. The subjects of its stories are selected with abundant care, and their execution guarded by every precaution towards the production of a perfect publication for the family circle. To make THE FARMER'S WIFE worthy of its name is no easy task.

Facts are indisputable evidence. Study this number of THE FARMER'S WIFE and be convinced that ours is no idle boast.

Our Future.

We are unable to forecast, to any certain extent, the program for the future. Suffice it will be a most brilliant one for it will include the best in its line that the literary and intellectual activity of the day provides. No source of supply has been left unexplored. The brightest talents have been levied upon, and a long list of favorites in the field of fiction, and of new men and women whose merit is destined to place them among the favorites, is the result. That the program will receive constant amplifications and improvements goes without saying, but even in its present form it will be found exceptionally attractive.

Our Field.

In the field of short stories, complete in one number, provisions have been made for representing writers from all parts of America, letters from some of the best women writers in the land.

Mrs. M. E. LEASE is in Iowa lecturing this month.

You seldom hear a woman brag about her ancestors, or her husband's progeny.

From late reports we learn that Mrs. Annie D. Weaver is doing noble work in western New York.

The American Federation in convention at Detroit, Mich., a few days ago, endorsed woman suffrage.

Mrs. SARAH POLK, widow of President James K. Polk, died August 15, aged about eighty-eight years.

Our fashion journals have considerable to recommend in dress reform, but we notice the price remains the same.

EVERY farmer who expects to pay off his mortgage without an increase of the volume of money need not go to the trouble of making a will.

Gov. HUMPHREY, of Kansas, has gone to Ohio, where he will make several speeches for McKinley; or rather one speech in several different places.

The People's Party of Ohio have endorsed woman's rights. They are the only party that will speak in unmeasurable terms of the rights of woman.

The People's Party legislature of Kansas passed a bill for woman suffrage, but a republican senate refused to concur, and it failed to become a law.

Mrs. ALLEN, of Pittsburg, Kas., was an honored delegate to the Knights of Labor convention at Manhattan and was initiated into the state assembly.

It is announced that Mrs. Helen M. Gougar is to follow Major McKinley in the Ohio campaign. He will talk high tariff and protection; she will talk low tariff and prohibition.

WE received a receipt from a lady friend for making lemon pie, in which she adds "sit on a hot stove and keep stirring;" just as though you could sit on a hot stove and not stir.

THE farmers' legislature has driven money out of the State. Has it? Well it will bring it back again. You give us no money, we give you nothing to eat. Farmers, hold your wheat!

Like the clouds that bode disaster,
Woman comes without a master;
Warning, too, she cries be ready,
Meet the tempest calm and steady.
She is coming, fast and faster;
Woman votes without disaster.

JULIA WARD HOWE writes: "The woman suffrage movement is a part of the new order. We are becoming baptized into the great faith of a common humanity. Woman, now is your time!"

A CHICAGO exchange says that there is a woman in Topeka that wears a No. 13½ shoe. A 13½ shoe is less than a No. 1, and we gracefully accept the charge. The women in Kansas don't brag much on their feet, but they have a wonderful big heart.

No women or children exist in the moon,
The philosophers all of them say;
Perhaps the old man in the moon is a jay;
We'll venture to say
He is not in favor of woman suffrage, any way.

"THE FARMER'S FRIEND" is the official paper of the Farmers' Alliance and People's Party of Allen county. The leading paper of Southern Kansas. The Friend should be in every household. $1 per year in advance. Sample copies free.

WOMEN do not step out to help win the most desperate battle that was ever fought with a spirit of having a great favor conferred upon her by the husbands and brothers, but with the same spirit that she presides over her home. It is her God-given right.

A LETTER from a new subscriber from South Wales, says a bill has passed Parliament to abolish rural voting and in favor of woman suffrage. It provides for the enfranchisement of all married women, regardless of age, girls marry as young as ten and twelve years and have a right to the ballot.

EVERY few days we are advised through the associated press that the President spent the day quietly at the white house. It is pleasant, indeed, to know that he is in a quiet mood, and does not put in his time scolding his wife, swearing at his lady stenographer, and breaking up things generally.

Mrs. M. B. WOODWORTH, the wonderful evangelist of national reputation, has just closed a successful and, we might say, marvelous revival meeting in Topeka. She has been instrumental, through the power of God, in bringing many of those in the lower walks of life to salvation. A church has been organized with upwards of two hundred members.

EVA McDONALD VALSH, one of our most valuable correspondents, is delivering a series of lectures in western New York. She writes us that the women take the lead in the Alliance movement in that state. Mrs. McDonald, throws her heart and soul into this glorious work, and from the glowing reports we hear we judge her work is not in vain.

LET the good work go on. Every day we get letters congratulating us on our courage in starting a paper to enlighten women on the topics of the day. Sisters on the farm, take time to read the paper. Every issue will be better. We have the very best lady writers of the times, and they will do all they can to help you. Keep up courage, we will all stand together; tyranny cannot reign supreme.

Mrs. FANNIE MCCORMICK, of Great Bend, Kansas, was elected state worthy form of the Knights of Labor at their recent meeting at Manhattan. This is the first recognition of woman as a state officer in the Knights of Labor and their opening their doors to women is not only commendable but their choice of so worthy a woman as their foreman is exceedingly gratifying not only to the Knights of Labor but throughout the state.

THE two old parties went into a trance last fall, and they tell of wonderful visions revealed to them. They saw themselves as others see them. Then the guardian angel permitted them to get a glimpse of a new party clothed in purity and love to all mankind. They saw, too, as noble men as ever wore the blue or the grey, carrying a beautiful banner with this motto inscribed thereon: "Equal rights to all men and women and special privileges to none." And as they carried that banner so that all might see, even the angel shouted "Amen!"

THE Hon. Wm. Higgins is right; prohibition is a statutory law and a fixed fact and has no more business in the platform of a political party than any other law. This is what the Alliance claimed last fall, but some cranky preachers, who think more of the republican party than they do of principle and the love of home, want it placed there to get votes, and then place whiskey men on their ticket for christian people to vote for. Our prohibition law is used too much for political gain and strength, and thus the failure in some places.

SOME people think equal suffrage is numbered among the impossibilities. Nothing is impossible for women to accomplish in the way of reform. When a woman will she will, and when she won't she won't. And women will not tolerate any longer taxation without representation. Paste this in your hats. Just because a republican senate refused to enact a law giving women the ballot, by which act prohibition would have been as firm as the mountains, does not mean that all Kansas wants whiskey. Oh, no! no!

THE Atlanta Constitution has the following to say of Mrs. Lease's speech near that city August 4th:

The day has been one of beauty with hardly a cloud to mar the beauty of the bright sunshine. Rosemount is a perfect paradise of flowers. The crowd began to assemble early in the morning; by ten o'clock the tremendous amphitheatre was the scene of a good natured crowd which seemed to be in sympathy with the movement. After music by the Weber band, of Cincinnati, Mr. Livingston introduced one of the most, if not altogether the most famous woman on earth, Mrs. Mary E. Lease, the friend of all good and the exposé of all things corrupt in politics. She then proceeded to deliver a most eloquent oration; a speech no statesman might not have been proud to have called his own; one which was as full of wisdom and strength as it was devoid of malice and bigotry. She is a friend of the Alliance.

KENTUCKY has elected a farmers' legislature. Of course it will be in order now for the shlylock to threaten the withdrawal of money from the State.

GOD bless the rich! the poor can beg.

THE women are beginning to look at politics in a business way.

THE government makes the bond good for the rich; why not make a paper dollar good for the poor?

WE would advise the woman's suffrage association to get to the front in the great revolution of reform.

THE reform element of Australia endorsed woman suffrage and elected 26 Representatives to Parliament a few weeks ago. Let the good work go on.

THE reformers are again successful in Argentine Republic, and claim that they caused the Bearing bank failure, which was a god-send to that country; while the money power even in America claim it a great disaster.

The Relief Boat.

[For THE FARMER'S WIFE.]

MRS EMMA PACK.

Friends, jump on the relief boat
The people are building;
Tarry not, I warn you,
Do not stand by doubting.

The prospects are too bright,
So labor, one and all,
Put your shoulders to the wheel
And do not let your spirits fail.

For God and the women
Are all for the right,
So jump on the relief boat
And never cease to fight.

The Lord will defend this cause,
Its just, its right, its true;
So to the work, gird on your armor
And fight this battle through.

And then in '92
We'll raise the banner high;
Not one will we see mourning,
Not one to grieve or sigh.

For our troubles will be buried,
Our future will be bright,
And each and every prayer will be,
"God, keep our people right."

Oh! then the tollers of our land,
Just one day out of seven,
May lay aside their work,
And hark to God's holy word,
And prepare their souls for heaven.

My thoughts, fair maid, when I am down,
Will often turn to Kansas town,
And as the sunflower greets the sun,
My thoughts will greet thee, blithesome one.
Thy posies thou hast showered elsewhere,
But posies perish—light as air;
Two flowers as fair as man could see,
Thine eyes, fair one, were sometimes cast on me.
And though I journey 'neath the sky,
In latitudes both low and high,
My thoughts will stray, I'm sore afraid,
To thee, fair Kansas' fairest maid.

—The Mortgage.

Such thoughts, fair maid, this I must own,
Are often heard in Kansas town,
And as the raindrop greets the sun,
Flatterers will seek thee, sweetest one.
Since thou hast elsewhere posies showered
Who seeks to win you is a coward.
Thine eyes, fair one, are not for those Who in monopoly and trusts repose—
For one of these beneath the sky,
In poetry no longer shy,
Has penned the words, I'm sore afraid,
To win another's Kansas maid.

ORGANIZED WOMEN.

A Movement on Foot to Organize The National Women's Alliance.

Steps have already been taken to organize the National Women's Alliance, to be composed of farmers wives and the women of trades unions and wage workers.

There are no women in the world that need recreation and rest more than the above-mentioned class.

Women's clubs, alliances and societies are springing up in nearly every neighborhood, all over the land. The woman's suffrage and W. C. T. U. are perhaps paramount at present, but the Womens' Alliance is spreading rapidly, and it is safe to say will be the leading organization of women in the United States.

The Ladies' Christian Alliance, of Texas, has been fully organized and is doing good work. Mary M. Clardy, Sulphur Springs, Texas, is the secretary of its association.

The Illinois Womens' Alliance objects are justice to children, loyalty to women; and is provided over by Corinne S. Brown.

A SOCIETY known as the Alliance Aid Society has local organizations in several States.

THE Alliance Auxiliary is organized locally in South Carolina.

The Alliance Womens' Association of Kansas, organized over a year ago, with its motto, equal rights to all. Mrs. S. E. McCanley, of Hasington, president.

THE Factory Girls' Union, Women Wage Earners' branch of the Alliance, Womens' Labor Union, Alliance Kindergarten, are among the societies that propose to unite in the one national organization, to be called the Womens' National Alliance.

STATE AFFAIRS

And Capital City News of State Interest

Republican Leagues.

The convention of the Kansas republican leagues, with about 700 delegates and many visitors, held their session in representative hall at the state house. The following resolutions were adopted:

Believing that it is not the province of this convention to formulate a platform for the republican party, we content ourselves with the following declarations:

First—We heartily approve the strong, able and successful administration of President Harrison. We recognize in the action of the president, the members of his cabinet, and the republican leaders in the late congress such a wise, conservative and patriotic policy as will insure prosperity and promote the interests of all our people. We especially commend the policy of reciprocity, whereby the trade of this country will be increased by commercial treaties with other nations, and we cordially commend the vigorous foreign policy which has characterized this administration.

Second—We commend the unexampled liberality of the late republican congress in granting pensions to ex-union soldiers and sailors, their widows and orphans.

Third—We recognize the obedience of representatives to the expressed will of the people as the essential principle of republican government, and we, therefore, commend the late republican congress for its faithful adherence to pledges of the republican platform of 1888.

Fourth—We indorse the American doctrine of protection as essential to the maintenance of our industrial independence and the dignity of American labor.

Fifth—We especially commend the policy of the administration in the opening of public lands to settlers, and trust that this policy will be continued, and that all remaining public lands may be opened to actual settlers as rapidly as possible; and we also commend the administration for its application of the principle of local self-government to the territories for the first time in the history of the nation.

Sixth—We commend the liberal financial policy of the administration by which over $60,000,000 of silver has been added to the circulation during the past year, while paper, silver and gold have been maintained at par, and we are heartily in favor of the coinage of the full output of the silver mines of the United States.

Seventh—We endorse the republican state administration and condemn the last house of representatives of this state for wastefulness and extravagance. We also condemn it for its attempt to enact laws tending to arouse alarm and distrust and destroy the credit of the state; and we denounce the leaders of the people's party for their malicious misrepresentations of the resources and indebtedness of the people of this state, to which misrepresentations we attribute in large measure any hardships which the people of the state may experience in the adjustment of their indebtedness; and we hereby declare as republicans our belief that the people of Kansas are not only able but willing to pay every dollar of such indebtedness, and we now, as in the past, condemn repudiation in all its forms.

Eighth—We are unalterably opposed to the sub-treasury and government loan schemes of the people's party and to the government ownership of railroads and other means of transportation, believing that such schemes are visionary, impracticable and subversive of the principles of free government.

Ninth—We urge the republicans of the state to suppress factional feeling, waive differences of opinion, and unite for a vigorous and successful campaign, believing as we do that if to our bountiful crops and high prices is added a republican victory, Kansas will at once enter upon a renewed season of prosperity.

Tenth—That we, the republican league club of Kansas, in convention assembled, send greetings to the republican league clubs of Ohio; and congratulate them on the noble fight they are making to elect as governor of their great commonwealth that able champion of republicans, William McKinley, Jr.

[FOR FARMER'S WIFE.]

WHY?

BY EMILY ACTON.

What does she want, this woman strangely bold,
Who knocks and knocks and will not be deflected?
Why is she not contented as of old,
Nestling down meekly by the fireside?
That is the place for woman, fair and sweet:
Her throne, the honored wife and mother's chair:
Not the great hall, where thronging thousands meet,
And din of worldly battles fills the air.
Is she not wrapped about with tenderest care,
And man obedient to her every thought?
Why should she seek to stand and struggle where
The bitter battles of the world are fought?
Over some piece of shop work. Heaven and earth!
I call ye both to witness that if men
Were doomed to toil as women, from their birth,
The world would soon be wilderness again?
And there are places where the midnight goes
In revelry and pleasure; song and wine
Are flushing rosy cheeks to deeper rose,
And honeyed words make bright eyes brighter shine:
Yes, but the circle ever downward trends,
And in its lowest depths are saddest lights;
There, with loud song a rude, coarse laughter
blends,
And shadowy forms flit shameless through the night.
These dreful shadows of the under world
It is not fitting she should know, men say;
True: but to their dark depths are women buried From squalid homes and work-shops, every day.
Day after day, where wheels of traffic turn,
Fading and worn with hunger and distress;
Striving a little more reward to earn,
And finding her employer give her less.
What shall she do, this creature, born a queen;
With right to God's own sunshine and pure
air?
Debating, and deciding, oft, between
Death and a life of utter, dark despair.
Do not, good men, by all that in them lies,
Strive to defeat these evils, hour by hour;
And do you blame a woman, when, with eyes
Tear-wet, she asks the gift of higher power?
That power so potent in this struggling earth,
That which can make the poor man equal
stand
With him who in a palace had his birth:
That power which sways the fortunes of the land.
But softly! for the wise sit apart,
(And when they perish, wisdom sure will die),
And say, "The throne of woman is man's heart;
There let her bide until these storms go by."
"Better for her to seek the gentler rule
Of learning, piety or household tasks,
Marry, bear children, sew, or teach a school;
Only in these she finds the power she asks."
Fine words! But when men's law a woman ranks
With paupers, idiots and the zone of crime,
Small wonder if she fails to offer thanks.
The century's clock is striking now the time.
When she should rise and take her proper place;
She who can think, and feel, and work, and
plan.
And do her part to elevate the race
And have an equal right in life with man.

More Leisure For Women.

BY MRS. EVA McDONALD VALESCH.

When asked to contribute an occasional article to the FARMER'S WIFE, it struck me that there was a new departure in literary work.
Some writer has recently noted the tendency towards specialism in newspaper and magazine work. There is no fad too absurd, no sect so narrow, no school of thought so peculiar but that it has its organ to represent its views.
It seemed to me, however, that this paper was destined to fill a niche hitherto neglected or despised. The growing importance of the Alliance movement is daily bringing the "farmer class"—as it is styled—before the public in such a way that it can no longer be ignored as it has been in the past. Naturally the farmer's wife is participating in the various phases of the movement, although not to the extent that she should.
Hitherto all classes of educators seemed to have assumed, as a self-evident proposition, that the farmer's wife is the one class of womanhood that neither desires nor needs to participate in the plans for lifting the sex to its proper plane.
The only kind of education offered to the farmer's wife is of the sort that would tend to starve and paralyze any brain endowed with normal activity or intelligence.
I have lately traveled through the agricultural district of New York State. With an article for this paper in mind, I took special pains to investigate the kind of mental food being served to our farmer's wives. I found various agricultural and even Alliance papers. All had a "woman's department." There were also several publications, of more or less pretentious character, devoted exclusively to woman's "peculiar interests." The class of information contained in these papers might be classified under three heads:
1. The way to manage husbands. This forms the greater portion of such writings. I want to enter a protest. In the first place, discussion of the ways of people of the masculine persuasion are of much more practical interest to those who have not yet had the opportunity of "managing" one than to those who have. Then, even to those who are wives and perhaps personally interested in the topic, of what use is any other person's experience when applied to your case? An analysis of other peoples' domestic affairs can only be of value to the psychologist, and farmers' wives have no time to study the "ologies." Why all this talk about managing husbands? Did you ever see a man's pet paper filled with columns of advice about how to manage wives? Wouldn't you think a man had softening of the brain who would religiously wade through columns of slush, telling him just how to part his hair and arrange his necktie so as not to lose his wife's loving regard? Yet such topics are popularly supposed to be of absorbing interest to women in general and farmers' wives in particular.
2. How to take care of babies. This topic is perhaps a little more excusable than the preceding. Mothers naturally think anything concerning the welfare or comfort of their little one of value and interest. But the kind of information that these publications give about babies is apt to be a severe mental shock to those who have made any study of natural laws and their application. I'll tell you the reason why: In nine cases out of ten the baby department is managed by an old maid. Her practical ignorance of the subject may partially excuse the sort of literature she inflicts on fond mothers.

3. How to be economical in the household. I suppose economy is one of the necessities of our condition. The majority of farmers' wives spend the best years of their lives reducing economy to a science. There are yards of advice about turning old dresses to look new, wise hints about the transformation of dry goods boxes into beautiful furniture, but not a whisper about the industrial conditions which force the farmer's wife to be a household drudge and wear out her energies trying to make ends meet. Not a word about the amount of the farmers' earnings that goes to support wives of speculators and millionaires in idleness and luxury.
I would make a more emphatic protest against this kind of home literature only I find it doesn't do much harm after all, because farmers' wives can seldom take time to read it. The fact is they are obliged to toil so incessantly that reading and recreation become almost unknown pleasures.
A little incident happened one day last week which amused me and at the same time illustrated how far the farmers' wives have conformed to their industrial conditions.
Having some hours to wait for a train, I walked along a country road, admiring the scenery and occasionally stopping to gather the red raspberries which covered the bushes by the roadside and looked so inviting. On the way I met a farmer's wife, carrying a pail of berries. She evidently had been a finely proportioned, handsome woman. She did not appear to be over 35 years old, but her face was marred with deep lines, the black locks were threaded with silver, hard work and exposure had racked and bent her frame with rheumatism. She told me that all her spare time from house work was spent in picking berries to sell. Without the little additions made to their income in that way they could hardly eke out a bare subsistence.
Finally after telling me all about herself, she asked: "What are you doing?"
"Just walking for exercise and picking raspberries because I like them," I replied.
She looked at me in blank astonishment for a few moments and finally ejaculated:
"Wa! I've got my opinion of people that jest stroll around fer exercise and pick raspberries fer fun insted o' sellin' 'em."
She had become so accustomed to bending every energy to toil and of economizing every penny, that she had forgotten, or perhaps never realized, that innocent recreation is one of Nature's provisions for health. The animals of the field have it, but our industrial system denies it to human beings.
Anybody who is at all familiar with the conditions under which the farmers' wives work, would almost hesitate to educate them to a sense of the burdens which that class endures, if there is no escape from the present condition. If it is a sort of Divine dispensation, as some people are fond of teaching, why make the farmer's wife discontented by a knowledge of her true condition? If patient resignation be the only course, why teach her to forget that life means anything but drudgery? Don't educate her, don't teach her to appreciate books or music, don't tell her the wonders of science and art, don't even let her learn to read and write,—you know the southern planters did not let their slaves learn to read, because they knew that an intelligent people could not long be kept in subjection.
The only way to make the farmer's wife submissive and truly satisfied with her condition is to keep her in dense ignorance of anything outside her daily round of work. If she protests that there is still a longing unsatisfied, why teach her to be "patient," and the account will be balanced in the next world. But don't, don't teach her to look for anything in this life.
Now we who contribute our mite to this paper, feel that we represent the new school of thought. It teaches that the present industrial system is nothing more nor less than industrial slavery. It oppresses woman more than man, because she has a two-fold mission to perform.
We believe that women, as a class, fail to find the best development of their mental, moral and physical natures, and that they fail through no lack of inclination on their own part. The opportunity is wanting. We believe the farmer's wife the representative of all that is womanly and true and noble in the womanhood of America. The women of this country should find their best examples among those who toil honestly and patiently every day, rather than among "society" women who spend life in an unceasing round of frivolity.
Circumstances largely determine what women shall be. The circumstances of the farmer's wife prevent her from developing either heart or intellect.
Believing in the motto that the "Lord helps them who help themselves," let the farmers' wives begin an agitation for better conditions. Let them no longer believe that progress is denied to them alone. To many women, over the door of the farm-house is written "Who enters here leaves hope behind." We will take that down, and begin to discuss hopeful measures.
The first requisite for improvement is LEISURE. In a future article I will take the liberty of expressing my personal opinion as to how the hours of toil shall be shortened.
Now a closing word about the criticism I made regarding papers devoted to woman's interests. Of course the household should receive due attention, but such topics should not exclude those of greater importance. Let us proceed according to the axiom that the greater includes the lesser. Let's find out what wrong is at the root of affairs, and the details will easily adjust themselves.

SALTING A GHOST.

Novel Way of Disposing of a Bogus Spook.

JOHN P. HARTWELL, a well-known Southsider, who is engaged as agent for the Rockwell & Stanniford Steam Packing Company, of New York, during the day, in an evil hour was persuaded by a friend to give up his comfortable quarters on Wabash avenue and move into a new flat building on West Monroe street. His family consists of his wife and three children. His wife's sister, an unmarried lady, also resides with them.

"It was the last place in the world," said Mr. Hartwell, in conversation with the writer, "where one would expect to encounter spooks or ghosts. In the first place the building was brand new, and according to tradition no respectable spook ever attaches himself to a place that has not a record of at least twenty years behind it. We had the middle flat. Both under us and above us the apartments were occupied by respectable people.

"The only possible fault to be found was that overhead a young gentleman habitually played the Boulanger March at all hours, sometimes far into the night. He appeared to be pleased with the tune and he was what is known in the musical world as a key-thumper. Otherwise all our neighbors were entirely objectionable.

"The very first day we moved in, however, the fun—if you like to call it that, though it wasn't—began.

"Trouble commenced in the dining room at nine o'clock that evening. It was very late, owing to moving, before we sat down to supper. I had been hauling around furniture and putting down carpets all day long and was as hungry as a hawk; so were we all. We had not yet completed arrangements with the gas company and the room was but dimly lighted by one lamp. The whole place had a chilly, uncomfortable air about it. I was just about to help the children when from the wall, apparently just over my head, there issued forth the most horrible, uncanny sound which ever assailed mortal ears. It was like the wail of some lost spirit, rising higher and higher, until from a degree of ear-splitting intensity it died away to an unearthly whisper.

"What on earth's that?" exclaimed my wife, as her knife and fork fell rattling on her plate from her nerveless fingers. Little Edie broke out howling, and Jack jumped up as if struck by lightning and rushed into a dark closet. The infernal noise even woke the baby in the cradle, who howled dismally. My wife's sister turned pale as a sheet.

"I must confess I was somewhat rattled myself. However, with a good deal of coaxing and pooh-poohing, I got them all back to the table, and we finished the meal. I can't say we enjoyed it. We were not again disturbed that night, and by the morning the 'spook noise,' as we dubbed it, had become rather the subject of jest than otherwise.

"I was kept late down town that evening. On my return to the flat I found Mrs. Hartwell crying and the children terror-stricken. They had had supper at six, and at that meal had been again disturbed by the ghostly sounds. Little Edie had been so badly frightened that she had been nearly thrown into convulsions. My wife threw her arms around my neck and sobbed bitterly.

"Oh, John, for goodness' sake take me out of this horrible place."

"Pooh, pooh, my dear," I said, trying to soothe her. "Look at the cost and trouble of moving. Besides, I've taken the flat for a year."

"Again that unearthly sound issued from the dining-room. I was pretty well frightened myself this time, but my rage as I looked upon the shrinking

"THE MOMENT THE SPOOK BEGINS, PULL THE TRIGGER!"

forms of my wife and her sister and heard the screams of my children overcame my timidity. I rushed into the dining-room. The ghastly wail, blood-curdling in its intensity, was dying away in hollow cadences. I searched everywhere for some hole or cranny from which the noise might have proceeded, and, finding none, lit a lantern and went down into the basement, searching the coal-bin and every place, in fact, likely to conceal a practical joker. The most careful searching, however, failed utterly to throw any light on the subject.

"Two days went by and we heard nothing further. On the third evening, however, my wife was suffering from nervous headache. Overhead the young gentleman with the red hair was playing that everlasting 'Boulanger March.' People who live in flats have no right to play the piano until nearly midnight. At the risk of making bad blood between the two families, I went upstairs, stated that my wife was sick and politely requested the proprietor of the flat to ask his son to desist. He was quite rude about it, and said that his son was studying music, and had a perfect right to play day or night. Finally the fellow almost shut the door in my face, and I went downstairs swearing to myself like a pirate. As I lay in bed that night, I couldn't sleep thinking that the red-haired musician might be at the bottom of the spook business.

"In the morning I got up early, went down town, hired a detective, and brought him back just in time to be able to point out my red-haired friend as he was getting on a street car.

"You follow that fellow," I said. "I believe he's at the bottom of all this tomfoolery." I had got so I laughed at the spook theory myself; but Mrs. Hartwell, her sister and the children still lived in terror, lest a repetition of the hideous sounds should occur. I felt quite exhilarated when I saw my detective jump on the car with the red-headed musician, in order to follow him down town. He came into my office at four o'clock in the afternoon, and I saw success written unmistakably on his every feature.

"That's the fellow who's playing ghost," he said. "He works for a big insurance company. I have found out he's bragging to his fellow clerks of the nice scare he's given you all. He seems to think it a splendid joke. He's invited two friends of his up to-night to see the fun, as he calls it. The spooks will wait again this evening, you may bet your boots. Are you very busy?"

"Not particularly."

"Well then, we'll go right up to your flat at once, and fix this fellow up a nice, warm reception."

"Arrived at my flat, the first thing the detective did was to ask to be shown the dining-room, and then to request the loan of a carving-knife. I watched him as he went around thumping on the walls, with looks of sheer amazement.

"What on earth are you looking for?"

"I am looking for a speaking tube. Ah, here it is. See the handle of the knife has gone clear through the paper."

"The break in the paper was directly over my head. It was just the very spot from which the spook sounds had issued."

"But where does the tube lead to?" I inquired.

"Never mind that," replied the detective. "When the spook begins to wail the red-headed fellow will be at the other end. Maybe it leads upstairs—maybe down stairs. What time is it?"

THE SPOOK SALTED.

"Half-past five."

"We have no time to lose. Let me have some salt."

"Then the detective took out his pistol, and drawing a bullet from one of the cartridges carefully reloaded it with salt. This done, we went to the front window, and waited the arrival of the red-headed musician. Peeping cautiously from behind the curtain we saw the fellow creep into the basement, having first directed his friends to the stairway, up which we could hear them slowly creeping.

"Give me a stick," whispered the detective. "Those fellows are waiting outside your door to listen to the fun. Now you go into the dining-room. The moment the spook begins just you place this pistol to the mouth of the speaking tube and pull the trigger."

"But it will kill him!"

"No, it won't. It will only salt him—and he's fresh enough in all conscience."

"I did as directed. Hurrying into the dining room I took my station at the table. In the passage the detective stood, stick in hand, with his fingers on the door-knob. Suddenly from the tube came the same weird, awful cry, intensified by the removal of the paper—if anything. As a spook cry it was a glorious success. I almost hated to spoil it.

"The next moment, however, I placed the muzzle of the pistol within the tube and pulled the trigger.

"I had no need to put my ear to the tube to listen for the result. While the smoke was yet curling around the opening there came from below a succession of the most unearthly howls, while cuss-words innumerable rent the air of the dining-room.

"At the same moment the detective sprang out upon the landing and found the red-haired musician's friends on their knees at the keyhole.

"Whack! whack! whack! came the heavy stick on the shoulders of the unfortunate. 'I'll teach you to frighten women and children.' The cavedroppers, two great, hulking fellows, fled howling downstairs, where they ran full tilt into the red-haired musician. The latter was not much injured; but no doubt he got well salted, for when next I saw him he had his face tied up in a handkerchief. Of course he has threatened suit; but I told him two could play at that game. I don't believe spooks have any rights, anyhow, which a court of law is bound to respect."—Chicago Journal.

Hints to Girls.

[FOR THE FARMER'S WIFE.]

MISS MAUD E. PACK.

If I were you, girls, I would have an aim in life. I would set my mark high, and would not fall short of it. The adage, "where there's a will there is a way," is as true as steel.

I would imitate the neatness and gentility of my mother.

I would pride myself on the respectability of my family.

I would keep good company or none at all.

I would read good books, such as would enlarge my mind and fit me for a higher life.

I would be truthful in my actions as well as in my words.

I would throw away my simple ways and saucy looks if I had any.

I would show people that being a girl did not keep me from possessing good common sense and a sound mind.

I would not let one of the opposite sex overreach me in climbing the "Hill of Science."

I would choose for a husband, if I chose any, a man of unblemished character. It would be said, "She has done well."

I would learn the law of kindness.

I would continually seek the companionship of the three graces,—Perseverance, Fortbearance and Endurance, until I became familiar with each of them, for a woman having these for armor is well equipped for the journey of life.

I would wear the dress of modesty with a neatly fitting cap of discretion. I would lace shoes of caution upon my feet, so that I might walk the "Imperial Highway with womanly dignity. I would encase my hands in gloves of good works, sewed with threads of deftness. Over these I would throw a wrap of Fatherly protection.

Importance of Small Farms—An Important Subject for Farmers to Discuss—How to Make a Drinking Fountain for Poultry—Live-Stock Notes—The Dairy, Household, and Kitchen.

THE FARM.

Roads.
ONE of the most important subjects that farmers can discuss at their institutes is the improvement of country roads. Within the last quarter of a century marvelous improvements have been made in railway and ocean transportation, but within that time there has been little or no progress in the making or improving of common country roads. Railroad transportation rates have been reduced until it costs no more to carry a bushel of grain to the seaboard than it does to haul it the average distance from the farm to the railroad. It does not look very well, then, to be grumbling about freight rates when there is such an enormous waste of power dragging loads of grain from the farm to town over bad roads. Good roads would greatly lower the cost of transportation, and bring the farmer nearer the market. In no better way can the selling value of the average farm be increased than by good roads. The popular way to make any expense absorbed is to show it up as a tax. A very good application of this can be made to bad roads. Some of the taxes about which the farmer is urged to grumble are utterly insignificant in comparison with the indirect taxation of the bad road over—and often through—which he hauls his products to market. It costs money to build good roads, but they are worth all they cost. It costs a good deal more to travel over bad ones than it does to build good ones. One of the best things the farmers of any community could do for themselves and the common welfare is to unite and thoroughly improve the highways. The best methods of doing this should be discussed and decided upon at the institutes, and organized efforts made to carry out the improvements.—Farm and Fireside.

Importance of Small Farms.

The most successful farming I have ever seen has been on small farms, says Waldo P. Brown in Country Gentleman, and in my own practice the most profitable and pleasant farming I ever did was on a farm of forty acres. A majority of farmers, I think have too many acres, and would make more money and do less hard work if a part of their land were sold and the money invested in improving the acres left. Many farmers act as though they considered the great object in life to be possessed of many acres, while undoubtedly it ought to be to enjoy comfort as they pass along their journey. I have had a chance to contrast the large and small farms to some extent the past winter, and I have been confirmed in the opinion that as a rule the man with a small farm has less care and a larger per cent of profit than one with a large farm. On a large farm there is a loss of time in drawing the crops, taking out manure, and in getting around to feed stock, and the owner cannot give that personal attention to which the owner of a small farm can, and as a consequence there must be innumerable small losses which aggregate a large sum. The man who manages a small farm, first to supply his family all that he possibly can for their support and comfort, and then chooses wisely some specialty for a money product, will, as a rule, be found prosperous even in hard times. I have not met a better specialist at the institutes the past winter who was complaining of hard times. I have known poultry farms run at a handsome profit, and various specialties which have brought comfort and competence to their owners. The family with a full supply of fruit, vegetables, poultry and dairy products, meats and breadstuffs supplied by the farm, and which has a surplus of cash to dispose of to pay bills, can live easily and comfortably on a small farm, and will not need to cultivate a great breadth to meet expenses, for these can be kept down to a low limit. It is not the acres we cultivate, nor even the bushels of grain produced, that determine the profit of farming, but the most important factor of all is the art of production, and next to that is the wisdom with which we feed and sell the products of the farm. A common mistake and one which often means lifelong bondage for the farmer and his wife is to buy a second farm after they reach middle life and run in debt for a part of it and increase their cares and labor without increasing their net profits.

Ditcher for Surface Drainage in Wheat.
The generally accepted opinion among leading farmers is that land for winter wheat should not be plowed near the time of sowing, but should receive frequent shallow cultivation and be compacted as much as possible. This top cultivation naturally fills up the furrows. To re-open these use a ditcher. Easily made and costs little. This implement used before—not after—the drill will lift the soil out of the furrows and the wings will spread it back evenly, leaving the land nicely rounded to be crossed at right angles by the drill, and the little channels made by the feet of the drill should be left unmolested to form a ready exit for superfluous water. Description: A—pole 7 feet long, 10 inches in diameter. B—wings 4 feet long and 4 inches by 1½ inches, screwed to the upper part of A with one or two braces further back. C—point, the foot of an old cultivator, whi do. D—about 2½ feet of old sleigh shoeing attached to A and C by the same two bolts. E—piece of old saw for sharp edged tool projecting downward through A to act as a rudder. Total cost: A little ingenuity, one and one-half hours' work and a blacksmith's bill of 45 cents.—J. H. Cannon, in Practical Farmer.

Livestock Notes.

The following notes on stock are from the columns of the Northwestern Farmer. In the Summer at least, mill feeds can be purchased and fed to pigs with profit. If you are breeding pigs to sell young raise the ones most sought for in your vicinity. WHEAT middlings is a good material for growth, and corn one of the very best to fatten. Pigs naturally have a strong, quick digestion when it is not over crowded or clogged. IMPROPER feeding of the dam often causes serious disorders with the pigs. Use care in this respect.

With pigs, young animals give a better return for the food given than those that are more matured. BREED, feed, fatten, and market the hogs young. This is the surest way of clearing the most profit.

If you are feeding for profit see that the pigs have a good pasture, fresh water, and a comfortable shade. PROPERLY fed out a ton of wheat middlings will go farther in making growth with pigs than a ton of corn.

One advantage in letting pigs have the run of a good pasture is that they will usually take all needed exercise. WHEN they can be secured at a reasonable cost threshed oats make a splendid feed for a young growing pigs.

The secret of good breeding is that the extra food digested goes to profit while if there is no gain it is wasted. It is poor economy to keep a pig poor and lean all summer in order to give him a good appetite for corn in the fall.

Young growing pigs crave a variety of food, and it can be given in their sties to a better advantage than in any other way. THE sow or boar that has nothing to recommend it but pedigree, should be fattened and marketed as soon as possible.

THE POULTRY YARD.

Packing Eggs.

After procuring baskets of light, tough material and proper sizes, writes F. E. Nuss to Fancier and Farm Journal, I place a lining of two or three thicknesses of paper on the sides and bottom of basket. Place a layer of Excelsior three-fourth or one inch deep in bottom; then take each egg and wrap it separately in one or two thicknesses of paper (any kind of tough paper will answer). Taking a small bunch of excelsior wrap each egg, seeing that it is completely covered with a thin layer. Place them in the basket close together large end down, as they will stand long transportation and rougher usage better in this way than any other. When they are all in, press excelsior between sides of basket and eggs; then put a lawyer of same on top of eggs one to one and a half inches thick; then lay two or three thicknesses of paper on this. Take a strong muslin, cut out a piece a little larger than the inside of the basket. Take a strong needle (a small sack needle is best) and twine, and sew through the sides of the basket and edge of muslin, drawing the muslin down tight. Now, fasten your card on the muslin; tie shipping tag, with purchaser's name and address, on the handle of basket. Then you have a package that you may feel sure will reach its destination safely, if any of them will. The lining of the basket and the wrapping of the eggs with paper may be dispensed with later in the season, when danger of the eggs becoming chilled is passed.

Drinking Fountain.

Charles I. Junkin, in the Practical Farmer, thus tells how to make a drinking fountain for poultry. Materials: An old or new baking pan, the larger the better, and an old box, large enough to hold the pan. Run the pan into the box like the bottom drawer of a bureau, allowing it to protrude two inches, and then board up the rest of the box. Six advantages: 1st. Cheap. 2d. Easily made. 3d. Shaded from the sun. 4th. Cannot be upset. 5th. Water cannot be soiled. 6th. Easily filled and easily cleaned.

Poultry Notes.

NEVER expect hens to pay for themselves in winter unless you give them a little extra care.

NEVER fail to have a good supply of gravel where it is available for use when the snow is on the ground.

NEVER begrudge a few dollars for some fresh blood each year, for it will always be worth more than it cost you if you get the right stuff.

NEVER cheat yourself with the idea that there is as much profit in an old hen as there is in a young one. An old hen will lay quite like a young one, but not so many eggs as will a young one.

NEVER feed your chickens three times a day, twice is often enough unless it be in cold stormy weather, when it is a good plan to throw a handful of fine grain in the straw and litter at odd times to keep the hens busy.

NEVER forget that every poultry fancier has his hobby and that each and every breed has its merits, but the fowl that can stand the test of the common market is the fowl for the poor man.

THE DAIRY.

Aerating Milk.

The system of aerating, or cooling milk by air, as it passes through the milk, cools every drop and removes all the odors and gases. When we surround milk with ice and cold water, we reduce the temperature before the animal heat and gas has been displaced from the milk. So soon as the milk gets back to the temperature of the outside air, the gases re-act and rapid fermentation soon spoils the milk. Never apply cold water or ice to milk until it has first been aerated. This great invention of aerating milk not only removes the heat, odors and gases, but will largely neutralize the bad effects of impure water or impure food.

If milk were properly aerated before being taken into the system, the liability of sickness from that cause would be removed.—Grange Homes.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Household Hints.

A LITTLE salt will bring up a low fire if thrown on.

PINE floors can be treated to a coating of boiled linseed oil.

A DULLED steel pen can be improved by heating it in a gas jet.

SCRATCHES on furniture can be rubbed with beeswax melted in linseed oil.

A BAG of charcoal hung in a cistern of water will absorb all the bad odor.

Good lap rugs for use when washing a baby are made of Canton flannel.

A GOOD cement for china is ordinary carriage varnish. It is not affected by water.

BOILED starch is improved by adding a little salt, or a little dissolved gum arabic.

KEROSENE oil will soften boots and shoes that have been hardened by water, and render them as pliable as new.

TO KEEP butter hard, without ice, take a new flower-pot, wash it clean, put it in a wet cloth, and set it over the butter.

SALTS of lemon—equal parts of powdered oxalic acid and tartaric acid—applied to rust and ink spots on clothing will remove them.

TO DESTROY the odor of paint in a newly painted room, put a handful of fresh hay in a bucket of water and let it stand in the room over night.

THE KITCHEN.

Kitchen Recipes.

CREAM CANDY.—Three cups of white sugar. A little more of water than enough to cover. Do not stir while cooking. Let it boil till it ropes, then before taking it off the stove add a teaspoonful of cream of tartar moistened with the flavoring you choose. When cold, pull it until perfectly white.

MOLASSES COOKIES.—Three cupfuls of molasses and two tablespoonfuls of soda stirred together to a froth; add three well beaten eggs, a cupful of lard, a teaspoonful of ginger, and one of salt. Stir stiff, mix very stiff; they cannot be too stiff. Good ingredients are necessary to make these cakes nice.

POTATO CROQUETTES.—Season cold mash potato with pepper, salt and nutmeg. Beat to a cream with a tablespoonful of melted butter to every cupful of potato. Bind with two or three beaten eggs, and add some minced parsley. Roll into oval balls, dip in beaten egg, then in bread-crumbs, and fry in hot lard or drippings. Pile in a pyramid upon a flat dish, and serve.

Mrs. Goss' JUMPLES.—A cupful of butter, a cupful of sugar, half a cupful of sour milk, a well beaten egg, a half teaspoonful of soda. Mold in just four enough to roll out a quarter of an inch in thickness. Sprinkle sugar over the top, cut them out and bake.

Colored Mortality.

An Austin colored party named Jake was very late a few days ago, in getting down to the store. His employer, Col. Allspice, rebuked Jake in somewhat severe language.

"I want you to understand this trifling will never do. If you can't get down to your work in time, I'll hire somebody who can."

"Boss, don't be hard on me," and the Negro's eyes filled with tears.

"Why, what's the matter with you? Anybody sick?"

"Sic! I don't know which am gwinter die fust, my wife or my mudder."

"I am sorry I spoke so harshly as that. I didn't know it was as bad as that. We won't need you about the store to-day."

"Thank you, boss. Thank you kindly," and off he went.

Next morning Col. Allspice asked Jake what he meant by saying that his wife and mother were dying, when he had seen both on the street the day before?

"Dyin'!" exclaimed Jake, opening his mouth wide enough to admit of a coffee mill being thrown into it, and elevating his eyebrows in amazement.

"Yes, dying. You said they were dying, and half an hour after you left your wife came here to see if you had drawn your wages for last month."

"I nebber said dey was dying. Ef you was ter see de way dey opens dar mouts and taks in chunks of bacon, you wouldn't spec dem ob dying. I bleeve I did say I didn't know which of 'em was gwinter die fust, and I don't know that yet; deys bofe got sich good appetites—I knows one ob 'em got ter die fust, but—"

Here Col. Allspice interrupted the orator with an ax helve, and the business relations heretofore existing between them have been severed.—Texas Siftings.

Incautious Talk.

The little girl who talks to her mother in the railroad car started another cross-examination of her mother the other day as the train was dashing along toward New York. The injudicious mother was reading.

"Mamma, you didn't speak to Mrs. Brown when we got on," says the child. Her mother does not hear her.

"She's sitting right in front of us." This in a loud whisper. "Aren't you ever going to speak to her again?"

"No, dear," answered mamma, not lifting her eyes.

"Not if she takes back what she said about the choir?"

"No, dear."

Some of the neighbors begin to smile and general conversation goes out of fashion for some time.

"And I can't go to her home again?"

"No, dear."

"Has she got it on?"

There is no answer to this question, and soon in a still louder whisper comes:

"Mamma, is that the bonnet you told papa about?"

"Yes, darling."

"Are those the feathers?"

"Yes, dear."

"What made you say she looked like a fright in it?"

No answer to this.

"You told papa so."

"Yes, dear."

"Mamma," in a loud whisper, "she's looking at you."

Some one titters.

"Yes, dear."

The brakeman slams the door and the mother looks up from her book just in time to hear the child go on:

"I guess she heard what you said about the bonnet."

"What bonnet, dear?"

"Mrs. Brown's. You said—"

"Stop your chattering," says the mother sternly, while a blush steals up from her throat to her forehead. "Don't open your mouth again."

Then she reads again, but she forgets to turn pages, and the blush lingers in her cheek until the train draws into the station and the people crowd out from the car.—Chicago Times.

Our Dead Boy.

I saw my wife pull the bottom drawer of the old bureau this evening and I went softly out and wandered up and down until I knew she had shut it and gone to her sewing. We have some things laid away in that drawer which the gold of kings could not buy, and yet they are relics that grieve us until our hearts are sore. I haven't dared look at them for a year, but I remember each article. There are two worn shoes, a little chip hat with the brim gone, some stockings, pantaloons, a coat, two or three spoons, bits of crockery, a whip and several toys. Wife, poor thing, goes to that drawer every day of her life and prays over it, and lets her tears fall on the precious articles, but I dare not go. Sometimes we speak of little Jack, but not often. It has been a long time, but somehow we can't get over grieving. Sometimes when we sit alone of an evening, I writing and she sewing, a child will cry out in the street as our boy used to do, and we will both start up with beating hearts and a wild hope only to find the darkness more of a burden than ever. It is still quiet now. I look up at the window where his blue eyes used to sparkle at my coming, but he is not there. I listen for his pattering feet, his merry shout, his ringing laugh, but there is no sound. There is no one to search my pockets and tease me for presents, and I never find the chairs turned over, the broom down, or ropes tied to the door-knobs. I want some one to tease me for my knife; to ride on my shoulders; to lose my axe; to follow me to the gate when I go and be there to meet me when I come; to call "good night" from the little bed now empty. And wife, she misses him still more. There are no little feet to wash, no prayers to say, no voice teasing for lumps of sugar, or sobbing with pain from hurt toe, and she would give her life almost to wake at midnight and look across the crib and see our boy as he used to be. So we preserve our relics, and when we are dead we hope strangers will handle them tenderly, even if they shed no tears over them.

A Rhyme for Little Girls.

Prithce, tell me, don't you think Little girls are dearest,
With their cheeks of tempting pink,
And their eyes the clearest?
Don't you know that they are best
And of all the loveliest?

Of all girls with roguish ways
They are surely truest,
Sunshine gleams through all their days,
They see skies the bluest,
And they wear a diadem
Summer has bestowed on them.

Lydia does not care a cent
For the newest dances,
She is not on flirting bent,
Has no killing glances,
But without the slightest art
She has captured many a heart.

Older sisters cut you dead,
Little sisters never;
They don't giggle when they've said
Something very clever.
They just get behind a chair,
Frowning, smiling at you there.

Florence, Lydia, Margaret,
Or a gentle Mary,
They form friendships that, once set,
Never more can vary—
Staunch young friends they are and true,
Always clinging close to you.

Buds must into blossoms blow,
Morn so early leaves us;
Maid must into woman grow,
There's the thing that grieves us!
Psyche knots of flying curls,
That's good-by to little girls.

How to Make a Kite.

Find some straight-grained, lightweight wood—cedar preferred—and make four sticks about 1/4 inch thick and 1/2 inch wide; two of them 22 inches long, one 17 1/2 inches long, and the other 13 1/2 inches long, and place them as shown in the cut. Tack firmly where they cross, cut small notches at the ends of the sticks and put string around. Then cut out a piece of thin paper an inch larger than the kite and paste edges over the string.

Make a small hole at the ends of all the sticks, except at the lower cross stick, for attachment of strings, which must be on the opposite side from the sticks. Put strings loosely from A to F, from B to E, from C to D. Make a loop from E to F for fastening the tail, which must be made of a long, slender piece of calico or muslin about one inch wide and fifteen feet long, with ten bobs. Attach your string where the strings cross with a loose knot. If the kite dives put more tail on. The kite without the tail ought to weigh two ounces. The string ought to be a fine cord.

Fly the kite with a moderate wind, not a gale.—The Country Gentleman.

Old Mussentouchit hit.

By the time baby was ten months old she had learned many things, says the Union Signal. She could say "kitty" to the little soft, furry ball of a cat, and "tove," and "burn"—for once she had put her hand against the hot stove, and she never forgot the pain of the big blister that came on the delicate flesh—and she knew the moon, and the stars, and the trees.

About this time she heard a long, queer word many, many times a day. The word was Mussentouchit.

Baby wondered who Mussentouchit could be. The strange thing lived in the bureau drawers. Baby knew that, for the moment she got her little busy hands into mamma's drawer somebody would say "Mussentouchit."

It lived in the sewing-machine. For, the moment baby set the wheel going, "Mussentouchit" was screamed in her ear.

It lived in the tall jar that stood on the little round table. Everybody in the room shrieked "Mussentouchit" when baby put up her hand to touch the jar.

In the corner of the parlor there was a glass globe half filled with water. In the globe lived three little goldfish. Baby was very fond of climbing into a chair to see the tiny goldfish dart across their pretty lake. But whenever she put her fingers into the globe to touch one of the pretty creatures, somebody screamed "Mussentouchit."

This went on till baby was 2 years old. There was no word she heard so often as the long, queer word, Mussentouchit.

Mussentouchit was everywhere—in the shining books on the parlor table, in the flower-beds, among the roses; even in mamma's work-basket the strange thing lived; and if baby took up a reel of silk or cotton there was Mussentouchit.

One day baby found herself by the glass globe all alone. The family were very busy, and for a few minutes forgot the little, prying, restless darling. This was her chance. Up went the chubby legs into the chair that stood near the goldfish globe. Poised on the rounding cushion, baby reached far over to touch the goldfish. In reaching she lost her balance and fell, dragging the globe to the floor. There was a crash, a scream, a rush, and mamma was on the spot. Baby was picked up, kissed and scolded.

"I dess I tilled ole Mussentouchit 'is time!" she said, shaking herself and walking off.

NATURAL HISTORY FALLACIES.

Most of Them Completely Exploded, but Some Still Survive.

Less than a century ago, in the time when men had not penetrated so deeply into the study of nature, there was a great deal of poetry and romance connected with animal life that had been slowly but surely driven out of the study advanced.

Travelers returning from unexplored regions told strange and incredible stories about the wonderful wild animals they had encountered; but investigation has rent asunder these fanciful tales, and left only cold facts in their places.

I am the owner of a natural history written by one Riley and published about the year 1789. It is a quaint old book, and its yellow leaves and odd type furnish the reader with a number of strange accounts. Among others may be found something like the following: "The digestive apparatus of the ostrich is said to be very strong, indeed, that bird not only being able to digest such things as stones, bits of glass and iron, but it is even said that it makes a good meal of a bed of live coals."

We laugh at such a statement, but no doubt at the time of publication it was stated for a fact.

What right have we to laugh? It is not long since almost every one believed the porcupine capable of shooting its quills like arrows, and regarded it an animal well able to defend itself against almost any foe, instead of the quiet, inoffensive little creature that curls itself in a ball at the first approach of an enemy, trusting solely to its spine-covered skin for protection.

Men who lived only a short time before us did not question that the pretty, graceful swallows that skimmed so lightly o'er the blue waters in summer buried themselves in the mud at the bottom of our rivers and ponds when the season was over to await the return of spring.

It has been but a short time since investigation has shown that the supposed happy family made up of the prairie dog, the burrowing owl, and the rattlesnake is not only not a happy family but does not exist at all. Our first idea was that these three animals, of such different habits, lived in perfect harmony, like the so-called happy families of the modern circus; but our faith in this belief is somewhat shaken by the following, which may be found in Wood's "Natural History." According to popular belief, these three creatures live very harmoniously together; but observation has shown that the snake and the owl are interlopers, living in the burrow because the poor owner cannot turn them out and finding an easy subsistence off the young prairie dogs.

We were satisfied with this for a time, but judge the astonishment created when Elliot Coues, in one of his latest writings, makes the following statement in speaking of the burrowing owl: "I have found colonies in Kansas and other States in all cases occupying the deserted burrows of the quadrupeds, not living in common with them, usually supposed."

Naturalists are now telling us that the opossum does not play possum, but is merely paralyzed with fear for the time being; articles are published every day in our ornithological papers and magazines which go to prove that owls can see as well by day as by night. It is still an undecided question whether snakes "charm" their prey or not. In the Western backwoods these old stories are still believed in, the ignorant classes cling with fondness to them and will not learn anything different, and down in our hearts do we not all of us cling to them, more or less? Do we not hate to give them up, and is it not with a little regret that we are forced to acknowledge that the porcupine does not shoot his quills, that the bird of paradise really has feet and legs, and that our national bird, the white-headed eagle, is far from the noble bird we once thought him to be?—Forest and Stream.

From Life.

On the corner of one of the business streets of the city the other morning a shoeblack had just finished polishing the shoes of a well dressed and gentle appearing man. The latter was unfortunate in having a deformity which compelled him to wear a shoe on one of his feet with an exceedingly thick sole, thus endeavoring to make up mechanically for what nature had denied him.

"How much shall I pay you?" he asked of the boy.

"Five cents, sir."

"Oh, but you should have more than 5 cents for polishing my shoes," said the gentleman, tapping the thick sole significantly with his cane.

"No, sir," said the boy; "5 cents is enough. I don't want to make no money out o' your hard luck."

The customer handed out a coin, laid his hand on the youngster's head for a moment and passed on.

Who says the days of chivalry are over.—Free Press.

THE evidence thus far adduced indicates that Sir William Gordon-Cumming married the pick of the Garner family and that she isn't likely to be spoiled by being taken into the "best" society.

WOMEN AND FASHION.

SOME HANDSOME OPEN-AIR TOILETS.

Unique Carriage Dress—In Spite of All Cynical Allusions Many Ladies Hold Just as Steadily a Reins as a Man—Ball-Room Costumes, Etc.

[NEW YORK CORRESPONDENCE.]

carrying a white lily in her hand when attending balls and receptions. This was her scepter, but no society queen was ever satisfied with it. The sentiment so often enunciated that beauty unadorned is adorned the most can have no place in the philosophy of the fashionable woman. She must push adornment to its most logical extreme, just keeping this side of the danger line, after passing which a woman makes herself liable to the charge of being overdressed. But quite outside of dress garments, strictly speaking, there are petty details in a woman's toilet which may not with impunity be neglected. A well-fitting gown of a becoming color and a hat in harmony are but the bases of a refined and elegant toilet.

As the whole world is still outdoors, and will remain so for another month, it is only proper that I should talk to you of open-air toilets. I'm only too willing, for, to my way of thinking, the most elaborate ball toilet has no one-half the charm of a plain summer gown in pink or pale blue.

The lady in the initial wears one of these simple yet charming gowns in steel-gray peau de soie, trimmed with ruffles of black silk gauze at the neck and a cascade of black lace down the front of the bodice. The hat is of steel-gray fancy straw, with a garniture of white wings and white ribbon, white sunshade, with ruche of black lace.

As the most natural open-air toilet is a traveling costume, let me describe a very pretty toilet in that line which attracted my attention in a palace car the other day: A perfectly plain skirt and large jacket of ribbed beige made to button or hang open, a beige-colored vest opening on a man's shirt in white linen, turn-down collar, white tie, hand-tied; a sailor hat, trimmed with crepe de chine and two bird's wings; white veil, yellow shoes, laced; silk umbrella; and a long woolen wrap in brown broad color, lined with old rose, thrown over the arm.

In my second illustration you find two very elegant summer toilets, the one on the left being a combination of pale-blue crepe de chine, white tulle, embroidered, and yellow and indigo striped silk ribbons, the b' aces being loose as shown, and the high-stay bodice being made of the ribbons above mentioned, arranged diagonally. The hat is in Tuscan straw, trimmed with dark-blue chrysanthemums and dandelion heads, the surrounding scarf being of pale-blue silk gauze. The lady on the right wears a combination of maize taffeta, with black surah. The taffeta has a black figure. The ruffles are in gray crepe. The black surah bonnet is trimmed with gray ruffles and pale-pink roses.

WATERING PLACE TOILETS.

What seemed to me to be a very pretty costume for a summer resort consisted of a skirt of white serge, reversed hem with five rows of stitching, a corsage of silk gauze with pink dots, over which was worn a long jacket of white and pink striped Pekin silk, white Italian straw hat trimmed with long-stemmed roses, pink sunshade with coral handle. The cost of such a costume is moderate, and with correct taste and good judgment you may attain extremely becoming effects by such combination of serge, gauze and thin silks.

You will find two very stylish toilets set forth in my third illustration; the one on the left being a white foulard having a gray-blue stripe with a plastron of white lace, basques and skirt ruche also of same material. The Tuscan straw hat is lined with white lace and trimmed with clusters of white feathers. The costume worn by the lady on the right consists of a pale fawn India cashmere with three braids of gold and brown galloon, a broad sash of brown velvet and a cascade of brown lace front and back. The bonnet is in brown velvet with fawn-colored strings and ostrich tips.

Some crusty old bachelor and confirmed misogynist has affirmed that a woman can neither sharpen a lead pencil nor drive a horse. Possibly not, but the fact remains that she often attempts to drive the horse or the pony that is attached to her village cart. True, the coachman always sits near at hand and takes good care now and then, by a vigorous tug at the right or left rein, to keep the animal duly informed of his presence. In spite of all cynical allusions, I've been taken out driving by women who hold just as skillful and steady a rein as a man could do, and so cool and admirable was their management of the horse that it showed the most perfect respect for his driver. But, as holding the reins is, no doubt, justly considered a masculine accomplishment, it follows that when a woman has become an expert in handling the ribbons over the sleek back of a thoroughbred she should affect a mannish attire. It is very becoming to the bright-eyed, robust, rosy-cheeked style of young girl, the English type, as it is called. She is quite as particular as her brother Jack with her colored shirts, and spends half an hour tying her silk tie in a loose, rakish, and picturesque manner. Her sailor hat or Derby is perched forward with a saucy tip, and her hands are incased in stout gloves. Her tailor-made jacket must be of some woolen material, never of silk, and must fit her with that snugness so requisite for stylish effect.

My fourth illustration pictures the young girl of the self-reliant and independent character, who scorns to be driven by a man of any kind, be he coachman or suitor. The average woman, however, prefers the back seat to the box, and by so doing she not only gets rid of all the labor of holding the reins and keeping her mind constantly fixed upon the business in hand—a very difficult task for a woman, if we believe our male critics—but she is enabled to wear her most delightful costumes, her most striking hats, carry her most elaborate sunshade; in a word, fairly revel in rich colors and magnificent textures, as she leans back against the elegantly embroidered cushion which comes between her back and the carriage seat and displays the beauty of full skirts which completely fill the body of the landaulet.

My last illustration portrays my Lady Dawdle out for a drive. She wears a combination of India silk, plain and striped, beautifully draped with chiffon, parasol to match, gloves to match, natural flowers to match. In short, she is a harmony in pink and white or cream and pale blue, or cream and violet, all in a minor key. At other times, however, she is an outburst of melody in black and yellow, or black and crimson, or else she glows like a great living bouquet in pompadour satin, as yellow as rich and ripe wheat, brocaded in a blue that glows like old china. Miss Fawcett and Mrs. Shallowhouse look after Lady Dawdle with envious eyes as she rides by them on Ocean avenue while they trudge along on the wooden promenade, but let them wait till they meet in the ball-room. Quite likely they will discover that their figures and complexion are far superior to Lady Dawdle's, and then the accelerated action of lady's fan will betray the fact that the load of envy has been shifted.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

SERIOUS SUBJECTS CAREFULLY CONSIDERED.

A Scholarly Exposition of the Lesson—Thoughts Worthy of Calm Reflection—Half an Hour's Study of the Scriptures—Time Well Spent.

The lesson for Sunday, Aug. 16, may be found in John 6: 1-14.

SYNOPSIS.

Jesus has gone over the Sea of Galilee. But, Lord Jesus, may we not go with thee there? The Sunday-schools of the world, a great multitude, are fane to go across and enjoy that same privilege which the disciples enjoyed of being with their Lord in his rest. Or, if they may not claim such familiarity, they are ready to go about with that multitude of old and come to the hill side half unawares. But the Lord is kind! Shall it be so that, sitting thus in our class groups, the Christ shall himself break for us to-day bread of eternal life?

WHAT THE LESSON TEACHES.

After these things. The conversations held with the Jews in the holy city. Went. Rather, went away, departed. See Variations.—Over the sea. Or, Beyond (peran). Revision. On the other side. Peran, from this same root, means the other side, i. e., of the Jordan.

Great multitude. Probably en route to the feast at Jerusalem.—Followed him. Doubtless going around by the head of the lake.—Saw. The word used of curious sight-seeing.—His miracles. Better, the miracles.

Into a mountain. Into is picturesque, suggesting the narrow dell by which a mountain is entered and ascended.—Sat. The attitude of a teacher.—Disciples, or students, learners.

Was nigh. Explaining the largeness of the multitude on their pedestrian tour toward Jerusalem. The feast was held April 16. It was the second Passover of Christ's ministry. A year has passed since the last lesson. Mainly told in the other gospels.

Come unto him. Or, Coming unto him. Present tense. The language is again picturesque.—Phillip, who may have had special charge of the commissary.—Buy. Greek root: agora, meaning market place.—Eat. Used of the regular meal. It was now supper time. (Luke 9: 12.)

To prove him. The him seems to be emphatic. To test, or try him and see what he would say.—Know. Hence not asking for information.—What he would do. Or, was about to do.

Two hundred pennyworth, $34. The off-hand estimate, possibly, of an expert.—Take a little, or receive a little. Not enough even for the smallest partitionment.

One of the disciples. Probably overhanging.—Andrew. One of the few times when Andrew is expressly referred to. He seems from this and the previous allusion, in John (1: 40, 41) to have been of a simple, trustful disposition.

A lad. Greek, a small boy, diminutive of boy (palladion).—Five barley loaves and two small fishes. Diminutive of fish. What was left, possibly, of the lad's stock in trade.—Among so many. Or, into so many.

And Jesus said. It was the slight token of faith for which he seems to have been waiting.—Sit down. Greek, drop down or recline. The quite natural method of eating in the Orient.—Much grass. Hence a good place to recline.—So the men sat down. Intimating some degree of faith on the part of the multitude. The word for men here is different from that in the above. See Revision.

Seen. Greek, seeing.—Should come. Or, is coming.

WHAT THE LESSON TEACHES.

Jesus then lifted up his eyes and saw. It is even the eyes of Jesus that first descry the hearing multitude. His is a spirit sensitive to the touch, readily declaring, like the needle quivering in the compass, the approach of that with which it is in sympathy. O for eyes like those of Christ to see the opportunities for doing good about the church of God to-day! O for a heart as tender and kind! Heart loving; eyes quick. Did we but lift our eyes to-day from that elevation which the Lord has given us, would we not see a great company, and, rightly viewed, are they not, as then, coming unto him? Forbid them, not.

One of his disciples, Andrew. Just one, but he counted for more than one. "He first findeth his brother Simon." First, perhaps, of many; but at any rate, that made two, and in the day of Pentecost three thousand and two. Put that vast multitude largely to Andrew's account. We do not often hear of this man, but when we do catch a glimpse of him, he is right at the feet of the Master in the attitude of childlike faith. On the day after his conversion he is going right away to seek another soul. On the days succeeding Christ's ascension he is in the upper room anxiously awaiting the promise of the Father. And here it is his quiet voice, backed by a gentle spirit, that supplies the moiety of faith. God grant us more Andrews in the church. Why not a Philip and Andrew society of soul-seekers, to start with, right here?

There is a lad here. Who he was we do not know, do not care. A lad, that was all; and that was enough. A lad with five barley loaves and two small fishes. A little lad, little loaves, little fishes. Oh, how God blesses our little ones! In this church, this Sunday-school, this community, there is a great multitude to be fed, and a great work of grace to be wrought. How shall it be done? Let us not look about with Philip's foolish wisdom and say there is "not sufficient for them." Let us rather glance around with the simple faith of Andrew and say, "There is a little lad here with some loaves and fishes." And if we add, in wonder, "what are they among so many?" let us still submit the problem to God. He will solve it for us, and gloriously.

So the men sat down. Here is faith from an unexpected quarter. I do not know but that there was, in this case, more faith among the multitude than among the group of the disciples. "Sit down for supper," he said, in effect. The disciples were saying for the most part, it can't be done, or how can it be? But the multitude said, the Lord has spoken, it ye down, he is going to do something for us—and down they sat. Ah, often it is so. The expectation of the world outstrips the expectation of the church. Some instinctive sense of the God-head is in the air. All men feel it. Alas, why not the church of Christ?

This is of a truth that prophet. It is one step and a good one. They see in Jesus a man sent of God. What they saw taught them this wisdom. What but the food given to them? The bread and the fish, as they partook of them, cried out "This is God's man, this is God's man; hear him." Possibly were the church to go forth with more lavish hand for the meeting of the simple needs of man, we should see the world more ready to acknowledge the church as teacher and guide, heaven sent and heaven ordained. But what now? This is of a truth that prophet; and this being so, listen to what he says, believe the word he speaks of himself. The soul that consistently confesses Jesus the prophet is not far from the kingdom.

Next Lesson—"Christ the Bread of Life," John 6: 26-40.

A NORRISTOWN boy ran away rather than deliver a commencement oration. Alas! that there are so few like him.

WHEN the poet wrote, "I'll hie me to thy bower, love," he must have imagined he was playing ecchre with his best girl, and held the "joker."

A TRAVELER in tropical America speaks of the "jabbering of the toucans." In that relation tinnabulation would have been a better word.

ISAAC HOLDEN, who made the first Lucifer match, has just been elected a member of the British Parliament. So long does it take to live down a sulphurous reputation.

SAM JONES says that he doesn't care what people call him, whether "evangelist, revivalist, ecclesiastic tramp, or what not." That is exactly what the shylock said when the creditor called him a wolf. A money-getter by any other name smells as sweet.

In a little counterfeiting trial at Chicago it was developed that "experts" are liable to be "taken in." Capt. Porter, of the secret service, admitted that he had a bad 10-cent piece passed upon him recently and he didn't discover it for several days. Then he worked it off onto the Sub-Treasury people, who haven't yet discovered its base character. "Here's a state of things."

THE financial embarrassment of the Jenness-Miller Magazine Company forces us to a conclusion which we are most reluctant to adopt concerning a typical and always interesting article of feminine apparel. The Jenness-Miller Magazine was the organ of the divided skirt or petticoat. It has failed. We set it down in sadness: It is with petticoats as with States—united they stand; divided they fall.

PROF. SNOW, whose remedy for chinch bugs is pronounced by Secretary Rusk to be the most valuable discovery of the century, has been requested by a Boston paper to give the country a remedy for mosquitoes. The request should incite the Professor to the highest flights of invention. The man who exterminates the mosquito will be hailed as a great benefactor from the jungles of New Jersey to the coasts of California.

THE quality of personal charm is the strongest attraction a woman can possess. It does not necessarily imply beauty or learning, or specific accomplishments, but it is, instead, a kind of inflorescence of all that goes to make up culture, taste, sympathy, imagination, the magnetism of a poetic and ideal temperament. The quality of charm is elusive, and can no more be reduced to a definition than can the perfume of a flower. But when it exists it holds a potent and subtle enchantment, and is the best gift of the gods.

WHY is it that the owner of a dog is obliged to take out a license while the owners of cats are exempt from such exaction? There is no more reason why a dog should be subject to a special tax than a cat should be. The theory cannot be that a dog is more dangerous or offensive to the public, for certainly the city would not for a small sum compound the offense of keeping an animal dangerous to the public. It is also to be noted that a cat on the back fence is often a source of more annoyance to a neighborhood than are a dozen dogs. The amount of money which might be obtained from a cat license judiciously applied would be a material addition to the city funds, and the idea is certainly worthy of serious consideration.

By the way, when we of the Exceedingly United States are moved to speak with an appropriately smug and oleaginous holier-than-thousness of the South American "revolutionary republics" let us, by all means, so speak; but let us not forget that less than a generation ago we had ourselves the distinction of looking upon the sword when it was red. If there is in these our times and in this our country one spectacle more ludicrous than every other spectacle it is that of a stumptuous American poll-patriot strutting on his perch in the sunshine of the consciousness of his own nationality, leisurely blistering in spots lately deflected by the monkey of rebellion and screaming derision at every green feather wafted past him by the Southern breeze.

THE means by which sick humanity strives to regain its lost health are as varied as the means by which it seeks to gain the joys of paradise. The latest reported device for curing skin diseases—it is not wholly an elegant thing to say—is to have the affected places licked by dogs. This is perment which was given to the sores of Lazarus; but how the dogs are persuaded to perform their part of the contract is not stated. Certain it is that in France an establishment has been opened where patients are received for this sort of treatment, the dogs which are considered the best being collies, which are said to have especially smooth tongues. It remains to be seen how soon this fad will in this country supersede the mind-cure, faith-cure, and Christian science.

An editorial writer in the Philadelphia Times says Hannibal Hamlin's defeat for a renomination in 1864 was largely due to the fact that Abraham Lincoln favored Andrew Johnson for the place. The editorial writer says he himself was a delegate-at-large from Pennsylvania to the Baltimore convention and that he was personally commissioned by Mr. Lincoln to quietly make the latter's wishes known among the delegates. Now comes John G. Nicolay, Lincoln's private secretary, and pronounces the story untrue. He says Lincoln told him he was for Hamlin, but would not let his preferences be known to the convention. As there seems to be a lull in the battle-field controversy just now, Bob Ingersoll and Ignatius Donnelly will please remain quiet until we find out who was really responsible for Andrew Johnson.

A SPANISH paper gives to the world the information, which is important if true, that the morning cup of coffee is an excellent weather indicator. The coffee must be the genuine article. A lump of sugar should be dropped into it without stirring, and a quantity of bubbles will presently rise to the surface. If these bubbles collect in the middle of the cup the weather for the day will be fair. If they adhere to the sides, forming either a ring or a cluster, with the space in the center clear, there will be rain. If they scatter indifferently over the surface the weather will be variable. As you read at breakfast this morning you can call for a fresh cup of coffee, drop in your lump of sugar, and await results. If the weather turns out to be what the bubbles prophesy, you have learned something valuable. If not, remember these directions have not cost you a cent extra.

ARE we to have annual interviews with business men concerning the value of college education to young men who are to make money-getting their object in life? It would seem so, for we are now having over again a series of interviews with sapient men of commerce, who are pretty generally unanimous in their condemnation of the business capacity of the college-bred youth. If they are right, their business, as it is conducted, is opposed to civilization. The condemnation, it should be observed, is of education, not of exceptional cases of youth who have gone through college without either honor or profit. A college education unfits one for the active pursuits of business, say the objectors. Then the training of the mental powers, the acquisition of knowledge, the development of a taste for arts, an acquaintance with the fundamental laws of science, habits of honest and thorough research, are all detrimental to the young man who would make his way in trade and commerce. If this is true, then trade and commerce are the enemies of the age, and civilization demands a return to the barter system of the twilight time of savagery.

Among the many schemes submitted to the World's Fair managers none would appear more worthy than the proposition to aid the North American Indians in making an exhibit of their own status. The opposition which might fairly be urged against a separate Hebrew and even against a separate American negro exhibit cannot hold good in the case of the North American Indian. Our Government and our people treat the Indian tribes as foreign nations—not as a component part of our own nation, although the nation's wards. They are entitled, therefore, even more than the several American States, to distinct representation in a world's fair. A properly arranged and properly managed exhibit of the existing North American Indian tribes could be made a very valuable factor in the solution of our Indian problem. Interesting and valuable as are the relics of prehistoric Indian rule over this continent and of the Indian civilization which went down before the onward march of our own, the life of the present Indian and its results and products are of far more interest and importance to an exposition designed to show the progress of the world since the opening of the Indian's primitive home down to Caucasian enterprise and progress. The former are part of the national scientific collections which will be included in our Government exhibit, but to procure the latter should be one of the principal tasks of the National Commission, and one to which Congressional aid should be freely given.

The Farmer's Wife Purchasing Agency.

We wish to call the attention of our readers to The Purchasing Agency, which is managed with the business department of THE FARMER'S WIFE, having received many requests to establish an institution in this city to meet the demands of our readers in furnishing any article of merchandise, and that such would be appreciated. We are able to announce that arrangements have been perfected. Many of our patrons cannot find just what they want in the smaller towns, and many of them can more easily send by mail than make a pilgrimage to the far-away store. Our feeling in the matter has been justified. Experience has demonstrated the fact that there is a large mail and express trade done in the country. We simply come to our subscribers and offer to do the business for them that others have been doing, providing we can do it satisfactorily. We claim special advantages for our Purchasing Agency. It can be run at such a trifling expense, that we can do work for less margin than is possible, when the agency is the only business. We have no office rental to pay—our present offices affording us ample room; we have no wages to pay; we do our own purchasing; we have no advertising and printing bills to pay—we use our own mediums. Thus we are able to surprise those who give us their trade. We do not fear competition, for we are able to meet it successfully. We are determined to give satisfaction, for by so doing we not only retain the customer's trade, but we wed the customer to our paper, and that is of large importance to us. The family of readers—and a large family it has now become—is invited to use our agency when they can do so to their own interest, and without doing an injustice to any other person or business. We feel confident we can please, and we feel as sure that we can make it profitable to those who order through us. There is nothing in the market which we cannot handle.

THE ALLIANCE MUTUAL BENEFIT SOCIETY has received the most enthusiastic endorsement from all sources. The whole plan is so easily comprehended that it commends itself to every thinking man or woman.

The fact that life is uncertain and that death is certain leads us to look about for something that will take care of the mortgage and save the home if we are called hence. The question naturally arises, how and where can the best security of this kind be obtained? We answer, of the Alliance Mutual Benefit Society, by writing to G. H. Flintham, the secretary, at Topeka, he will give you all desired information. But why do you recommend this society in preference to others? We answer because the cost of taking and carrying $1,000, $2,000 or $3,000 is so small. This society charges only the actual cost of carrying your insurance, and owing to the reserve features of the society the cost will never be greater. Let us illustrate:

A member who dies during the first year has not paid much for his insurance and this burden falls on the living members. In this society $50 is retained out of each $1,000 if the member dies during the first year, and this $50 is placed at 6 per cent interest, the interest to be used in paying the assessments the same as though the person had lived. Should a member die during the second year $49 is retained, and so our one dollar less is retained for each year the membership is continued. This reserve plan is peculiar to this society and cannot be used by any other one. It has been pronounced the best plan ever conceived to keep down the assessments and perpetuate the life of the society.

Overworked Women.

Just a word to our tired, overworked sisters, on the farm, at the desk, in the office, the schoolroom, the saleslady or whatever your occupation may be that requires your being on your feet, which breaks you down and gradually brings on weakness and all those diseases peculiar to women, undermining your general health, making life a burden instead of a pleasure, and robbing woman of all that is beautiful, unfitting her for the duties and responsibilities of home, for which she is held accountable, a feeling which causes her to feel depressed and downhearted and think that life is not worth the living, and by not knowing how easily those miserable, unhappy feelings can be removed she cries out in her misery and suffering, "Oh, Death! where is thy sting?" Certainly no sharper one can be than the one felt that is caused by those troubles which we have mentioned. Having suffered for years and not being able to get relief only for a short time I at last have found a remedy that has placed me in the first rank with healthy women, and I have made arrangements with the Viavi company by which I am enabled to place in the hands of all suffering from any of those troubles a remedy that will build and tone you up, drive away that tired, dragging, depressed feeling, and give you back the ambition that you thought had gone forever. Whoever has the good fortune to read these lines, if you are afflicted address Mrs. B. E. with stamp, care of FARMER'S WIFE, and receive full particulars that will explain the merits of Viavi and show you what it has done for so many. Do not put it off too long. Your life is too precious, you are needed in this great work of reform, and without your health and strength and a spirit for work you are a burden on your already overburdened husband.

Vol. I, No. 4

For the FARMER'S WIFE.
DAUGHTERS OF REFORM.

BY EMMA GIBERT CURTIS.

What are the signs of the times,
When daughters, mothers and wives Arise to beat down established ills
That darken human lives?
Mean they not that a better day
Is dawning hopeful and clear,
And that clouds are melting and scattering
As the hosts of its morning draw near?

Far and near we hear and see
These sisters univelled, but devout,
Breaking the images wrought of the past,
And putting time's myths to rout.
Some with age are snow crowned,
Some are in life's grand prime,
While others their winning and graceful youth
Still hold in defiance of time.

Stately Sarah Emery,
And Mary Livermore wise,
With tongue and pen defy the wrongs
That parade in virtue's guise;
While wherever downcast human souls
Cry for justice and release,
Resound the words, the stirring words,
Of noble Mary Lesse.

There is witty Katie Cunningham,
By the Arkansas bayon;
There are Marion Todd and Mary Goffs,
And Eva McDonald, too;
Elinor Donnelly, poet sweet,
And Lenora Barry Lake—
Pen cannot follow the giant thoughts
That these sisters' words awake.

And Kansas, sunny Kansas,
With your Vincents, Annie and Yee;
Your Eliza Coe and Emma Pack,
And Fannie Vickery;
With Fannie McCormick and Nettie Nutt,
And Bina Otis, too;
Maud Pack and gracious Anna Diggs,
And Mattie Convis true,
Annie Lindsay and Lizzie Holmes—
O, Kansas! we're jealous of you!

But, Kansas, other Annes than yours
Join in Freedom's brave appeal;
There are Annie Weaver, the author,
And our good knight, Annie Steele.
O, friend, if you feel discouraged
At clouds portending storm,
Nurse hope, and take heed that the Annes
Are marching for reform.

Among our own romantic hills,
So lofty and so wild,
Dwell gentle Katie Dwyer,
And earnest Neva Child.
But why seek individual names,
While a million woman-hearts
To Freedom's cause and mankind's hope
Their generous fires impart?

For not alone they heroes are Whose names we greet with shouts and cheers;
As sweet and true and valiant those
Who toil in seclusion and tears.
For no matter who leads the battle
That shakes Earth's plains the while,
The bravest service must ever come
From the gallant rank and file.

O, sisters, whom a system dark Sought with customs crude to chain,
You have proved that the fetters upon your wrists
Were riveted all in vain.
Through political labyrinths, dismal and cold,
You bear torches to scatter the gloom;
And the light you spread, and the words you speak
Are hastening tyranny's downfall and doom.

[FOR FARMER'S WIFE]

The Church and Not the Bible.

MRS. M. E. LEASE.

As an outspoken advocate for years, of all that pertains to the emancipation of women, it has been my lot more than once to have the Bible thrown at my head both on the rostrum and through the press, by some valiant Pharisee who prefixed "Rev." to his name, and would fain make the world believe that he had a private back stairway by which he was enabled to hold interviews with the Almighty and thus authoritatively fix the moral and social status of women irrevocably. It has, too, invariably been the custom to quote from the Bible to deteriorate or degrade women by those who for immoral or mercenary purposes wished to keep her in servitude. In this way a great many liberal-minded persons imbued with that prejudice against the Bible which canting preachers (wolves in sheep's clothing) have inspired them, are led into the popular error that the Bible is the text book for the church in its contemptible and atrocious opposition to women. As a matter of truth there is much that is bad as well as good in the Bible, much that is wicked as well as beautiful; there are true and grand things, as well as false and curious; there are fossils and fragments of sacrificial religion that reach down through the ages and under another name and in another form drips atoning blood upon 19th century altars. There is much that is elevating and commendatory of women, much that is degrading and derogatory to both men and women. Not until the world learns to regard the Bible as a history, and scoffs at the idea of all its pages being written under inspiration, shall the grain be discerned from the chaff that well-nigh hides it from view. Yet to those who would investigate there is an abundance of material in the Bible to make it an effective weapon in the hands of a woman against those who profess to be guided by its teachings. The women of the Bible are the grandest conceptions of history. Shakespeare's delineations of women are flimsy dolls, creatures of love or hatred not worthy to stand beside the mothers of the race as depicted by the Bible. How Godlike Miriam stands outlined against the centuries. What an illustration we have in Deborah that the good mother of a household can also be the good mother of a nation. "She was a judge and ruler in Israel," she occupied the same position as did Moses, David, and Solomon; she had all of their virtues and none of their vices, and "the bravest general would not go to battle without her." It is also a noticeable and significant fact that when God wished to perfect some mighty plan—carry conformation to His enemies or triumph to His followers, a woman was selected as the instrument of consummation, whether a Judith delivering her besieged kinsmen in the beleaguered city, or the daughter of a Pharaoh rescuing from the Nile the leader of God's chosen people. In Genesis we find the first example in fractions on record, and proof of the equality of the sexes. "Male and female created Him them, and they were one." This scriptural arithmetic the preachers constantly lose sight of—one woman and one man are two halves, and two halves make a whole. "But the very fact that God created the male first gives him precedence and superiority" we are told. Well; then we find that God created the fowls of the air, the fishes of the sea, and every creeping thing upon the earth; does precedence in creation give them superiority over man? Rather let us reason that as the improved steam power cylindrical printing press is an improvement over the lumber-some, uncouth hand-press of a few years ago, so the lower animals were God's experiment, man the culmination of His practice, and woman, because last, the crowning masterpiece of His workmanship. Every argument, objection, or sophistry brought up from the Old Testament can be met or swept away by the very weapons of our adversaries, and if we leave this old record as we safely may, wrapped in the grave-clothes of Judaism fading into the twilight of the past, and open the pages of the New Testament, we will find as we roll away the deepening gloom of eighteen centuries, that in the sacred and mysterious epochs of a Saviour's life, the incarnation, birth, life, death and resurrection of Jesus, a woman stands revealed as the foremost crowning figure of Holy Writ. "Last at the cross, first at the tomb," the divine commission to preach a risen Saviour was first given women. "He is not here; He is risen; Go tell His disciples." That compulsory old saint, Paul, who was smitten and withered while sojourning on the island of Crete, in spite of his disappointment in love and the many bitter things it made him say against the sex, makes honorable mention of the four daughters of Philippi, who labored with him in the ministry of the gospel. He tells the women of Corinth how they should wear their veils when they prophesy or preach, so all must concede that women did prophesy and preach in the early days of the church. But as Peter is claimed as head of that church which has done more to degrade and enslave women than all other sects combined, let us select Peter as the champion of women. In "Act" 11, 17, we find that women had the right of utterance and the gift of prophecy on the day of Pentecost; secondly, he tells us that the prophet Joel had prophesied, "She would preach in the last days," and again he tells us that we belong to "the dispensation in which women are appointed to preach." Now, let us briefly glance over church history: Go with me to the Nicene library where we will find accumulated the historical and religious lore of the world, and gathering up the testimony of Eusebius, Justin, Martyr, Irenaeus and other fathers of the church, we find that the whole extraordinary gift of the prophecy was given to others besides the Apostles, not only in the first and second, but in the third and fourth centuries down even to the days of Constantine men of all sorts and ranks and women too, had this gift. Augustine the Negro saint of the Catholic church, who owed his conversion and goodness too (if he had any) to a woman, the gentle Monica, taught that "women are inferior to men and have greater proneness to evil, and to have dealings with the devil." "Chrysostom" taught the same, and through their teachings and representations was begun and promulgated the "witch-craft" superstition which was engrafted into the laws of every country. In Christendom the deeds of cruelty perpetrated by the church against women through the nefarious execution of the "witch-craft" laws, form the bloodiest, most revolting pages of the world's history. It is estimated that nine million women were burned at the stake, victims of the insatiable church. In the fourth century a council convened at Laodicea, which forbade the ordination of women clergy on the plea "that they had brought all sin into the world." Five hundred and twenty-nine years later another council convened which lamented that "women were still permitted to officiate at the altar." The clergymen inveighed and preached against women on the score of "Original Sin." Eve's crime of "eating the apple" was discussed and dwelt upon in such a manner as to create a prejudice against her by making her appear more depraved, and this is yet preached in the Catholic church. The Aryan temples are foul and reeking yet, and no modern Heracles is found who will undertake their cleansing. In the sixth century convened a sect of Roman Catholic bishops who had suddenly be thought themselves of the admonitions of Paul to remain single. They, on the plea of "women's inferiority" and her "proneness to evil" brought in the celibacy of the clergy. At that day the teachings and decisions of these primates were all-powerful. "The church," was the arbitrator of nations, supreme in temporal and spiritual power. Woman's utterance was choked, her privileges annulled, her liberty destroyed, council after council tightened their grip around her slender throat; prejudice was enkindled against her, the doors of schools and churches were closed, and to-day it is because the church cannot do otherwise, that her doors no longer creak on their hinges nor refuse to open when woman knocks for admittance.

Enough has been said to show that the church and not the Bible is responsible for the slavery and degradation of women. She has not risen by Christianity, but through it. Slowly, but surely, she is casting off the theological fetters which have bound her in the past, and is stepping faster and further into freedom. Good speed every effort of true men and women everywhere in this direction, and may the sea of human thought be stirred to its farthest depths; better that the waves of discussion roll mountain high, than the stagnation and apathy that have cursed the race so long.

[FOR FARMER'S WIFE.]
Women in Politics.

BY MISS FRANCES F. ALLEN.

Most women when spoken to on the question of the day, answer that political affairs do not interest them, that when they have properly provided for the wants of their households, their duty ends there. Does it?
Secretary Windom once said in a speech: "Five men in New York by a single stroke of the pen or click of the wires, can reduce values all over the country from fifty to one hundred per cent." At the same time that the government of our great nation, through its intricate workings, made it possible for five men at their will and pleasure to expend or reduce the circulating medium, the life blood of the nation, John J. Ingalls tells us that out of the sixty-five millions in this nation, ten millions never have enough in a single day to satisfy the cravings of hunger. This being true, mothers, what assurance have you that the dear little ones you feed and nurture so tenderly to-day, will not help swell the number of hungry ones in the years to come, unless something is done to wrest the power from the merciless few who can give or withhold aid at will?
And while these five potentates hold the destiny of the nation at their disposal, thousands of girls and women in New York were driven to lives of shame and crime through want; many women and girls working for sixty cents a day of sixteen hours. Mothers, would it not be well to ponder over this pathetic story of fallen women? Forty years ago beggars and millionaires were scarcely known, and to day helpless, innocent girlhood and womanhood driven to crime and suicide through crushing, merciless, grinding poverty. And yet the mothers in years ago, felt the same thrill of joy and love from the touch of sweet baby fingers that you of to-day feel from your own baby girl's caresses. Does it ever occur to you that in the fate of the thousands of women wage-earners of to-day, might possibly be mirrored the lives of your darling girls, unless there is a radical change, and realizing this can you drift idly with the current and say the affairs of the nation do not interest you? And while the people tamely submitted to the iron rule of this mighty live, women, by the thousands, were driven insane through lack of sufficient and proper food. What a record for the wealthiest nation on earth. And yet, when women have been asked to assist and identify themselves in the work of trying to aid the laboring classes, they have hesitated because there is such common people engaged in the work.

While we realize the terrible enormity of this unequal distribution of wealth and control of money, it should be remembered that this condition has been made possible by the same indifference on the part of the mass of voters that most women manifest to-day in regard to politics. The majority of voters have looked upon our government as a ponderous machine that could only be manipulated by a few professional wire-workers and professional politicians, and these same politicians have taken advantage of this lack of vigilance, and brought about a condition that makes us stand aghast with horror and tremble for the safety of future generations when we review the calamities that have visited the present.
The time has arrived when men have begun to think, and, strangely enough, woman is helping him in that task, and for the first time in the history of our nation her counsel has been received and heeded, and it has been tacitly acknowledged that woman can wield a power in politics although she may not be allowed to express her sentiments at the ballot box.

The great common people, both men and women, are beginning to heed the cry of distress from their more unfortunate brethren. These cries, now faint and feeble though they be, will increase in volume until neither sneers nor sarcasms of the hirelings of the sin-cursed power can silence them. The glamor of the subsidized press will soon cease to hide the shameful poverty that oppresses the hearts of so many of God's helpless ones.
We are surely fast approaching a crisis and have before us a problem that must soon be solved, when such men as Windom and Ingalls were forced to make the admissions they have.
That other countries have had a like experience, history will show. That the same causes that have led to much of the internal commotion in many nations has been the same, namely: the oppression of the poor. History will plainly show, and that these commotions have always been first heralded by the low, wailing, pitiful cry of the suffering poor, who gradually increased in intensity and volume, till it became the hoarse, utal cry of the unreasoning mob or revolutionist, history records too faithfully.
That history repeats itself is an axiom well known. In our own nation the cry of the oppressed rings clearly in our ears, and it remains with us whether or not it can be hushed before it reaches an appalling climax. And this is a question that must be solved, as all such solutions in the past has been made by the "great common people." The extremely rich will not, the extremely poor are helpless. And now is the time to give it earnest attention, men and women of the middle class. Better heed the moaning of the wind and the swaying of the trees, than wait in fancied security till the full fury of the cyclone is upon you. Better to turn aside the course of the little rippling stream while it is yet in your power, than to wait till it is a mighty, rushing torrent, carrying destruction in its path. Better it is to quench the little spark before a great flame is kindled that will be all-consuming. And better, far better, decide the conflict between labor and capital with ballots instead of bullets, before it is too late.

There is a work in this field for women as well as men, and to shirk that duty would be criminal. When you hold in your arms the beautiful form of your helpless, innocent child, your responsibility to that child does not end with the clothing and nourishment of that little body; there is an immortal soul to be cared for, a mind to expand, but when extreme poverty crushes and temptations assail, that expansion is impossible, therefore, put aside some of the unnecessary work for your own and your children's advancement, (and much of this is but a relic of barbarism) and devote more time to the study of facts and the topics of the day, and add your mite toward the advancement and reform of present abuses of power, so that your children may live under a form of government that protects instead of oppressing them.

For what concerns the destiny of the nation concerns every woman whether she votes or not. The nation's destiny is yours.

A Kind Letter From Mrs. Marion Todd.

EDITOR FARMER'S WIFE:

I never felt so much like a tramp as I do this morning—that is if I have anything like a correct idea of how a tramp feels; and it would seem that a woman who can give no better account of her self than that she belongs somewhere in the United States must possess a pretty correct symptom.
I should have responded to your several solicitations in the way of a letter for your most excellent paper weeks before, but for my continual traveling and sneaking, which so unfits and demoralizes one for any literary work whatever, even when an occasional leisure hour presents itself.
Little do we realize how futile it is to plan in this world until a disappointment comes upon us. For days I had been dreaming of the pleasure I would have in calling at the office of the FARMER'S WIFE. I reached Topeka on the morning of the 20th of August, last, on my way to western Kansas, where it is said an occasional rebel still exists, opposed to justice in government despite the victorious overthrowing the women reformers gave the State last year.
I got as far as the office of the Advocate, where I found the grand old warrior Dr. McLellan, standing guard over the interests of the people, even as we expect him to stand when the good angel shall call him to come up higher and face the indelible record he has made on earth.

I left, as I supposed, in plenty time to make a second call, but my watch had stopped, and when I discovered the fact the only train by which I could reach my appointment was then nearly due. I have lived to learn that watches, like men, are many times uncertain. I hope that no Kansas Ingalls will retort that oft times a woman may be found in the category of uncertainties also.
Well, the war is going bravely on. Daylight is breaking in upon the mind of the ignorant voter rapidly. The hypocrite at the ballot-box is becoming more concerned than ever and resorting to more secret schemes and more desperate measures. This is, indeed, the hour in which to live. No century will ever be more plainly marked than the nineteenth by the coming contest of 1892, when master and slave will meet in earnest, both determined for the victory in the future.

One glorious sign for the success of the down-trodden lies in the fact that so many women are reaching out a helping hand and putting their shoulder to the wheel. I believe the world is waiting for women to march on to the stronghold of iniquity only as women can.
This government must perish. False systems are but the seeds of death. Its fruitage we recognize upon every hand to-day, and injustice rules supreme. There is but one undying principle in the universe; it is the law of love. Justice is its anchor. Founded upon these rocks republics will endure.
Success to your worthy endeavor, and may the FARMER'S WIFE reach many homes. Truly, MRS. MARION TODD.

The Farmer's Wife.

So BERNHARDT is an American, if we are to believe that delightfully romantic story which comes from Portland, Oregon. But how does it happen that a girl born in Rochester, who lived there for ten years, did not learn to speak English? For such a bright child as the divine Sarah must have been this is indeed surprising.

THE silly time of the year is at hand, when elopements are in order, and the silly friends of silly young people applaud their silly designs and help them make themselves miserable for life. It takes all the romance out of the situation when the old folks are compelled to give them a home or see them starve. This occurs almost invariably as a sequel to the romance.

QUEEN VICTORIA now reigns over 367,000,000 subjects, more than ever governed by one sovereign before. That is all right. But when baccarat Prince of Wales becomes King over these millions, mostly better people than himself, the discrepancy will strike most people as a discord and not a symphony. A profligate is hardly the kind of a King for such a nation.

A WOMAN of Sun Prairie, Wis., will always be glad that she took an umbrella with her when she went to pick raspberries. She did not need it to protect her from the sun, but from a tram. She broke its ribs over his head, blinded him in one eye with the ferrule and threatened to brain him with the club handle if he didn't go on about his business. He went, and she picked a full measure of berries before she went home and told her folks.

DR. BAYARD HOLMES has a paper in the latest number of the North American Practitioner in which he presents some interesting conclusions in regard to cancer. The disease is the work of a parasite and it is "a close messmate of man." It attacks only those who have passed the reproductive period, hence the individual sufferer may be destroyed without danger to the human species. And the parasite itself is in no danger of extinction because there are constant accessions to the ranks of the class susceptible to attacks by the pest.

THE accident to the Serbia gives a note of warning to steamship companies that the steamships should adopt the same plan that was used on sailing vessels, and carry duplicates of every piece of machinery that is liable to get out of order. Sailing vessels carried extra spars and sails to repair damages at sea. Had the Serbia carried an extra crank pin it would not have been necessary to get back to New York at great expense to the company and great inconvenience to the passengers.

A Boston paper has gone into quotations of Dickens and shrieks of agony over the "living death" of John Bardsley, sentenced to fifteen years' "solitary confinement" in the Eastern Penitentiary. The Boston contemporary may apply the balm of fact to the wounds of fancy. "Solitary confinement" in the Eastern Penitentiary is a farce. Although the penalologists who run the institution may still cling fondly to the theory, the crowded condition of the prison has long since forced them to forego the fact. Whatever be the abuses of the institution, that particular hideousness which stirred the indignant eloquence of Dickens is outworn.

THE number of Jews in Poland is 1,380,000 in a total population of 8,252,000. They form 40 per cent. of the population of Warsaw, and in all the other towns an average of 50 per cent., while in villages it falls to 7 per cent. Trades and industries in the city of Warsaw are almost entirely in the hands of the Hebrew population. In the higher branches of commerce the ratio is 16 Jews to 3 Christians, in the lower branches 19 Jews to 2 Christians, and in the agency and brokerage business 43 Jews to 1 Christian. Of the large industrial enterprises of the city 63 per cent. are in the hands of Jews and only 18 per cent. belong to native Christians. But few of the race are common workmen.

ACCORDING to the English wife of a Guatemalan coffee planter one can see to read by the light of the moon in that country. She says it is no uncommon thing to see a seniority reclining in a hammock, with a book in her hand, on her father's veranda in the Costa Cueva District, Guatemala, between 12 and 1 o'clock in the morning. "There are no moonlight nights in the United States or in England like we have in Guatemala," says the lady. "The moon at certain periods of the month is so bright that it is as light outdoors as during the day. It is too hot during the day in Costa Cueva to be out for pleasure, and all little excursions around the country are arranged to take place at night when the moon is bright."

WHILE a majority of the people of this country are opposed to the re-chartering of the Louisiana Lottery, they cannot indorse the methods which the anti-lotteryites of Louisiana are taking to secure this end. The resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of those opposed to the great corporation at Lincoln Parish are in direct contravention to the spirit of American institutions. The resolutions practically mean that if the anti-lotteryites cannot accomplish their ends by fair means they will resort to foul. They propose nothing short of physical revolution. Louisiana has never placed any check on outlawry; in fact, public opinion in the State seems to sustain such outbreaks. However, when it comes to "revolution" Uncle Sam will doubtless have something to say in the matter.

THE Daughters of the Revolution, the female descendants of those who whipped the British out of this country and established American independence, have organized in nearly all the states in the Union and are shouting for the old flag and an appropriation. What they want is $100,000 to erect a monument to mark the spot where sleep 11,500 soldiers and sailors of the revolution, who died in the prison ships at Wallabout, rather than accept the invitation of the British officers to enlist in the English army and fight against their country. The scheme is more patriotic than practicable. Repeated appeals have been made to Congress for this purpose, but without avail. When it comes to monument building Congress is ready to compete with New York. Government is a business institution. Monuments are sentimental affairs.

EFFECTS OF GOOD CROPS ON THE ALLIANCE.

From the Lincoln, Neb., Alliance.

Much is being said in the monopoly press about the effect of good crops on the alliance. Predictions are freely made that one good crop will destroy the society as well as the independent party. Nothing is more foolish. Is the alliance the outgrowth of last year's short crops? Not at all. On the contrary, the alliance has been making a slow, steady and sure growth for the past fifteen years. It was organized in this state in the winter of 1881-2, and has had a strong foothold in this state ever since, having held an annual meeting every winter since that date. The causes for the organization of the farmers and toilers of the nation lie far deeper than the scarcity from the crop failure of one or two years. What has the failure of crops to do with the gradual accumulation of wealth of the nation in a few hands until 25,000 men own more than the other 62,000,000? What have crop failures to do with fraudulent railroad construction and stock-watering until the whole railroad system has become a rotten, festering sore? What have crop failures to do with a financial system that makes the most potent function of the government—the power to issue money—an instrument of oppression in the hands of a select and aristocratic class? What have crop failures to do with a system of laws that have robbed the people of empires of public domain, and given to it corporations and land syndicates? If the alliance is the outgrowth of mere pecuniary privation and the discontent arising from it, how does it happen that instead of arising in Germany, for instance, where the agricultural classes are poor to the last degree and are taxed oppressively for the support of enormous standing armies, it should take its rise in the United States, where no such oppressive conditions exist and the people are free and intelligent? And why should the movement be strongest in the very class where the conditions of life are the easiest, and leisure for reading and study average the most during the year. The good crop cry is shallow in the last degree. The simple fact is that the present discontent is the legitimate outgrowth of the educational effort of the last generation. The people are beginning to understand economic laws. Education has developed the belief that the producer of wealth is entitled to the wealth he produces, and has developed intelligence enough to show why he does not get it.

THE movement is in its infancy. No number of good crop years will stop it. Justice in the division of wealth and just laws which produce equality of opportunities, instead of the reverse, will result from the conflict before it is ended.

PEOPLE'S PARTY LECTURE BUREAU.

The people's party lecture bureau has contracted with the following speakers to address the people upon the vital political questions of the day from now until the date of election. Most of them are well known as speakers of extraordinary ability, a few of whom have a national reputation.

The bureau is now prepared for business and ready to arrange for any of the following speakers to address the people during the campaign. Terms of speakers will be given upon application to this bureau. Now let us all get down to business:

Senator Peffer, Topeka; Hon. J. G. Otis, M. C. (after September 20), Topeka; B. J. Dreesen (German), Lawrence; Prof. J. C. Cline, Minneapolis; Dr. J. H. Oyster, Paola; Rev. B. F. Foster, Topeka; W. L. Brown, Kingman; Nels Anderson (Swede), Topeka; Rev. James Do Buchanan, Delphos; D. R. Kinsey, Kingman; Noah Allen, Wichita; John Clark, Kansas City, Mo.; Judge McKay, Atchison; W. J. Nickelson, Paola; Judge H. Stevens, Kansas City, Kan.; W. H. Bennington, Topeka; F. A. B. Montgomery, Goodland; Rev. D. James Lathrop, Topeka; L. H. Tibbets, Courtland; Dr. J. I. Arnold, Muncie; Dr. J. D. Cole, Hutchinson; "Greenback" Williams, Concordia; Mrs. F. R. Vickery, Emporia; Thomas W. Filruth (president national citizen's industrial alliance), Kansas City, Mo.

J. B. French, Manager, Topeka, Kan.

TO DOUBLE THE VALUE OF DEBTS.

From the Rising Sun, Md., Midland Journal.

To hear the callow politicians of the day, mere boys, as it were, shaking their heads and expressing doubts about the "policy" of free silver coinage, one that know no more about political economy than they do, would suppose that it was something new under the sun—a proposed experiment that the ignorant farmers' alliance had concocted, and that might explode the whole business fabric and knock things to smithereens. In place of it being new it is older than the nation and was the financial policy of the nation from its earliest infancy, from 1792 to 1873, and was abolished by a trick of English bankers, carried through congress by John Sherman, for the purpose of doubling the value of the government debt and all other debts which were in the hands of those foreign bankers. A new thing indeed! Free coinage is a very old thing; an octogenarian and compatriot of the great men of the revolution, a firm friend of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. Do you ever consider that when you are claiming to be disciples of Jeffersonian and Jacksonian democracy, and shaking your heads dubiously over "free silver," you are making asses of yourselves, and for the interest of a lot of foreign bankers?

THE DOWNFALL OF HALLISM.

From the Missouri World.

The Missouri alliance has been laboring under the disadvantage of having a politician for state president. About eight years ago, U. S. Hall, an attorney, after practicing law awhile in Moberly, Mo., and leading a rather reckless life in Kansas City, returned to his father's farm in Randolph county, Mo., where he was lost sight of by the public until some two years ago he was elected state lecturer of the alliance. He served in this capacity for a year, ignoring in a measure the principal demands of the alliance, and devoting the principal part of his lectures to the tariff, taking the democratic side of that issue. A year ago he was chosen state president. His conduct as president proved so plainly that he was endeavoring to make the alliance a tail to the democratic kite that strong protests began to come from the members throughout the state.

These protests finally led to the formation of two elements in the alliance—Hall and anti-Hall. The democratic politicians were for Hall, and by reason of the lack of true papers, and the unfaithfulness of the state organ, the Journal of Agriculture, there was built up a sentiment for Hall in a few counties. But the alliance men were not to have their grand organization play second fiddle to an old party. They went into the order for something better than the old parties had given. They joined the organization for the purpose of unity of action in an effort to secure justice for the toilers; and as soon as they caught on to what the Hall element was driving at, they began to pass resolutions in their sub and county unions denouncing Hall's course. As the state meeting approached the contest for delegates was between the Hall and anti-Hall man. In spite of Hall, the Journal of Agriculture, and the democratic politicians, a majority of true alliance men were chosen and at the meeting last week Hallism was defeated all along the line.

The alliance has been rescued from the hands of a political schemer, for Hall is a politician in the worst sense of the term. He was in obscurity until the alliance picked him up, and the best thing for the alliance men now to do, in our opinion, is to let him settle back to that obscurity. The alliance has asserted its independence; now let the good work of education go on, and let the watch-word be "Unity."

THEY ARE LIVE QUESTIONS.

Kate Field, the famous Washington correspondent, says in a recent letter: "It seems to me that those political optimists who have been hoping that the new party movement would be dissipated into thin air as soon as we had one season of good crops, must begin to doubt their gift of prophecy. Instead of vanishing in the face of the most abundant harvest that has been known in this country for many years, the farmers' party appear to consider this stroke of good fortune a special mark of the favor their budding revolution finds in the eyes of heaven. They have taken fresh courage from it. They argue, with much logic, that if they could accomplish what they did last year in spite of poverty and ridicule, they can do vastly more this year with money pouring in upon them and the nation at large thoroughly awake to a sense of their power. They are increasing rather than lessening their demands. * * *

It will not do for politicians or lawmakers anywhere to ignore the agitation of live questions which has begun among the farmers. Even though the forms the movement takes at first are crude, their essence is substantial, and a class of men who have heretofore let politics almost alone are coming to feel their own strength. History has told us what that means; and experience warns us that it will be wiser to open a few straight channels for the coming flood than to try to dam it with obstructions which will only increase its force when it finally sweeps them away.

EXTEND THE SYSTEM.

From the Huron, S. D. Ruralist.

Who loans the money? When the people demand that the government loan money to the people at the same rate that it does to the national banks, the plutes deny that the government loans it—simply "issues" and exacts a tax of one per cent. If to call it an issue instead of a loan, and a tax instead of interest, will satisfy them we are quite willing to make the change. If the government loaned to the bankers then the bankers could do with it as they pleased. Is this the case with the national bank bills issued to the national bankers? No, for the government directs how it shall be disposed of or used. They cannot invest in merchandise, engage in manufacturing, farming or mining. They cannot loan on real estate, etc. They can only use it to loan to the people. The government is the principal; the national banks are the agents of the government, and the government loans to the people through their agency. The government issues to their agents, the banks, and directs them how to loan to the people. The government is now doing through their agents just what we want them to do without that agency. "Issue direct to the people without the intervention of banks of issue." We are inclined to think that the plutes are right. The government issues to the banks but loans to the people. We want the high priced agents suspended, and the system extended. That is all.

THE REFORM PRESS AROUSED.

From the Farmers' Voice.

There are about 1,200 papers in the United States pledged to the popular reform movement now going on. They are scattered all over the country and accurately reflect the convictions and changing sentiment of millions of wealth creators.

The absolute verity of this statement cannot be successfully controverted.

It is noticeable that within the past few months these journals have taken on a sterner and more radical tone. Their editorials show an intense feeling of wrong; they are hot with wrath at certain evil conditions, and the men and classes which stand for them. They are not in doubt as to their oppressors, but name them with terrible frankness.

These newspapers of the people bristle with communications of sinister omen. Common men who work at the plow, forge, in mines, factories, shops and on railways write them, and they utter the fears which are now somberly brooding in the souls of millions of their fellows.

Alas, that so many of these letters speak of war and blood.

Not, mark you, as the wish of the writers that these horrors should be, but as the despairing conviction that our country is now being borne resistlessly onward by a stream of events which marks them an inevitable finality.

NEED RADICAL IMPROVEMENT.

John A. Martin submitted to the legislature on January 9, 1889:

"The laws concerning mortgages need revision and radical improvement. It should require something more than a mortgage to steal a man's farm, either in this or any other state. Appraisal of property before its sale under foreclosure should be surrounded with stringent limitations to protect the interests of the debtor, and the right of redemption should be not only extended but made secure. Our chattel mortgage laws invite outrages on property rights that are as flagrant as grand larceny, and the wrong and injustice that has been done under the shield of these laws is a disgrace to civilized government. Our mortgage laws should be generally remodeled so as to protect the interests and rights of debtors and mortgagors against the greed and inhumanity of creditors, mortgagees."

THE ALLIANCE GREATER THAN ITS LEADERS.

From the Charleston, Va., Advocate.

The farmers' alliance, as the great farmers' organization that is awakening so much alarm in political circles, is infinitely greater than any one or a dozen men in it. There is not an individual member enrolled on its list of membership, from the president down, that would not be given to understand by evidence most unmistakable that his services are only necessary in so far as his utterances and influence harmonizes with the demands of the united organization. No man we care not who he is, or what has been his past services, can deviate a hair's breadth from the course mapped out, but what he is checked by a reminder that the path in which he is to walk is as straight and narrow as the way to glory, and the admonition, "walk thou in it," accompanies the reminder. There is no instance now recorded where any one man or set of men who attempted to run the machine to suit his or their own personal ambition, but what he or they have come to grief. If this is so of those within the ranks, it is also eminently true of those without, and has been already forcibly illustrated. This is one of the most significant facts which goes to make up the grand aggregates of testimony that the alliance is most thoroughly organized, and is a unit in its conception of the evils against which it is contending, and thoroughly in harmony as to the remedies necessary to correct existing abuses. No outside issues seem to disturb or distract. They have their eyes and minds steadfastly fixed upon the goal they have set out to reach. Ridicule, sophistry, abuse or appeal are equally vain. They are moving as an avalanche, and gathering in volume of numbers as they move, and defeat and disaster awaits every issue or policy which impedes their advance. One year ago politicians scorned and ridiculed it; one year hence they will tremble and quake as they are scattered like chaff in the current which accompanies it. The cloud is gathering; the storm is approaching. Its bursting will not have been without warning. We are an army of men, every one of which is a leader, and the singleness and oneness of purpose quiets discord and smothered jealousies.

YES, WE WILL TELL YOU.

From the Atchison Champion.

It isn't natural causes that produced the farmers' revolt and led to the organization of the alliance and which gave it such potency at the polls last fall but political and economic causes, and since these still exist the so-called "calamity howl" is still justified.—Atchison Champion.

Will the Champion please tell us wherein the material condition of the people has been so wrought upon during the past year and a half by "political and economic causes" (which have not been changed for more than two decades) as to produce or justify, all of a sudden, the hue and cry that has been raised? Nothing is clearer to our mind than that, but for the unusual hard times, the result of crop failures mainly, the independent political movement that is revolutionizing (?) the country would never have been heard of.—Wichita Eagle.

"The hue and cry that has been raised all of a sudden," as our esteemed contemporary, the Wichita Eagle, puts it, was simply the culmination or the climax of a long-growing discontent among the farmers because of the unprofitableness of agriculture, induced by legislation chiefly in the interest of the manufacturing and capitalist classes, and indirectly against the farmers. The outbreak or open revolt was, it is true, sudden, just as any formal expression of revolt is sudden, but in no other sense.

For more than ten years past the farmers of Kansas had realized that they were pursuing their vocation at a loss; that no matter how small their crops, there was no proportionate increase of prices; that corporations—railroads, trusts, middlemen, and every other class upon whom they were dependent were preying upon them, gobbling the lion's share, even at the low current prices, and that they were being victimized by a combination of politicians, corporations and financial magnates, who were enabled to secure legislation specially favorable to their interests and directly hostile to that of agriculture, in the form of so-called protective tariffs, and in a number of other things too well known to require special mention.

And, waking up to the situation as thus briefly outlined—that they were being arrogantly imposed upon, used as mere tools for plutocratic aggrandizement through politics—and unwilling to submit to this dominance "any longer, the farmers revolted, as they had a right to do, and, as a matter of sheer self-protection, they were compelled to do.

The very causes that inspired, justified this revolt and fully justified its maintenance, for the simple and undeniable reason that the political and economic conditions, in the main, are precisely now what they were a year and a half ago.

"The hard times and poor crops," to which the Eagle refers as the immediate cause of the farmers' revolt, were not so much the cause as the justifying occasion for the organization of the revolt. The causes really lie deeper than crop failures and the consequent hard times. They revolve around the great question which is fundamental to our form of government, namely, whether this shall be in deed and fact a government of the whole people and for the people, or simply a government by a single favored class—a government of and for and by the rich—a plutocracy. That, in short, is the vital issue of the movement, and everything else is but incidental.

The fact that Kansas farmers are prosperous this year—having enormous crops and good prices—doesn't affect the issue one way or another, because the prosperity, great and enjoyable as it is, is only temporary, there being no assurance of its continuance next year; and, further, our present prosperity is the direct result, not of any favorable political or economic changes, but merely of a fortunate accident—for us—an unprecedented foreign crop shortage. But for this fact our present big crops would have been a drug on the market, and the prices of farm products would have been lower than they were in 1889, when Kansas had a very large corn crop, which was sold for 10 and 12 cents.

Whether the crops had been good or bad for the past two years, the irrepressible conflict between the agricultural and the manufacturing and capitalist classes, or between the common people, and the plutocrats, remained a fact, and its expression in revolt would have taken place all the same. This is the whole matter in a nutshell.

THE STORY OF THE BROTHERS.

From the El Dorado, Kan., Republican.

"Here are three gentlemen; each of them have $10,000 to invest; this man invests his in a farm, this one in a saw-mill, and this one in 10 per cent bonds. The farmer works from morning till night, and he works hard, too, if he is a good farmer; all his family work hard all the year round, and he does not make over $100 or $200 at the end. This man who invests in a saw-mill works hard, and he does not make over $200 or $300 clear. What does this man do who has invested in bonds except to watch these men work? and at the end of six months the mail brings him his interest, $500 clear cash, and it did not even cost him the postage. At the end of another six months the mail brings him another, and it does not cost him any more than the first. Now I say to you, why should money be worth more than the farm or the saw-mill? Why should this man be protected more than the others? Does not our law show any justice? There is no justice about it."—Peffer's speech.

Now let's look at that story:

First. If a Kansas farmer can't make over $100 or $200 at the end of a year out of a $10,000 farm he ought to join the alliance and get a salary as lecturer. There are plenty of farmers in Kansas who average year in and year out, 20 per cent on their investments. If a saw-mill man can't beat that he had better go out of the business. And finally, where is the banker going to get his 10 per cent bonds? There are no government bonds available drawing that interest; no railway bonds that pay 10 per cent. Where is he going to get his bonds?

Second. Let's add another brother to the list—the brother who starts a store. The farmer, if he is any kind of a farmer, can make 15 per cent on his investment. There is no law against that. The miller can make 20 per cent on his $10,000; there's no law against that. The merchant, when a man comes in for a $100 worth of goods on thirty days' time, charges him from 20 to 30 per cent profit; no law against that. And yet when the banker charges more than $1 for $100 a month (1 per cent) the law nabs it. And yet Peffer says that "the laws of the world and the customs of society always discriminate in favor of money and against Kansas labor." Oh Calamity; Oh Whiskers, thy name is rot.

KANSAS MORTGAGES.

From the National Economist.

As a matter of self-defense and not for the purpose of adding anything of weight to the distressed and overburdened people of Kansas, the Economist prints the official census report of the mortgage indebtedness of that state. For some time past the financial condition of Kansas has been considered the test of the success or failure of the present economic system of the country. Because of this fact and the persistent and continued misrepresentation by the partisan press in relation to this condition, the alliance has become a unit in a determination to have the real facts made known to the public. Not that the debt of Kansas should be given any more publicity, or the poverty and distress of its people any more prominence than those of other states, but because the money lenders of the east and their agents in that state, have attempted to bulldoze public opinion by denouncing as "calamity howlers" all who would not join in concealing the truth. It is time that the people were made known their desperate condition, and no matter whether it falls on Kansas, Michigan, Georgia, or any other of all the states, the plain facts should be given in plain terms, that a change of methods may be inaugurated at once:

Total for state—$235,485,108; total on acres, $167,145,039; total on lots, $68,340,066.

There is an unpaid debt on state and railroad land contracts which are equivalent to mortgages, not included in the table, as follows: State contracts $3,667,735; railroad contracts, $3,993,933; total, $7,661,718.

Added together, this gives an aggregate of $243,146,826 as the mortgage indebtedness of Kansas January 1, 1890, according to the census report. Comment seems unnecessary, as this plain statement is known to be as small as a rigid system of deductions could well make it. The Economist and all those who are seeking to have the truth made known, and a change of methods inaugurated are willing to rest their case on this naked report, and on its showing demand a change of conditions.

THE OUTLOOK.

For the Mexico, Tex., Echo.

Never before in the history of the United States has there been such an onslaught on an organization as is now being made on the alliance. Almost the entire press outside of the reform press are making a relentless fight against it, both democratic and republican. Nearly all the leading politicians on both sides are fighting us. The fight, too, seems to be thoroughly organized, as it is being made about on the same line in every state. The general policy seems to be to secure the services of a few alliance leaders. Have them to deal out slush, slander, falsehoods and misrepresentations, and then the press passes it around with favorable comments. And the wisecracking politicians set upon their perches and sing out, won't do, won't do, he, he, won't do. The question arises, why this onslaught? Why such unanimity in the opposition, and why such desperate means are being resorted to overthrow the order?

The answer is plain and clear. It is the first formidable organization that has dared attack directly the Wall street and Lombard money power and endeavored to throttle their relentless grasp on the throat of the toiling masses. This is the issue and no dodging it: The people in open rebellion against the money power and oppression of Wall street. That the opposition is powerfully entrenched behind its millions there is no doubt. But, yet, there is hope. So far no particular inroad has been made into our ranks, but we are steadily gaining ground every day. The press to a great extent has lost its influence over the people, and turn-coat politicians have completely played out, and if we can only succeed in getting every farmer and laborer, and every friend of pure and honest democratic government to look this question squarely in the face, victory will perch upon our banner and our money kings be dethroned of political power. Brethren study this question well and meet it like true and brave soldiers. Every man must be to his post and every sentinel on the watchtower.

INNOCENT AND CLEAN HUMOR.

Great Men and Women Have Recognized Its Value and Necessity.

People should laugh. We are told that a merry laugh is better than medicine. The pages of our periodicals of nearly every description give a little space to the last effort of the "funny man." Even religious journals have room in their columns for a few "pleasant" or "spicy" paragraphs.

With many other readers who enjoy most heartily something really "funny" we say blessings upon the head of the maker of innocent, clean humor. But there are humorous styles which we cannot class as "innocent humor," as it certainly does not elevate the moral tone of the reader.

The parents and guardians of young people should pause before retelling a joke containing a flippant allusion to sacred subjects. Death, the future state of being, ministers, deacons, missionaries, good and pure women, temperance workers, or noted characters in the scriptures are often made the theme for a hurtful paragraph by the would-be funny man.

We were painfully reminded of the abundant supply of wit one evening while dipping from a number of periodicals of good repute for the column of a paper to be read in school. The editor, a bright young boy new to the work, was endeavoring to fill the pages of the "weekly" with really helpful articles, interesting to young people from twelve to sixteen. His own judgement was excellent, but there were a few pupils not willing to listen to "dry stuff." "Something funny" was wanted, and asked for. It was a very natural desire, but when we came to search for the humor that had sparkle and savor in it that we cared to give a place in the boys' and girls' own paper, we found painfully few gems. A few original contributions from the pupils told plainly a story that even so early in life somebody's idea of "something funny" was a combination of coarse slang and yet coarser humor.

Do we realize when laughing over and quoting a witty thing tainted with irreverence, coarse slang, and perhaps worse things that by so doing young lips take up the joke, pass it around, and enjoy it immensely? Who has not met the well meaning men or women, generous, warm-hearted, kind, and lovable, but with an unhappy tendency to express themselves in coarse speech, bordering on vulgarity, which was their one failing?

While the dignified Washingtonian style of language and deportment has given place to the free and easy manner of to-day we should guard against too much freedom when striving to be funny.

Another friend, a young man, a student in a business college, is also an editor of the college weekly. For the "selected" department he too desired "something funny." Among the original contributions sent to him for its columns by fellow-pupils, aged from 16 to 27, there were several decidedly objectionable ones that had been pronounced splendid by a majority of the students.

Much, very much evil can be done by the reading, retelling, and encouraging in the home circle of this pernicious humor. Often we find that a beloved son's moral standard is being perceptibly lowered. The girls listen and laugh at his jests, which become coarser, finally shading into ribald ones. The effect upon character is a lasting blight, though no one can tell when and where the first evil step began. The ones who planted the first seed by enjoying loose and irreverent humor will likely go to the grave in ignorance of the truth "that they are the offenders."

Fortunately there are funny men and women who have the gift of giving to the world clean, sparkling humor. We think that Robert Burdette has carried a laugh into homes where a real, jolly laugh was not an every-day occurrence. Upon one occasion we heard a sad, sorrowful mother laughing heartily—a sound that was indeed a rare one. Much affliction and sorrow were bowing her head low. Looking up from her paper almost apologetically she said: "I was only readin' somethin'! It's enough to make a cat laugh, but there's nothin' bad in it." "Daddy" heard it; one of Burdette's funny things. Little John and Evelyn were called in to listen. We thought "thank God that a laugh can be carried into darkened homes and good come of it."

Marietta Holley's humorous style has certainly carried into many homes the helpful articles which would not have been admitted only for the fun in them. While the earnest desire to carry to each reader something good and helpful is plainly apparent to the most careless, humorous style in which Aunt Samantha says her say insures for her a double welcome because of the laughs it carries to the readers.

A peculiarly successful mission worker among the very poor, though unable to make even a short speech or sing a note, makes good use of her power to interest and hold those attracted by her innocent, humorous way of "having her say," while imparting valuable instruction to those who sadly need it.

While life is serious as sorrow is many we are not to forget that a "merry heart doth good like a medicine." Good authority assures us that a little nonsense is relished by the best of men.—Ella Guernsey, in Hearth and Hall.

Live Peaceably.

"If it be possible, as much as in you lies, live peaceably with all men." The Apostle, by the wording of his text, admits that there may be some persons with whom it is not possible to live peaceably, or with whom the only way of peace is to keep away from them. It is really amazing to note and to feel the entire difference in people's dispositions. There are persons with whom it would be a dear bargain to dwell one month for the price of a thousand years added to your life; and again there are those whose intimate companionship for a month would be worth all of one's subsequent life. 'Tis said that it takes two persons to make a quarrel, but it doesn't follow that there is always fault on both sides when two people can't live comfortably together. Even two well-meaning people may not be able to do so. Well-meaning consists with most intolerable habits, and when one has found that the ways of a companion are established in such a sort as grind and grate perpetually upon his feelings and keep him in a constant state of annoyance and distress, let him decamp, if he can. If he cannot, let him use his best endeavors to keep sweet-tempered under the aggravating irritation.

Pugs Were Scarce.

A member of the Board of Trade who had been in the habit of patronizing bon ton restaurants, but through force of circumstances was compelled to seek out places where the very cheapest of fare was dispensed, recently dropped into a basement restaurant where he very imperiously ordered "sausages" at five cents a plate.

"How you like dot sissengers," asked the German waiter, "you like em poodled or you get em kyeoodled."

The patron thinking that "poodled" or "kyeoodled" were German translations of the words "boiled" or "fried" he ordered "kyeoodled."

The dish was presented which sent up to Heaven a most disagreeable aroma and one mouthful so thoroughly disgusted the gentleman, that after recovering the powers of speech he got up and approaching the waiter fairly shrieked:

"What do you mean by giving me such a glue factory dinner?"

"Dond yer like der sissengers?"

"Dond yer like der sissengers?" exclaimed the man. "They are the worst specimen of mongrel cur that I ever saw."

"Dot may been so, mine friend, dond got excited, mine boy dond was shteeal some English pug for more as three weeks yet already."—National Weekly.

The Cable Speed of Electricity.

The experiments now in progress at McGill College, Montreal, under the auspices of the British and Canadian Governments, to ascertain the longitude of Montreal by direct observations from Greenwich, have led to the accomplishment of a remarkable telegraphic feat. The English papers report it thus: "The first thing to determine was the length of time it took a telegraphic signal to cross the Atlantic. An automatic contrivance, whereby the land line could work into the cable, was provided, and a duplex circuit was arranged, so that the signal sent from Montreal would go over the land lines to Canso (Nova Scotia), thence to the cable to Waterville, Ireland, and return to Montreal again. Attached to the sending and receiving apparatus was a chronograph, which measured the time. Out of 200 signals sent, it was found that the average time taken to cross the Atlantic and back again—a distance of 8,000 miles—occupied a trifle over one second, the exact time being one second and five hundredths. Professor McLeod is carrying on the experiments with Mr. Hosmer, the manager of the Canadian Pacific telegraphs.—Scientific American.

Preference of Birds for Drab Nests.

Dr. C. C. Abbott says that in experimenting on the intelligence of birds he placed a number of pieces of woolen yarn—red, yellow, green, purple, and gray in color—near a tree in which a couple of Baltimore Orioles were building their nest. The pieces of yarn were all exactly alike except in color. There was an equal number of threads of each color, the red and yellow being purposely placed on top. The birds chose only the duller colors, taking all of the gray and a few threads of the purple when the nest was nearly done.

Not a single thread of the red or bright yellow was touched, the bird seeming instinctively to know that such loud colors would make their domicile too conspicuous. Again he experimented by girdling the branches upon which nests were located causing the leaves to shrivel and blow away. Although they had laid their eggs, the birds invariably left their nests. If the nests contained young when the leaves dried up, notwithstanding the exposure they would feed the little ones until they were able to take care of themselves.

The Starch of Plants.

It is generally believed that after the fall of leaves the reserve tissues of ligneous plants remain filled with starch until spring, the epoch at which this substance emigrates in order to serve in the evolution of buds, in the development of the root and the formation of a new layer of wood. The hibernical period is consequently considered that in which the amylaceous reserve is most abundant. It results from the researches of Emile Mer that such is not the case, and that in the vegetation of ligneous plants there occur two acts that up to the present have passed unperceived—one a re-absorption of starch at the end of autumn, and the other a genesis at the beginning of spring, each of them having a duration of from six weeks to two months. It hence follows that winter, far from being the season during which the amylaceous reserve is the greatest, is precisely that in which it is the least.

Mrs. Emma D. Pack, Editor,

WOMEN should organize.
We must discuss remedies.
We must fight for our rights.
We must demand, not request.
We must not tolerate our enemies.
We want simple justice, not charity.
We want representation if we pay taxes.

Who are the people, men, or men and women?

We must purify our minds if we would elevate mankind.

We must express our political ideas from a political standpoint.

If woman is the better half of man, women are the better half of the people.

ALL laws that punish women as men should be given by women as well as men.

We want a voice in the laws that locks the prison doors against our fallen sisters.

We must be helpmates to our husbands, for when they fail the wife and children suffer.

THE Women's Alliance is not fighting the men but the laws that separate men and women.

We must agitate and educate; we must establish a system of public good among ourselves.

We must have opinions of our own, and at all times and proper places enthusiastically express them.

WHEN men and women work and vote together in the interest of mutual protection, divorce laws will be repealed.

THE Lord so loved the world that he gave His only begotten Son that whosoever would might live, the women included.

WHEN you hear of a man that openly affirms that when his wife votes he will get a divorce, watch him; he is a dangerous man.

THE Equal Suffrage Association has been a great blessing to our women. Now let the Women's Alliance and all women's associations work together for the greatest number, men included.

The Daily Capital of Topeka, in speaking of the National Women's Alliance, heads the article with, "The Women Take a Hand." It is well to understand that they do take a hand in all things that has a tendency towards raising the standard of morality higher.

THE women of this vast universe have arisen in their might to reclaim this country. They have not enlisted in this war for sport, but with as much determination to win as did the soldiers when they went forth to save the stars and the stripes. God bless the day when we may stand as a free nation.

Mrs. W. M. CLARDY, of Sulphur Springs, Texas, vice president of the National Women's Alliance, is speaking and organizing Women's Christian Alliances at present in Hunt county. She is meeting with good success, although she reports money exceedingly scarce. She is a fine speaker, organizer and lecturer.

The woman's department of the great Kansas City Interstate Fair, October 3-11, is in charge of Mrs. Patti Moore, the World's Fair Commissioner from Missouri. Mrs. Moore was honored by Governor Francis in making the appointment, on account of her able management of the woman's department at Kansas City, which she has conducted successfully for the past eight years.

FOR FARMER'S WIFE.

CHEER UP.

Cheer up, friends, now do not worry,
For on the People's Party you can depend;
They will help you pay your mortgage,
And you the money at 2 per cent will lend.
Come join us and rest securely,
And let the people help guard your bed;
They will watch your every interest,
Though abuse is heaped upon their heads.

Come, now, join and be brave, and help us;
Help to kill oppression's kings;
Help us feed the hungry children;
Come, help do these noble things—
Help to free the thousand bondsmen
That to-day are toiling, sad;
By your vote's help get their freedom;
Help us make their future glad.

Help us crush this high taxation,
Unjust laws, and tariff, too;
Help us make this a free nation,
Trusting God to help us through.
For monopolies we have no use for,
Though men wise, we women condemn;
They think we're not as capable of thinking
As the wise and lordly men.

But we can talk, and we can think,
If we cannot cast our vote;
We'll not be slaves—oppression must sink;
And so the story we will write.
We'll send it East, we'll send it West,
We'll never rest by day or night
Until each sister with her freedom is blest;
We'll scorn the wrong but cherish the right.

And when the money sharks again
From Wall street, in their broadcloth line,
Ask our husbands to help them reign,
We'll step out more than ninety and nine,
And show them how we taught the school.
While they all talked and the story wrote,
We sisters just made another rule
That we would tell them how to vote.

For no millionaires, but brave men I see,
Shall sit in our fine Congress hall;
And in the White House, then, in '92,
We'll place good men that will not fail—
Men who'll think more of honor than gold,
And feel that all should have a home,
And demand our rights for us quite bold;
Who'll help the poor, not the rich alone.

Is Knowledge of Business Essential for Women?

We answer yes; just as important for women as it is for men. In the first place, the wife and mother cannot be a successful housekeeper without having some idea of business to manage her household affairs, or else all her efforts to be saving and economical will be a failure. She has many places to watch that requires a skillful eye, and unless she possesses some business qualities and understands how to manage, as only a well-informed housekeeper can, there will be a drainage; and however small it may be, unless checked, it will soon add many dollars to the household expenses. So we say, for the welfare of home, it is well to have some practical knowledge of business.

And again, how many women have been left alone with a family to raise and educate, with plenty to make them comfortable, but, through her ignorance of business, she has been obliged to resort to legal advice, and has lost all that a kind and thoughtful husband had saved for them. It is not always the fault of wives that they are ignorant of any and all kinds of business. Husbands think many times they are doing their wives a kindness by keeping the true state of their business from them. But it is a sad mistake. Husbands do not do justice by their wives when they neglect to help them gain an insight in business. Many a home would be less miserable if the wife had known the true state of her husband's affairs.

We do not advocate that it is best or wise for a woman to be at the head of the business establishment, but we do advocate the propriety of a woman understanding her husband's business in all its details, so to enable her, if sickness or death comes, to take care of her interests and those of her children. Oftentimes the husband is sick, and through the inability of the wife to look after his interests, everything is entrusted to the care of strangers, and often when he is able to take charge again his business is ruined. We cannot see any impropriety in a woman taking an interest in her husband's business. She has as much at stake as he has. If he fails, she fails with him; if he prospers, she prospers with him. Their interests are identical and the same. Then pray tell, is it not as important for the wife as the husband to have an understanding of the business.

In the City of New York there is a society of ladies formed for the purpose of informing themselves, that they may become better acquainted with the laws and give them an insight into lines of business. Too many of our sex are ignorant of the laws and business ways of the world, not that we are not capable of learning, for women in all ages have excelled in literature and all the arts. The "Daughters of Israel" lent their skillful hand in the erection of the temple, to aid where man's clumsy fingers could not compass. The women of this day only claim the privilege of the past ages, and we cannot understand why any of our sisters should think it immodest for one to advocate our right, and the necessity of obtaining a thorough knowledge of business. We believe it very important that we should make use of all the opportunities that we possibly can to enlighten us. Though fortune smiles on us to-day, to-morrow it may be dark and drear; without one ray of light. So let us improve the sunshine, and arm ourselves as far as possible with the proper weapons; so if called upon we may be able to protect ourselves and families, and take care of our interests at all times and places. We may never have the responsibility, but it is far better to be prepared to meet adversities and not meet them, than to meet them unprepared. We know not what to-morrow may bring forth. Therefore, let us all as far as possible be prepared—let it be prosperity or adversity. The time may come when we will not have the strong arm of a husband to lean on, nor his face to shield us. And then! all, then! how much harder to battle with a cold and merciless world, if we have not taken the precaution to prepare and equip ourselves for the change. Then let us feel it an honor, and not unwomanly, to be able to protect ourselves.

WOMEN VOTING.

The Election Spirited. The Women Voting in Every State and Territory.

The five highest candidates for President come in their order as follows:
Gen. J. B. Weaver, of Iowa.

Mrs. Fannie McCormick.

On the first page of this issue we present to our readers the portrait of Mrs. Fannie McCormick, president of the National Women's Alliance. Mrs. McCormick lives on a farm near Great Bend, Kansas; she was the candidate for State Superintendent of Public Instruction on the Farmers' Alliance ticket in 1890, and with her assistance and other brave women of the state, Kansas was reduced from radical rule. She is the worthy foreman of the Knights of Labor of Kansas, and is well fitted for the honorable position she now holds.

THE Farmer's Wife contest will close November 3d. No votes will be received after that date. It is the only chance you will have to get the paper three months for 10 cents.

SEVERAL Farmer Alliance men were standing on a street corner the day after election last fall wearing a broad smile and listening to news of their success, when a defeated Republican candidate for representative passed by. He said, "I can't see what you hay-seeds are laughing about." "Why," says one, "didn't you tell us out to the school house last Saturday night that we must grin and bear it, and now you are mad if we laugh a little."

What a Wise Woman Says.

That the useful girl never gets married, because she can't be spared.

That almond meal is better for the face than any soap except castile.

That the orris root has a sweeter and more permanent fragrance than any other perfume powder.

That your diamonds should be washed in boiling hot suds, rinsed in cold water, clouded with ammonia and dried in jeweler's saw-dust.

That your dress waists hold their shape better if folded away in a drawer, and are delicious to wear if they are wrapped in perfumed covers.

That nothing is so beneficial to the complexion as a bath in cream every night while you stay in the country, leaving it to dry on the face, and for a nightcap a big glass of rich country milk, taken just before you go to sleep.

Valuable Household Hints.

Butter for cooking should always be clarified.

Bread that is to be kept for a week should be kneaded longer than that to be eaten soon.

New tins should be set over the fire, filled with water, for some hours before using them.

In selecting salt mackerel, examine them carefully. If rusty in appearance reject them.

Soap lasts much longer if bought by the quantity; cut in squares and kept in a dry place to harden.

Mustard for instant uses should be mixed with milk—to which a little thin cream should be added.

The marrow in bones should be scraped out and used for cooking. It is more delicate for this purpose than suet.

In "trying out" or clarifying butter it is done when the froth begins to rise. Skim, strain, store in a cool place and keep well covered.

Don't put it off, but send at once your choice for President and Vice President.

REMEMBER you only have until November 3d. to vote in the Farmer's Wife contest for President and Vice President.

WHY?

BY EMILY ACTON.

What does she want, this woman strangely bold,
Who knocks and knocks and will not be defied?
Why is she not contented as of old,
Nestling down meekly by the fireside?
That is the place for women, fair and sweet;
Her throne, the honored wife and mother's
chair;
Not the great hall, where thronging thousands
meet,
A din of words battles fills the air.
Is she not wrapped about with tenderest care,
And man obedient to her very thought?
Why should she seek to stand and struggle where
The bitter battles of the world are fought?
Go, seek that woman who her footsteps turned Back to her home, absent a little space,
And ask her, why the scaling terrors burned
Such channels in her once calm, happy face?
The wrath of Juggernaut will strong men brave
For the poor heathen, and their wealth out-pour;
But none this mother's little child could save,
Crushed by a treacherous wagon at her door.*
And thousands throw themselves beneath the wheels
Of this great traffic, as it onward rolls;
What reck they, then, the pang a mother feels?
What care they for woman's tortured souls?
Or ponder look, some night, when even the stars
Have dimmed their shining ere the day-dawn's glow;
A faint light gleams between the window-bars,
And weary heads and shoulders still stoop low.
Over some piece of shop work. Heavens and earth!
I call ye both to witness that if men
Were doomed to toil as women, from their birth,
The world would soon be wilderness again.
And there are places where the midnight goes
In revelry and pleasure; song and wine
Are flushing rounded cheek to deeper rose,
And toneyed words make bright eyes brighter shine.
Yes, but the circle ever downward trends,
And in its lowest depths are saddest sights;
There, with loud song a rude, coarse laughter
blends,
And shadowy forms flit shameless through the night.
These dreiful shadows of the under world
It is not fitting she should know, men say;
True, but to their dark depths are women hurled,
From squalid homes and work-shops, every
day.
Day after day, where wheels of traffic turn,
Fainting and worn with hunger and distress;
Striving a little more reward to earn,
And finding her employer gives her less.
What shall she do, this creature, born a queen;
With right to God's own sunshine and pure
air?
Debating, and deciding, oft, between
Death and a life of utter, dark despair.
Do not, good men, by all that in them lies,
Strive to defeat these evils, hour by hour;
And do you blame a woman, when, with eyes
Tear-wet, she asks the gift of higher power?
That power so potent in this struggling earth,
That which can make the poor man equal
stand
With him who in a palace had his birth;
That power which sways the fortunes of the
land.
But softly! for the wise men sit apart,
(And when they perish, wisdom sure will die.)
And say, "the throne of women is man's heart;
There let her bide until these storms go by."
"Offer for her to seek the gentler rule
Of learning, piety or household tasks,
Marry, bear children, sew, or teach a school;
Only in these she finds the power she asks."
Fine words! But when men's law a woman ranks
With paupers, idiots and the sons of crime,
Small wonder if she fail to offer thanks.
The century's clock is striking now the time
When she should rise and take her proper place;
She who can think, and feel, and work, and
plan,
And do her part to elevate the race
And have an equal right in life with man.

The Relation of Woman's Suffrage to Modern Reforms.

BY MRS. P. A. STAFFORD.

We constantly hear, from all sides, the place for women is the home. It is what you choose to make it. For a short it is. But are we needed in no other place? The great contest in the Methodist church as to whether women were needed or had a right to a voice in the council was decided by a majority of that august body that they had no right and were not needed. But they are very pleasant and patronizing over this victory. They say to their women: Your sphere is the home; go on with your work. You must do all in your power to bring sinners to God and the church. Go as missionaries to the crowded cities, to the prisons, the asylums, the saloons, the gambling dens; to the Indians and foreign heathen lands. Explain the mission of Christ: His love for all mankind. Work at home, in the pulpit, the lecture field; everywhere where there is work to do or sacrifice to be made. Thus far, but no farther, can you come. We will maintain our rights to rule.
Imagine the condition of affairs if in the future women would stay at home, worn out with trying and accomplishing so little; stay in what a majority of men say is our sphere or place. What would the ministers do? Preach to empty pews! No need of the bell to call the children to Sunday school; they would be at home with their mothers, where they belong, making home pleasant for them and teaching them to be obedient to their self-appointed rulers. For ages past women have borne the burden of disgrace of the first sin committed. The old story of the Garden of Eden is repeated to us very often—so often that it has become thread-bare. Admitting this story to be true, has not over six thousand years of servitude been sufficient to obliterate this one act of disobedience? Why not give her the benefit of repentance and reinstate her when she has done all in her power to make amends for the wrongs done.

The destroyers of homes and families are well entrenched,—behind by the statutes of law, in front by public opinion and flanked on either side by ignorance and credulity. We are powerless, we can do nothing while we are shut out, save to look through the windows of the saloon, with feelings that none but a mother can know. See the boys tempted and fall into the maelstrom of intemperance. The gambling dens and dives are near companions in vice. Whose sons and daughters are here? Not ours, we say, but some other mother's, that loved and directed them as carefully, and conscientiously as we, and some are there who never knew the influence of home and mother. In our country life we do not see these things, but the inclination of people are to the cities. When we know these things to be true, we gather our children in our arms and feel at times that death for them would be preferable to this influence. How anxiously we watch their inclinations. The period of childhood is short, and too soon for us they come in contact with these dread foes, and too often the promised pleasures of these vices daze and bewilder their senses, and little by little their better judgment is overcome, and ere long the blush of shame is banished from their once virtuous brows. Can it be that we have not done our duty to our children? Have we sent them out into the world unarmed and unwarmed as to these things? Pope says:

"Vice is a monster of such hideous mien,
To be hated needs but to be seen;
But seen too oft, familiar with its face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

When our children leave the home to battle with the world, what do they find? Not the mother's patient mind and hand, helping in the directing of the church councils, or sitting with the law-makers, or in seats of judgment in the State. The fiat went forth ages ago. Thus far, but no farther, can you come. They are all men here. They say to us: By nature you are too weak to stand the strain of such complications as present themselves in these affairs. Your duties as wife and mother are all we men will permit you to bear. We will shield you from all outside burdens. Mistaken generosity! These mountains of Vice will never be leveled until our influence and voice reach into the halls of State, and side by side we will make laws and execute them, to govern men and women alike one standard of morals for both sexes; then will the rights of man be secured. The women of the church have seized the weapon that bound them, and by their superior wisdom and skill are striking the manacles from their tortured bodies and will make them serve as their liberators, proclaiming the glad tidings,—hoping working, watching. No laggard there when they receive the inspiration.

We have all the same object in view. Each have the same motive—to better the conditions of mankind. The obstacles are so varied, we work in different channels and by different methods, hoping and despairing by turns, but still confident that justice, though traveling a rugged, winding road, will come out on the higher level, in the bright sunlight, revealing the strength and depth of the mother's love. No sneer too rude, no obstacle too high, no channel so wide or deep but what the mothers will cross them to protect our strong hold, the home,—the haven of rest for the weary, the only sure foundation for the perpetuation of good government. And until then a government of the people, for the people and by the people is a farce. Our government is by a large home. The parental roof shelters and provides for each territory until it arrives at its majority, statehood. Then it is considered capable of self-government and incorporates into its constitution whatever seems to be for the best interest of a majority of the governed, and from time to time amendments are added. Is it possible that everything in nature is progressing and still one-half the human family struggling for their God-given rights that have been wrested from them by the perversity of men?

The International Council of women held at Washington, D. C., in March, had representatives from most of the civilized governments of the world, their object being the emancipation of our sex, and to have this clause engrafted into their constitutions and statutes of law. Some, and may be all, of us will close our weary eyes in the sleep that knows no waking before this is accomplished, but we will leave breeches in the wall of prejudice that coming generations can easily widen and carry.

Our boasted christian civilization feel that they have done their duty when they build almshouses, homes for inebriates and fallen women, houses of correction and schools for the children, but is it not morally wrong to license the institutions that produce these unfortunates, and take their blood-money to build charitable institutions to shelter these wrecks of poor humanity that under different conditions might have made the world better. If we could see the tears, hear the groans and realize the self-rings for only one day that these legalized and protected leeches draw from suffering humanity, hope would give way to despair. The emancipation proclamation of our revered Lincoln was a military necessity, but give the right of franchise to only one-half the slaves he declared free, giving to them all the rights of citizen-ship that every man of 21 years of age possessed, thus securing their allegiance to the government,—this was a political necessity.

As a nation we are politically corrupt, and shall it be said we are morally so? As we revere truth and justice, and all that tends to a higher civilization, we say that both the political and moral necessity demands the free and full franchise of all women, both white and black. We are subject to taxation without representation, and considered by our law-makers the better half of mankind.

We are still working, hoping, watching, and for more than forty years have been rapping at the door of State with no uncertain sound, and the question is how much longer are we to stand waiting for our political freedom? The ominous sounds of discontent are borne to us on every breeze from all the civilized nations of the earth, saying to us the world is ready for a new era, but not one ushered in by the beating of drums and roar of cannon, but a revolution wrapped in the mantle of peace. Voters, shall it be delayed by a compromise with all these scourges that are destroying homes and laying waste the best talent the world can produce and making serfs of our once free people, or shall it be equality before the law?

OCTOBER.

BY MRS. IDA JACKSON.

The crimson and gold of the maples,
The drifted in hollow and grove;
The wood-nymphs the dolls have forsaken,
"Neath emerald arches to rove.
The song-birds are wandering southward,
In search of a summer clime;
They know chill November will mantle,
All nature in shimmering rime.
The wand of Queen Indian Summer,
Whose blue, misty veil girds the hills;
Will summon from frost's ray portals,
A snow-sprite to silence the rills.
The asters droop low in the meadows,
The wood-bines red banners still wave;
The sunnys have lighted their watch-dre,
Around pale September's lone grave.

The Alliance Children's Home Kindergarten.

BY MRS. E. E. LATHROP.

The child-life is much like a plant in some respects, it grows best in its own native soil and environment, it cannot endure too much change from its natural means of support. Too often in these modern artificial times, children, like pot-plants, are grown under unnatural conditions, either in the hot-bed of the school room, or the confines of the kitchen, or like the neglected vines of the waste places, are left to grow up under the feet of every beast and among the poisonous and cramped conditions; thousands of young are neither born right nor have any more chance for training into some natural form and character in these swarming and breeding haunts of our large cities. But like the plant, in either of the above conditions, if the child is brought into life out of harmony with nature, either physically or mentally, its training will first properly consist of a change into a condition suited to the gathering to itself of those elements natural to its own aptitude or personal characteristics. Otherwise, under the false and artificial training in becoming like others, it will either not develop its own life force and character, or bent, and its life be lost in the generalized conditions of socialism merely to ensure its physical support; or under the neglected condition, become so opposite to others and lose its higher life-sense and divine bent, as to leave it on the animal plan of contention and strife, to grow up in the great human mob fighting for bare existence. And in both classes of child growth lose that highest characteristic of life, the divinity of personality.
If the hereditary conditions of the mothers of the race were formed in accordance with nature, so we could start right to educate the children as soon as they come into the world, we would then have a grand beginning for perfect and rounded out lives. But as it is true and radical education of the child must begin with the mother, whose thought and life will shape her offspring. The final solution of the great social, commercial, political, physical and religious problems of the day is dependent upon this change in the education of the race, by conformity to the laws of nature, where the lines of life are so drawn that will adapt to the proper unfoldment and individual form of every person.
If every new life could be begun in proper conditions, nature, by the aid of human intelligence properly directed, would supply that life with all the elements of physical and spiritual growth and development, and our own thought and labor would become our teacher, doctor, minister and redeemer, as we gradually learned to embrace natural means of growth until we come at maturity to restrain the abnormal both within and without, and gain the plan of true education by which man only can know his place in nature, which alone fits him for life beyond.

The new social awakening by the Alliance thought of the necessity of co-operation with the brotherhood of man, and to claim the endowments of life to him who labors, offers the best opportunity of the age for recognizing and disseminating these great natural truths of life, so long the desire of advanced thinkers to see promulgated. And we shall begin a series of primary instructions for the Alliance mothers and teachers of advanced purpose, to apply to the education of not only the early mind of the child, but the hands and body as well, up through childhood plays to adults varied industries, and the rights of such labor to be enjoyed both in the feeding and housing of the body and its health and culture, but the relation of these things of life to the more desirable life and home just beyond, for which this life is at best, a play house.

We must show wisdom in all things essential; not men first and women afterward, but men and women alike.

The result of the vote for President and Vice President, will be published in our next issue, November 5th.

[To the Farmer's Wife.]

DEAR SISTERS:—I doubt your finding a woman that is more interested in the topics published in the FARMER'S WIFE than I am. I have for years given the subject What has brought the American farmers to their present deplorable condition? serious consideration; and while I earnestly desire that they will fully realize what folly it is for them to expect that either of the old parties will relieve them of the grievous burdens that they have imposed upon them by class legislation, and I sincerely hope that they will display a manhood that dare, regardless of former party affiliation, unite their ballots to procure their freedom from the wrongs and oppression that is now reducing the masses of them to the condition of serfs.

I consider that a farmer's wife is not fulfilling her duty to herself, children, home and country who is not striving by every available means that she can employ to assist in the election of the People's party—to redeem her own class from the enslavement to which they are doomed, without there is a change in the administration of our government, and it is needful that that change should come soon. God helps those who try to help themselves, therefore it is absolutely necessary that they should use all their influence to help educate the people so that they can thoroughly understand how important it is that the demands made by that party should be enacted into our laws before we can expect the farmers to be prosperous or attain the condition of equal rights for all and special privileges to none.

The farmers' wives can greatly aid in hastening the time when Congress will no longer grant a favored few of our people the privilege of legally robbing the farmers of such a large amount of the wealth which they annually produce, that many of them do not have enough left to recompense their wives for the arduous labor that they are compelled to perform, thereby making their lives one of continual hardships and deprivation. And there will be no change from their present undesirable condition until they can arouse their husbands so that they can fully comprehend how important it is for them to release themselves from their old party shackles before they can reasonably expect to be able to secure freedom for themselves and families from the condition of being mere slaves, dictated to on all things by those who have procured the power to be our masters; and those masters can only be removed by the united ballots of the farmers.

MRS. ELIZABETH A. RODGERS.

Six Centuries of Work and Wages.

A History of English Labor—By J. E. Thorold Rogers, M. P., late Professor of Political Economy in the University at Oxford.—Abridged.—With Charts and Appendix by the Rev. W. D. P. Bliss.—Introduction by Richard T. Ely, Ph. D., Associate Professor of Political Economy in John Hopkins University.—Price 25 cents.—The Humboldt Publishing Co., Astor Place, New York.

This is the first number of the Social Science Library, which puts at the disposition of the public a record that is invaluable. It is the story of the struggle of the English poor against the avarice of priest and king, landlord and capitalist; a story told by the records of thousands of court rolls, and stewards' accounts, compiled by unconscious historians who little dreamed of the tale the figures they so patiently added up would one day be made to tell. From the beginning of the thirteenth century, when almost everyone not only possessed land but cultivated it; when a landless man was looked on as an outlaw and a stranger; when the use of the common pasture was without stint, and the arable land of the manor was unusually communal from that remote date to modern times, Prof. Rogers conducts the reader through the successive stages of a drama whose motive was the cheapening of labor for the benefit of the monopolist. And surely no time could be more fitting than the present for publication of this work which, with its special charts, clear type, good paper and elegant make up, is destined to have an extensive sale.

Baby's Here! What Next?

Few young mothers have access to the latest information regarding the diet of infants and young children, and it is therefore with pleasure we recommend for the perusal of all who have anything to do with children, the exhaustive article "How and What to Feed the Baby," in the October number of that progressive periodical, Demorest's Family Magazine. This article is by a successful physician, and tells what food to give, how to prepare each kind, just how much and how often the child should be fed, when and how often the diet should be changed, and gives bits of fare for different ages, so that the most inexperienced mother may know just how to feed her baby from its birth until it is able to eat the regular meals of the family. And this is only one of the many attractions of the October number of this comprehensive family magazine, which is bright with charming stories, including one by Ella Wheeler Wilcox: "In the Woman's Ward of an Insane Asylum" tells a pathetic tale; the article on "Sloyd" is instructive and entertaining; and there are other splendid articles, and nearly 200 fine illustrations. It is published by W. Jennings Demorest, 15 East Fourteenth Street, New York. Price 20 cents. Any of our local news-dealers will supply it.

Who suffers most by unjust laws, husband or the mother and children?

Overworked Women.

Just a word to our tired, overworked sisters, on the farm, at the desk, in the office, the schoolroom, the saleslady or whatever your occupation may be that requires your being on your feet, which breaks you down and gradually brings on weakness and all those diseases peculiar to women, undermining your general health, making life a burden instead of a pleasure, and robs woman of all that is beautiful, unifying her for the duties and responsibilities of home, for which she is held accountable, a feeling which causes her to feel depressed and downhearted and think that life is not worth the living, and by not knowing how easily those miserable, unhappy feelings can be removed she cries out in her misery and suffering, "Oh, Death! where is thy sting?" Certainly no sharper one can be than the one felt that is caused by those troubles which we have mentioned. Having suffered for years and not being able to get relief only for a short time I at last have found a remedy that has placed me in the first rank with healthy women, and I have made arrangements with the Viavi company by which I am enabled to place in the hands of all suffering from any of those troubles a remedy that will build and tone you up, drive away that tired, dragging, depressed feeling, and give you back the ambition that you thought had gone forever. Whoever has the good fortune to read these lines, if you are afflicted address Mrs. B. E. with stamp, care of FARMER'S WIFE, and receive full particulars that will explain the merits of Viavi and show you what it has done for so many. Do not put it off too long. Your life is too precious, you are needed in this great work of reform, and without your health and strength and a spirit for work you are a burden on your already overburdened husband. HOME AND THE FARM.

A DEPARTMENT MADE UP FOR OUR RURAL FRIENDS.

They Neglected the Swamps—How Farmers Could Unite for Mutual Benefit—Pure Water of the Right Temperature for Stock—A Convenient Arrangement for the Tired Housewife.

Low Lands.

ONE of the greatest mistakes made by the early settlers in our hilly country was in clearing the high lands and neglecting the swamps. The result has been disastrous in many ways. On many of the rocky summits where there was soil and vegetable matter enough to support a forest, the fire has followed the ax and the vegetable matter has been consumed and the sand either blown or washed away, and were it not for a few of the remains of the large stumps no one would suppose that the spot was ever anything else than a naked ledge. On other hills where there were no rocks the sand is drifting like the snow, and on some farms there are many acres of this shifting sand that a warranty deed will not hold and that is being conveyed without any legal process. On hills where the soil is between these extremes, the process of exhaustion is more gradual, but just as sure. And now that the high lands are exhausted and denuded some farmers are prevented from clearing up their low lands by the fact that they are all they can depend on for woodlots. But the time is coming when the deep, black deposits of vegetable matter which we call muck-bogs, as well as the intermediate strips between them and the dry lands, will be cleared and improved, and other conditions of the farm will be made to conform to the change. These border lands between the high lands and the swamps are in many cases of the least value, because they are harder to subdue. The growth upon them is largely spruce, fir, and cypress and the soil is white or russet sand, with a few inches of black soil above it, and as soon as the trees are cut off swamp moss will cover the ground and seeds will blow in and start a new forest.

An Everlasting Fence.

The best and cheapest fence on my farm I built seventeen years ago, and it is still good. The posts are cedar, set eight feet apart with the end of the timber which naturally stood up placed down. This is the way to make the fence: Let the posts go in the ground thirty inches and project four and one-fourth to five feet above ground. A top rail of two by four scantling is to be mortised into the corners of the posts and nailed fast. White oak pins are turned uniformly one inch in diameter and inserted in holes bored in every other post. They must be previously well seasoned and soaked in boiled oil. The holes must be bored in the posts at the exact point where the wire is to pass it. To get the holes exactly right with the least trouble, it is the best plan to first bore a board for a pattern.

Now lay a wire along the line of posts, coil one end of it around a pin and drive the pin in until its head reaches the wire in the post. Then drive a staple over the end of the wire. Now, with one man to handle and drive the pins and another to stretch the wire by means of a crowbar or wire-stretcher each time a pin is driven, fifty rods of fence may be laid in one day. I use five wires under the scantling. Each time after a pin is driven the wire is slackened to allow it to be twisted about another pin. These pins are only placed on every second post, the wires being stapled to the intervening posts. The cost is as follows: Two cedar posts at 15 cents, 30 cents; five plain wires, No. 12, 15 cents; five oak pins, 5 cents; scantling, 13 cents; labor, 37 cents. Total, $1. The wire rarely or never breaks, as its contraction and expansion are taken care of by these pins.—[George W. Humphrey, Oneida County, New York.]

Simple Bag-Holder.

Take three light poles, cut to the same length, each to be about 6 feet. Bore a hole through each pole 2 1/2 or 3 inches from the end, large enough to receive a one-eighth or one-quarter inch thick carriage bolt. Be sure that the bolt is long enough to pass well through the three poles, leaving plenty of room on the threaded end to receive the nut. Having fastened the poles together by means of the bolt, insert into each pole a screwhook in such a position, and at such a height, as to hold the bag well open and allow the bottom to rest upon the floor or ground, as shown in illustration.—[Practical Farmer.]

Co-Operation of Farmers.

There seems to be quite a tendency among farmers, of late years, to form closer unions for mutual benefit. First, farmers' clubs were organized; then came the Granges; then Farmers' Alliance, etc., all calculated to increase the power and influence of the farming class by union and combination. The principle of co-operation might be greatly extended among farmers with good results. Since so many kinds of farm implements and machinery have come to be substituted for manual labor small farmers labor under a disadvantage unless able to invest quite a large capital in labor-saving machinery. Unable to make the investment the limited use to which each machine can be applied on a small farm of 40, 50 or 80 acres hardly saves enough labor to pay interest and wear of machines.

Now, if a dozen farmers owning together 600, 800 or 1,000 acres of land could unite and purchase all necessary farm machinery it would greatly reduce the cost to each individual, while serving their purposes nearly as well as if everyone owned all the machines. Of course, they would need to eliminate something of human selfishness, and allow the one who most needed the use of the machines to have the first use. If only a broad, liberal, manly, Christian spirit were always cherished small farmers could, in many ways, co-operate to mutual advantage.

LIVE STOCK.

Water for Farm Animals.

The water supply is a matter of prime importance to the stockman. Without an abundance of pure water of an agreeable temperature, farm animals cannot remain healthy, or make a highly profitable gain of flesh, or yield of milk or of wool. J. M. Stohl in the Practical Farmer, tells how to arrange a well and windmill so that the animals at all times may have fresh water of an agreeable temperature. The diagram shows how this highly desirable result is accomplished; a is the tank, which should hold eight to ten barrels; c is the well. The curb, the lower part of the tower supporting the wind-wheel, and the pump, can be at once distinguished; b is what is known as the reefing bucket—a bucket of two or three gallons capacity, having a small hole in the bottom. It is suspended to the rod that passes through the curb, and throws the mill in or out of gear. When the tank is nearly full, water flows from it into the reefing bucket, through the pipe shown in the cut leading from near the top of the tank to the reefing bucket. When the reefing bucket is filled, its weight pulls the mill out of gear, and of course, stops the pumping. A small pipe leads from the bottom of the tank into the well, as shown in the cut. It is of such capacity that it will just about empty the tank until the water has drained out of the reefing bucket through the small hole in its bottom. As the reefing bucket becomes nearly empty, its weight is not sufficient to keep the mill out of gear, and the pumping again begins, and is kept up until the tank is filled. The water again flows from the tank to the reefing bucket, and the pump is stopped as before. Of course, the flow of water from the tank to the reefing bucket stops as soon as the water sinks a little in the tank. If animals come to drink, there is no flow in the reefing bucket, and of course the pump keeps at work until the animals have drunk what they want, and the tank is filled. That the drawing may be plain, all this apparatus is represented as above ground. In fact, the tank is usually banked around with earth, and the pipes are below the surface. By this arrangement, the animals have cool water in summer, and water of a considerably higher temperature than the freezing point in winter. Stopcocks make it easy to stop the working of this apparatus whenever its stoppage is desirable.

THE DAIRY.

Stopping the Churn.

It is very important to stop churning at the right time. Churning after the butter has come will injure the butter. These round grains are solid butter; there is no milk in them, the milk is around these grains. At this stage the milk is easily washed from the butter. Never put your hands in the butter. Draw the buttermilk off, put enough cold water in the churn to float the butter, revolve the churn a few times, or agitate it by shaking or rocking it gently; draw off the water and repeat the washing with pure cold water three times, and the milk will all be washed out. Put one-half ounce of dairy salt to the pound, work the salt in only enough to get the water out; the less butter is worked the better. It is impossible to work all the milk out of butter, but it is no trouble to wash it out. Water and butter will not mix; the water is easily worked out. Unnecessary working mashes the grain and ruins the butter. Continuous working, mixing and sneering changes it from butter to grease, causes it to lose its flavor, and ruins its keeping qualities, and very soon it will assume a cheesy smell and taste, and later on it will have a very pronounced and repellant odor.—[Dairy World.]

Dairy Notes.

Some dairymen claim that oat straw makes butter bitter.

It is said that hay, beets, and carrots give a good flavor to butter.

Take care that no impure air reaches the milk, for it is very easily tainted.

After milk is set it should be lowered to 50 or 55 degrees as quickly as possible.

Within the last five years the export of oleomargarine has doubled and now amounts to 2,500,000 tubs annually.

In Cheboygan County, Wisconsin, two of the cheese factories have each employed a young lady to take charge of their affairs.

In washing the butter keep a close watch on it and stop when it is washed enough. There is just as much danger of washing too much as there is of not washing enough.

DAIRY and Food Commissioner Harkness, of Wisconsin, is making war on the dealers of milk in Milwaukee that have been defrauding their customers with skimmed or watered milk. The Commissioner has the good wishes of every honest man.

A CONTROVERSY is agitating the cheese making world, the bone of contention being whether it is advisable to allow a part of the cream to be taken from the milk when the percentage of butter-fat is so great that the rennet cannot "grasp" all of it. It might do to partially skim the milk in certain cases, were it not for the fact that ordinary human nature is not to be trusted.

Time dairymen should be to some extent a veterinarian, at least enough to be able to tell when his cow is sick and what is the matter with her. Many times milk is sold from a sick cow for days before he is aware that anything is the matter with her. Thus the germs of tuberculosis and other deadly diseases become scattered through the community, and there is no knowing how much sickness and death have been caused by this ignorance.—[Farmers' Review.]

THE POULTRY YARD.

Poultry and the Farm Boys.

We will venture to assert that if each boy is given a flock of fowls, if only Bantams, and he alone have the management of them, and the receipts—a very important adjunct—the flock of fowls will cause the boy to take an interest in farming from the start. Let him become accustomed to the breed and he will soon learn the points of all breeds. And he will not stop there. He will aim to know the breeds of cattle, sheep, horses, and hogs. He will look forward to the exhibitions at the county fairs, and strive to win prizes. He will have a love for the farm bred in him from the start, and when he is a man he will yearn for the happy days spent on the farm, and he will go back to it if he can, should he be induced away. When one becomes interested in poultry on the farm he becomes educated to an interest in everything else. As soon as your boy can manage them, give him a few Bantams, and after he is older start him with some pure breed of standard size. It is the best plan for teaching the boy to remain on the farm.—[Mirror.]

Clean Eggs.

One of the finest things for a poultryman to learn, says the Toronto Blade, is the fact that soiled and dirty eggs should never be sent to market. Many of the eggs that come in are filthy—the shells frequently stained with mud or manure. Fastidious people—the only ones who are willing to pay a "fancy" price—will never buy such eggs if they can help it. Clean the eggs before they come to market. It will pay you well to do so.

Poultry Notes.

WHEN you get ready to fatten the fowls do the work quickly.

TANNED paper is recommended for a lining to poultry houses.

REMEMBER that sulphur is a powerful fungicide and insecticide. Therefore use it freely around and in the nests, and in any other place where you think it will do good.

Do NOT expect any breed to lay equally well in summer and in winter. If you insist on a good supply of eggs from November till February, then select a breed noted for the ability to lay in the winter. Do not expect everything of one breed.

THE raising of ducks is only in its infancy in this country. The time will perhaps come when that fowl will be raised as extensively as in China. One of the best reasons for extending the breeding of ducks is the fact that they are less liable to disease than any other breed of fowl.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Help for the Tired.

With such a simple arrangement as is here shown in the kitchen, the tired wife may have all the water she wants at a moment's notice, without the necessity of going out in the cold, or any over-exertion by carrying it. A zinc-lined box is mounted on heavy brackets at the top of the kitchen, or still better, on the floor of the attic. The heavy pipe shown leads from a spring or well into it, or it may be made very large in the attic and supplied from the cistern. If the well be depended upon a force pump will be needed. When water has risen in the box to a certain level it flows out of the surplus pipe shown. The pipe running to the sink comes out of the bottom of the box and can drain off all the water it holds, when it will at once fill again.

On a large scale, supplying the whole house, the plan is an excellent, but costly one. To fix for the kitchen alone is simple and attended with little expense. A five-gallon can in which castor oil came can be bought at a drug store for 10 cents. The housewife will gladly wash it clean. Then a little work, a few feet of galvanized pipe and joints and a borrowed pipe wrench will complete a job which may save a doctor's or an undertaker's bill and the most precious member of any American home.—[Hollister Sage, in Rural New Yorker.]

LITTLE BOYS AND GIRLS.

THIS IS THEIR DEPARTMENT OF THE PAPER.

Quaint Sayings and Doings of Little Ones Gathered and Printed Here for Other Little Folks to Read.

The Girls of Ninety-one.

They tell me 'twas the fashion,
Oh! long and long ago,
For girls to look like lilies white,
And sit at home and sew.
Forth strode their sturdy brothers
On many a gallant quest;
But the maids behind the lattice
Their weary souls possessed.
To-day the times have altered,
And pretty Kate and Nell
Are playing merry tennis—
In sooth, they do it well.
They ride across the country,
They climb the mountain-side,
And with oars that feather lightly,
Along the rivers glide.

If they've not yet been to college,
They are going by-and-by,
To shake the tree of knowledge,
Though its branches touch the sky.
For all their Greek and Latin,
And poring over books,
With faces smooth as satin,
They'll keep their dainty looks.

Do you want a happy comrade,
In study or in fun?
Be sure you'll find her quickly
'Mid the girls of Ninety-one.
She'll keep that bright and steady,
Unharm'd in any whirl,
And not a lad will love her less Because she's a girl.

A Sure Way to Kill Them.

The guides who make their living by piloting parties through the unknown regions of the Maine woods are a jolly, good-natured set of men with a knack for story telling that the following anecdote illustrates:

"Frost Bunker, of the Dead River region, is a guide who, it is said, is a successful rival to James A. Smith, of Phillips—a Rangely guide—in story telling. Frost is intimately acquainted with 'John Smith,' who is well known in all parts of the country. He says he was with John on a hunting trip once on a time, when they came upon a man who had fired at an owl perched in a big tree about a dozen times without success. As they approached the stranger offered John a $5 bill if he would secure the owl. John cocked his rifle and walked around the tree. The owl turned his head in the same direction as far as John walked. John kept on going around the tree, the owl turning his head all the while. Just as John completed the tenth circuit the owl's head was twisted off and he fell to the ground dead. John said small owls couldn't be killed that way because their feet would fly up in turning."

Old Jack.

My father was a farmer, and lived about three miles from the city of L., New York, says a writer in the Rural Home. He had a bright sorrel horse named Jack we raised from a colt. He was a very handsome horse and had a great deal of spirit, but never had any bad tricks. His right hind foot was white, and he had a white star in his forehead. His eyes were prominent and always kind, while his whole expression indicated unusual intelligence. Jack was an animal that would attract attention anywhere.

A few days after having been shod one time, he began to limp, and not being able to discover any cause he was turned loose in the barn-yard where it would be softer for his feet. Suddenly he was missed. The gate, which had been fastened on each side by a wooden peg, was open, the inside peg lying on the ground. I could see Jack's footsteps leading toward the city. Harnessing another horse I was soon following, but was, as I learned, over two hours behind him. On reaching the city I drove through the main street and at the further end there beheld Jack, standing in front of our family grocery store, with his head up to the post, quietly kicking flies and wearing a very dejected air. As I came up he greeted the horse I drove, it being his mate, and quietly submitted to the halter that I imposed.

The groceryman came out and said he knew the horse, and that he had been standing there for some time. It occurred to me to take him to the blacksmith, whose shop is not far away, and see if he could discover the cause of his lameness. As I drove up the blacksmith met me at the door and said that about two hours before Jack crowded his way into the shop where he was attending to other horses. That he drove him out three times, but he kept coming in again. He finally procured a whip that he had used, and then Jack went off down the street, limping considerably as he trotted off.

I said that was why I bought him—relating the circumstances, and asked him to pull off the shoe he had put on a few days before. He did so, and from one of the nail-holes came a large quantity of pus.

He had driven one of the nails crookedly, and it had gone into the tender part of the hoof, hence the trouble. I told the blacksmith if Jack ever came there again to treat him more considerately, and I never took another horse to that shop again.

Poor old Jack! After my father died and the farm was sold, he was sold, too, and the family went to the city to live.

I did not hear from Jack for several years, until one of the neighbors one day said they saw him hitched with another horse towing a boat on the Erie Canal. I knew then he must be near his end, for this is about the hardest work a horse can do, and they are soon used up. All along the canal can be seen horses the boatman have turned out to die.

The canal was only about half a mile from my father's farm, a cross-road leading direct, and Jack had often been there after the sand and gravel that is obtained from a large pit on the bank.

The next I heard about Jack was from the man who purchased the old farm. He said that on going out to the barn one cold, rainy morning late in the autumn he was surprised to find a horse lying down at the barn-yard gate, which opens from the road and is kept securely locked. At first he thought it was one of his own, but a closer examination soon satisfied him on this point. It was a very old sorrel horse, terribly poor, and had evidently been subjected to hard usage. He touched the animal with his foot, but it did not move—it was dead. The neighbors, he said, told him what horse it was.

Poor old Jack had come home to die!

THE NEW COMMANDER.

Captain John Palmer, of the G. A. R., and His Creditable War Record.

The newly elected Commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, Captain John Palmer, of Albany, N. Y., was born on Staten Island, March 22, 1842. His war record is an excellent one. On Sept. 10, 1861, he enlisted in the Ninety-first New York Volunteers, and was constantly with that regiment until it was mustered out July 3, 1865, taking part in all its engagements. He was seriously injured at the battle of Five Forks in the combined charge of cavalry and infantry. By force of his soldierly qualities he attained successively the grades of Corporal, Sergeant, Sergeant-Major, Second Lieutenant, First Lieutenant, Adjutant, and Captain. Since the war he has been engaged in the fresco painting and decorating business at Albany. He is one of the best-known and most popular members of the order of his State, is a charter member of Lew Benedict Post, No. 5, Department of New York, and was for several terms Commander of this post, which, with headquarters at Albany, is one of the largest and most influential posts in the country. He was twice elected Commander of the Department of New York, and in 1879 was chosen Senior Vice Commander-in-chief, acquitting himself with credit in all these important positions. Being thus placed in the direct line of promotion to the highest office in the Grand Army, his election was assured the moment the delegates from New York determined to unite upon him as their choice. He is a forcible speaker, a good presiding officer at department and national conventions, and has frequently been placed at the head of important committees by both State and national encampments.

JOHN PALMER, COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF, G. A. R.

Washing Away the Earth.

A French geologist has made a careful calculation of the amount of solid matter yearly carried off into the ocean by the action of the rivers of the world and other causes. He estimates that the reduction of the average height of the surface of the solid land is 0.006 inches each year. Making allowance for the corresponding rise in the bed of the ocean, and taking no account of the occurrence of volcanic and other exceptional phenomena—the general tendency of which is to hasten the process of disintegration—the period at which the solid land will have ceased to exist and the surface of the earth will be covered with water has been estimated. As, however, that period is 4,500,000 years distant, the prediction need cause no immediate disquietude.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

A PARLOR match led to the discovery of a house-breaker in Kalamazoo, Mich. After entering a house, he imprudently endeavored to light his way by igniting a match that made a snapping report like a toy torpedo. The noise awoke a sleeper, and he captured the house-breaker.

MY DREAMS, AND A BOTTLE OF INK.

THE shutter-books rattle and click Outside in the windy rain,
And under the shadowy eaves,
The coals in the chimney-place blink,
And I sit by the table and think Building fanciful castles in Spain;
Give me these and I shall not complain,
My dreams and a bottle of ink.

Cold water will serve me for a drink,
I ask not the sparkling champagne,
That breezes no refuge may gain,
Old hats shall stuff up my cloak;
And be sure that I never will shrink,
Or whatever my sorrow or pain,
Just as long as I still can retain
My dreams and a bottle of ink.

If skies wear a roseate pink,
Or snow covers meadow and lane,
If summers or winters shall wane
Like shadows that waver and sink,
Baffled time to his wheel may sink,
I am free from his sinister chain,
I have youth while these blessings remain,
My dreams, and a bottle of ink.

Fair children who sit from my brain,
The past and the present you link,
Dear Muse, let them not be in vain,
My dreams and a bottle of ink.

DON BASILIO'S STORY.

"Don Basilio, play the cornet and let us dance! It is not warm under the trees."

"Yes, yes, Don Basilio, play the cornet!"

"Give Don Basilio the cornet on which Joaquin learned."

"No use! Will you play it Don Basilio?"

"No!"

"Why not?"

"No, I say!"

"But why not?"

"Because I do not know how."

"Not know how! Was there ever such hypocrisis?"

"Of course you desire to gratify us?"

"Well, come! We know that you were chief musician of the infantry!"

"And that no one played the cornet as you did."

"And that they listened to you at the palace in the time of Espartero—"

"And that you have a pension."

"Come, Don Basilio. Have pity on us!"

"Well, then, señor, it is true. I have played the cornet; I was a—specialist, as you say nowadays; however, it is also true that two years ago I presented my cornet to a poor licensed musician, and that since then I have not wished even to sound it."

"What a pity!"

"Another loss!"

"Ah, since it is this evening you ought to play!"

"Here in the fields everything is permissible—"

"Remember that it is my birthday, grandpapa!"

"Hurrah! hurrah! Here is the cornet!"

"Yes; now play!"

"A wait!"

"No, a polka!"

"Polka! Away with you! A fandango!"

"Yes, yes, a fandango—the national dance!"

"I am very sorry, my children, but I cannot possibly play the cornet."

"You, so amiable!"

"So willing to please—"

"Your little grandchild begs you to!"

"And your niece—"

"Leave me alone, for God's sake. I have said that I can not play."

"Why not?"

"Because I do not remember, and because, moreover, I have sworn not to learn again—"

"To whom have you sworn?"

"To myself and to some one who is dead—to your poor mother, my child!"

Every face saddened suddenly on hearing these words.

"Ah! if you knew at what cost I learned to play the cornet!" added the old man.

"The story! the story!" exclaimed the young people. "Tell us the story."

"In fact," said Don Basilio, "it is quite a story. Listen to it, and you may judge if I can or cannot play the cornet." And seating himself under a tree, surrounded by the curious and courteous young people, he told the story of his music lessons.

In the same way Mazepa, Byron's hero, related one night to Carlos XII., beneath another tree, the terrible story of his riding lessons. Let us listen to Don Basilio:

Seventeen years ago Spain was agitated by the civil war. Carlos and Isabel were disputing for the crown, and the Spaniards, divided into two bands, poured out their blood in the fratricidal struggle.

I had a friend called Ramon Gomez, lieutenant of my battalion, the most clever man that I have ever known. We were educated together; together we left college; together we had been reprimanded a thousand times, and together we desired to die for liberty. Ah! I must say he was more liberal than I or than any one else in the whole army!

But a certain injustice had been done by our chief to the hurt of Ramon, one of those abuses of authority which disgust one with the most honorable profession. This arbitrary act made the lieutenant of the Caradores desire to abandon the ranks of his brothers, the friend, the liberal to turn to the faction, the subordinate to kill his lieutenant colonel! Ramon was not in the mood so early in the morning to bear insults and injustice.

Neither my threats nor prayers were sufficient to dissuade him from his purpose. He had decided to change his helmet for the cap, although he abhorred the rebels.

We were then within three leagues of the enemy. It was the night in which Ramon went to desert—a cold, rainy night, melancholy and sad, the eve of a battle.

About 2 o'clock Ramon entered my lodging.

I was asleep.

"Basilio," he murmured in my ear.

"Who is it?"

"It is I, Adieu!"

"Thou art going now?"

"Yes; adieu."

And seizing my hand—"Listen," he continued, "if there should be a battle to-morrow, as they think, and we should meet in it—"

"I understand; we are friends."

"Very well; we will embrace and then fight. I will die in the regular way to-morrow; however, I hope to trample all under foot until I have killed the lieutenant colonel! As for thee, Basilio, do not expose thyself to danger—glory is only smoke."

"And life?"

"Thou art right. Make thyself commander," exclaimed Ramon. "The pay is not smoke until after one has smoked it."

"Ah! all that is ended for me!"

"What sad thoughts!" I said, not without terror. "We shall both survive the battle to-morrow."

"Then let us arrange to meet afterwards."

"Where?"

"At the San Nicolas inn, at 1 in the morning. Death alone shall prevent the meeting. Let us agree to it."

"Agreed."

"Then, adieu!"

"Adieu!"

Having said this, and after tenderly embracing me, Ramon disappeared into the shadows of the night.

As we hoped, the rebels attacked us on the following day.

The action was very bloody and lasted from 3 in the afternoon till it grew dark. About 5 my battalion was fiercely attacked by a force commanded by Ramon. Ramon now wore the badge of commodore and the white cap of the Carlists.

I gave the order to fire against Ramon, and Ramon against me; that is to say, his men and my battalion fought hand to hand.

We were victorious, and Ramon was put to flight with the small remnant of his force, but not without first having himself killed with a pistol-shot him who the evening before was his Lieutenant Colonel, and who in vain tried to defend himself from the fury of Ramon. At 6 o'clock the action took an unfavorable turn, and I and a part of my poor company were cut off and obliged to surrender.

They led me up to the little village of —, which had been occupied by the Carlists since the beginning of this campaign, and where it was certain they would shoot me immediately. The war was then without quarter.

It was 1 o'clock in the morning after that melancholy day—the hour of my rendezvous with Ramon!

I was confined in the dungeon of the public prison of the enemy. I asked for my friend and they answered me: "He is a brave man! He killed a Lieutenant Colonel, but he perished during the last hour of the battle."

"How? Why do you think so?"

"Because he has not returned to the camp, nor can the men who to-day were under his command give any account of him."

Ah! how I suffered that night! One hope I still had. Ramon might be waiting for me at the St. Nicolas inn; this would explain his failure to return to the rebel encampment. How distressed he would be to find that I did not keep the appointment!

"He will," I said to myself, "think me dead! And, truly, how far am I from my last hour? The rebels always shoot their prisoners the same as we do!"

Thus dawned the following day.

A chaplain entered my prison. All my companions were asleep. "Death!" I exclaimed, at sight of the priest.

"Yes," he answered gently.

"Now?"

"No; within three hours."

A minute later my companions were awake.

A thousand cries, a thousand sobs, a thousand curses filled the prison.

Every man who is about to die is possessed of some idea which will not leave him.

Whether it were nightmare, fever, or madness, the thought of Ramon—of Ramon alive, of Ramon dead, of Ramon in Heaven, of Ramon in the inn—took possession of my brain in such a way that I could think of nothing else during those hours of agony. They took from me my captain's uniform and dressed me in a soldier's cap and an old cloak.

Thus I went to meet death with my nineteen companions in misfortune.

Only one was to be saved from death. He was a musician, and the Carlists did not shoot musicians, because they were in great need of them in their battalions.

"And were you a musician, Don Basilio? Were you saved on that account?" asked all the children with one voice.

"No, my children," replied the veteran, "I was not a musician."

The square was formed, and we were placed in the middle of it.

I was No. 11—that is, I would be the eleventh to die.

Then I thought of my wife and my daughter—of thee and thy mother, my child. They began to fire.

Those denotations maddened me. As they had bound our eyes I did not see my companions fall.

I tried to count the discharges that I might know a moment before dying that my sojourn in this world was finished. However, at the third or fourth detonation I lost count.

Ah! those shots will thunder eternally in my heart and in my brain as they thundered on that day.

Now I heard them a thousand leagues distant; now I felt them reverberate in my head. And the detonations continued.

"Now!" thought I.

The discharge sounded and I still lived.

"This one!" I said at last.

Then I felt myself seized by the shoulders and shaken, and voices sounded in my ears. I fell.

I knew no more.

Then I experienced something like a profound sleep. I dreamed that I had been shot dead.

I dreamed that I was stretched on a small bed in my prison. I could not see.

I raised my hand to my eyes to take away the bandage and touched my wide open, dilated eyes? Was I blind?

No, I was in prison, in utter darkness.

I heard the toll of a bell and trembled.

It was the ringing of the "animas."

"It is 9 o'clock," I thought, "but what day?"

A shadow, still darker than the dark air of the prison, leaned over me.

It appeared to be a man. And the others—the other eighteen?

All had been shot!

And I?

Did I live or was I delirious in the grave? My lips mechanically murmured a name; always his name, my nightmare—Ramon!

"What is it?" the shadow beside me answered.

"My God!" I exclaimed. "Am I in the other world?"

"No!" answered the same voice.

"Ramon, art thou alive?"

"Yes."

"And I?"

"Thou also."

"Then where am I? Is this the San Nicolas inn? Was I not taken prisoner? Have I dreamed it all?"

"No, Basilio; thou hast dreamed nothing. Listen."

"As thou knowest, yesterday I killed the Lieutenant-Colonel in fair fight. I am avenged! Then, mad with fury, I kept on fighting and killing till it grew dark—till there was not a Christian on the battlefield. When the moon arose I remembered thee. Then I directed my steps toward the San Nicolas inn with the intention of waiting for thee."

"It was 10 o'clock. The appointment was for 1 and the night before I had not closed my eyes. So I slept profoundly. About 1 I gave a cry and awoke. I dreamed that thou wast dead. I looked about me and found I was alone. What had become of thee? It struck 2, 3, 4—what a night of anguish!"

"Thou didst not appear."

"Without doubt thou wast dead!"

"Day dawned."

"Then I left the inn and directed my steps to this village in search of the rebels. The sun rose."

"Every one thought I had fallen the day before."

"Thus at the sight of me they embraced me and the General loaded me with honors."

"Then I learned that they were about to shoot twenty-one prisoners. A presentiment arose in my mind."

"Could Basilio be one of them? I asked myself. I ran to the place of execution. The square was formed."

"I heard several shots."

"They had begun to shoot the prisoners."

"I strained my eyes, but I could not see."

"Grief blinded me. I was delirious with fear."

"Finally I distinguished thee."

"Thou wast about to be shot!"

"There were two victims only before thee."

"What should I do?"

"I became crazy; I screamed; seized thee in my arms, and, with a hoarse voice trembling with emotion, exclaimed:—"

"Not this one! Not this one, my General!"

"The General who commanded the square, and who knew me for my deeds the day before, asked me:—"

"Why not? Is he a musician?"

"That word was to me what it would be to an old man blind from birth to see suddenly the sun in all its brightness."

"The light of hope shone so vividly in my eyes that it blinded me."

"Musician!" I exclaimed; "yes—yes, General! He is a musician—a great musician!"

"In the meantime thou wast stretched senseless."

"What instrument does he play?" asked the General.

"The—the—the—yes!—exactly!—it is—the cornet!"

"Do you need a cornet player?" asked the General, turning to the band of musicians.

"In five seconds, which seemed five centuries, came the answer:—"

"Yes, General, there is one needed," replied the chief musician.

"Then take that man from the ranks, and let the execution continue instantly," exclaimed the Carlisle chief.

"Then I took thee in my arms and carried thee to this dungeon."

As Ramon ceased speaking I got up, and, weeping, laughing, and trembling, I embraced him.

"I owe thee my life!"

"Not at all!" replied Ramon.

"And why not?" I exclaimed.

"Dost thou play the cornet?"

"No."

"Then thou dost not owe me thy life. I have only compromised mine by saving thee."

I turned cold as stone.

"And music?" asked Ramon. "Dost thou know it?"

"A little, very little. I remember what they taught us at college—"

"A very little it is, or better say none! Thou shalt die without fail, and I also as traitor. Just imagine, in less than two weeks the band to which thou shalt belong will be organized."

"Two weeks?"

"Neither more nor less! And as thou dost not play the cornet (unless God performs a miracle) they will shoot us both without a doubt."

"Shoot thee!" I exclaimed: "thee! and for me! for me, who owes thee my life! Ah! no, Heaven forbid! In less than two weeks I shall understand music and play the cornet."

Ramon laughed.

What more shall I tell you, my children? In two weeks—oh, power of the will—in fifteen days, with the fifteen nights (for I neither slept nor rested a minute for half a month,) in two weeks I learned to play the cornet! What days they were!

Ramon and I left camp and passed hours and hours with a certain musician who came daily from a place near by to give me a lesson. Escape? I read the word in your eyes. Nothing more impossible! I was a prisoner and they watched me, and Ramon would not escape without me.

I neither spoke, thought, nor ate.

I was crazy, and my monomania was music—the cornet, the devilish cornet! I desired to learn and I learned!

And if I had been dumb I should have talked.

And if paralyzed should have walked—if blind should have seen.

Because I willed it so.

Oh, the will can do anything!

To wish—that is a great word!

To wish—and I advise you, children, learn this great truth!

I saved, then, my life and Ramon's. But I was mad, and my madness was art. During three years the cornet did not leave my hand. Do-ra-mi-fa-sol-la-si—that was my word during all that time. My life was reduced to blowing. Ramon did not leave me. I emigrated to France and in France I continued to play the cornet.

The cornet was I! I sang with the cornet at my mouth. Men, people, celebrated artists crowded to hear me.

Here was a wonder, a marvel. The cornet was flexible in my fingers; became elastic, moaned, wept, cried, and roared; it imitated a prayer, a human sob, or a wild beast.

My lungs were of iron. Thus passed two more years. At the end of them my friend died. Looking upon his body I recovered my reason. And when, now in my senses, I took up my cornet one day, to my astonishment I found that I did not know how to play it.

Will you ask me now to play it for you to dance?—Translated from Romance by E. J. Taguand from the Spanish of Don Pedro A. de Alarcon.

A Penitential Cell.

There are odd items in many of our old churches of which we are quite unaware; and there are many others which, though seen, we pass by with scarcely a glance at them for want of understanding their meaning or use.

The penitential cell in the Temple Church is one such. High up in the thickness of the north wall, looking down, through two narrow openings, upon the magnificent rotunda, with its mystic circle of porphyry columns and effigies of cross-legged knights lying full length on the glistening pavement, and into the long chancel, is a small stone cell, too short for a man to lie down in at full length, and too low for him to stand upright in, in which recusants were confined for penance.

A narrow stone stair winds up till it arrives at the small strong low door of access to it, and passes on to the triforium around the rotunda, now lined with monuments to the memory of legal worthies formerly on the walls of the church below. Word has been handed down to us that a knight, Walter le Bachelor by name, was led up this stair, thrust into this cell, and, with irons on his limbs, left to die in it of starvation; when his body was dragged down the winding stair, and buried in the grounds outside. Perhaps it is this tradition that gives the story cell an enchainment and pathetic interest that brings it back again to the minds of those who have looked into it, long after the busy traffic of the Strand, close by, has effaced the memory of the showy Elizabethan splendours of the Templars Hall and Parliament Room, with their carved oak and painted glass.—Gentleman's Magazine.

In a Quicksand.

Says a locomotive engineer: "I once had an interesting experience with a quicksand. My engine ran off a low bridge near River Bend, about 100 miles east of Denver, and fell into a small creek filled with quicksands. A wrecking train came up in a few hours, but the engine had entirely disappeared. The railroad officials ordered it to be raised, but it could not be found. We sounded with rods to a depth of over sixty feet, but not a trace did we discover of the engine, which had vanished as completely as if it had never existed."

"Four years afterward it was found at a depth of over 100 feet and was raised. We then ascertained that there was scarcely a bit of rust on it, the breaks were few, and, after a little tinkering, it was put upon the road again. The sand had kept out the air and prevented the iron from oxidizing.—New York Tribune.

"You couldn't get steaks as rare as you liked them at your late boarding house, eh?" said the old boarder to the new. "Well, it'll be rare enough you'll get them here, let me tell you!"

THE DIVORCE EVIL.

Its Real Root Not in Bad Laws, but Secret Administration of Good Ones.

Judge Aikens, of South Dakota, properly displeased at the belated eminence of his State is attaining as a fashionable divorce mill, has made the announcement that parties to actions dissolving the matrimonial bond must hereafter fulfill the requirements of the spirit of the law as to residence, in order to obtain the relief sought.

This is a creditable dictum. The Judge does not intend to play the part of Leporello—the valuable confidential valet—to the Don Giovanni, male or female, of other States—a role which unfortunately, the judiciary of Rhode Island, in charging its conscience with the protection of New York society scandals and the assistance of immoral and illegal second marriages, has with astounding complacency adopted.

Yet Judge Aikens' elder brethren of the bench may ask him—not in mockery, though smiles may play around their severe visages as they put the question to him—how he proposes to ascertain that the parties have fulfilled those requirements. If John Aikens has the courage to follow his promise—the necessity of an uncorrupted divorce procedure—to its logical conclusion, he will answer in one sentence, By trying their cases in open court.

The divorce procedure of to-day—as every lawyer, every client, every Judge, especially every master or referee, as he may be called in different States, knows—is a sham, a mockery, and a fraud.

HARVEST TIME.

BY AUNT LOUISA.

Out in the gathering twilight,
Hesitating lest it should rain,
Each one doing his "level best"
Trying to save the grain.

The sun, like a golden chariot,
Hangs low in the darkening west,
And the lark from the edge of the oat field,
Call her little ones home to rest.

In the east, a cloud of purple—
Like a banner of velvet unfurled,
From which the many-hued bow of promise,
Smiles down on our beautiful world.

And I think of another harvest,
Of golden ripened grain,
Where each tried and faithful worker,
Uses both hands and brain.

While the chariot of time swings westward,
And a cloud hangs dark above;
But over it all, and around it all,
Is the bow of our Father's love.

And the right is sure to conquer,
And the wrong is sure to fall;
If only each trusted "work hard,"
Will answer the Master's call.

FOR FARMER'S WIFE.

A REVIEW

Of the Great Speech of Senator Frank Smith, in the Michigan Senate, 1891, Against the Equal Suffrage Bill, by Dr. Mary E. Green.

Verily the name of Smith is doomed to descend to posterity, not alone in North America, but in Michigan also. Not John Smith, whose life was saved by the dusky maiden, but Frank Smith of the State Senate, 1891, who, forgetting how his ancestor was saved by a woman, shows his ingratitude by his masterly eloquence against woman, and wishes to deprive her of the rights which he enjoys.

This prize oration of the 19th century, made by the honored member from the First Congressional district, was to defeat the bill which asks that women who are citizens women who are people, women who are tax-payers, women who rear children, who teach them, women who are filling every profession as intelligently and successfully as men, may have a voice in the making of laws whereby they and their property are controlled.

And because women, yea, and many men, ask for this just representation does this Senator Smith open his floodgates of oratory in the Michigan Senate.

He says: "I do not know a dozen women outside the few lobbyists that have been here who want this thing."

Evidently, then, Mr. Smith assumes he is placed in the position he now occupies, not to vote upon those bills which are right and just, or which the people demand, but it is whether he personally knows the people who want laws enacted.

Now if any grave doubts had possessed the senator regarding the passage of this or any other bill, he should have consulted the numerous petitions that usually accompany bills, or the inherent right in every human being to demand equal right in property, in representation, as well as in punishment of penal offenses. The representation of the people by honesty and intelligence, and not by the knowledge a senator may have as to the wants of a few friends.

Mr. Smith says: "My wife and other women in her neighborhood are opposed to it."

But Mr. Smith fails to tell us whether his wife is gifted with that high order of intelligence which he possesses, to comprehend this question, or whether he assumes to do her thinking for her, just as he does the legislating for her, and he fails to tell us about the neighborhood in which he lives. However, his statement is a sad commentary upon the senator's wife and the other women in the neighborhood, if they have not thought about the question as to why a woman should not be taxed to support a government in which she has no controlling voice.

In this matter, Mr. Smith, you virtually say to your wife and the women in the neighborhood, you are idiots and lunatics, but if you commit an offense against the law then you are equal to men.

Again he says: "I think it a great deal better for a woman to stay at home than go to the polls and vote. If she is given the privilege, she will encounter all classes of people, and be pleasant to them, in order to gain their vote. Now I wouldn't like my wife to encounter some 'bum' at the polls, and be pleasant to him in order to gain his good will, or the ballot."

Shades of Demosthenes! What oratory, what eloquence, what argument, to prove woman's unfitness to cast a vote!

What element was it, pray, that could have sent such a man to represent the people?

Mr. Smith is an ex-alderman of Detroit, the first city in Michigan, which undoubtedly accounts for his knowledge of the "bum," and how easily his vote may be controlled, and for his total ignorance regarding a higher, purer atmosphere in politics, which always controls people who demand fitness for office.

"I admit," he says, "there are a great many offices within the gift of the State, but there wouldn't be enough to go around if we take the women in."

Ah! Mr. Smith, you have let out the secret. To be fed is far easier than to feed one's self; there are scores and scores of just such political parasites that infest every community, and you fear that if women are admitted to vote, they will ask to sit on the soft cushions beside you, and be fed with the same food from the government, which she helps to support, that nourishes you; and you are so anxious to protect your sex.

"It is not right," again he says, "to take woman out of her kitchen, not that all women properly belong to the kitchen, for there are plenty of women who belong to the kitchen and parlor also. My wife attends to the parlor, and my children show what they have learned by playing the piano."

Now note how anxious Mr. Smith is to define a woman's right, when it shall cater to his appetite—"not right to take her out of the kitchen."

Relic of barbarism, still does it cling to Michigan.

It was related to me recently by a gentleman who had been up among the Piegan Indians, on the northern line of Montana, how the squaws would be sent out to hunt, and when the game was brought in, the Indians would appropriate it entirely to themselves, and not let the squaws have a taste.

We have advanced a little, Mr. Smith, and there are not many men who do not agree with you that women must not be taken from the kitchen.

There are many men who are willing that women may do something besides cook his food, cater to his pleasure, and teach the children the piano.

But please tell us, Mr. Smith, what women may do who have no kitchen, no parlor, and no children to teach?

"The passage of the bill would be detrimental," he says.

To what? Mr. Smith's cooking, Mr. Smith's parlor, or Mr. Smith's children having the piano, or to Mr. Smith's being elected by the "bum element"? Would it be so detrimental that the "bum" would be no longer controlled by money, or by liquor, but as Mr. Smith says by the "pleasant ways," which he fears would induce people to vote for a higher standard, morally and mentally, in those persons who enter the political arena?

Then Mr. Smith says again: "If women vote will they not be eligible to enlistment in the cavalry or infantry?"

Mr. Smith, the women have been enlisted since the world began, in infantry, in the rearing of it to protect homes and give liberty to all, freedom to all, a government to all, a government which should be "of the people, for the people, and by the people." And we thank God that many of that infantry are demanding that women who have done so much, who have fought so many battles to develop man to his fullest capabilities, shall have equal rights and privileges with themselves.

Among the infantry thus marshalled into line by women are such men as Abraham Lincoln, who said, "I go for all sharing the privileges of the government, who assist in bearing its burdens, by no means excluding women."

William H. Seward, who says: "Justice is on the side of woman's suffrage."

Chief Justice Chase, who says: "I think there will be no end to the good that will come by woman's suffrage," and the names of Longfellow, Whittier, George William Curtis, Wendell Phillips, Emerson, John Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, Huxley, William Lloyd Garrison, and a host of others, all testify to woman's tactics in infantry.

As regards the cavalry, it might be facetiously remarked that would not compete with some men who may be found with attenuated aural appendages, who by their senseless braying, so betray their ancestors that they are doomed to perpetuate only monstrosities.

(No reference to the orator in the Senate.)

Mr. Smith appeals to the intelligence of the senate when he says, "I hope there are senators enough here with brains to defeat that bill."

Now it is a fact that the bill passed the committee of the whole with only two dissenting votes.

While after the third reading, and after the masterly oratory of Senator Smith, it was lost. But that does not prove that it was brains that defeated the bill, any more than it proves that the applause that follows a clown's questionable acts and songs, are an expression of a like sentiment in the audience. It is a peculiarity of mankind, that they sometimes assent to a thing which, on reflection, fills them with regret. The bill was undoubtedly defeated by some such chicanery, and not by brains.

I offer you Mr. Smith's arguments against the equal suffrage bill. It would have been far pleasanter to have met his arguments if he had asserted woman's inferiority in intelligence, or attainments, or her unfitness in any way for political equality, or her inefficiency to comprehend the intricacies of politics or government.

It is a pleasure to measure lance with a man who is master of the situation.

But Mr. Smith has by his argument and oratory displayed done more to advance the cause of equal representation than any one thing, from anyone person, since equal suffrage was first advocated. His speech will not impress women alone, as to the fallacy of sending such men as Mr. Smith to the Legislature, but every honest, thoughtful man will demand that this buffoonery cease, and that women of thought, dignity, and intelligence, be allowed to have a voice in the government of the people, of whom they are a part.—Charlotte Tribune.

The Farmer's Wife Purchasing Agency.

We wish to call the attention of our readers to The Purchasing Agency, which is managed with the business department of THE FARMER'S WIFE, having received many requests to establish an institution in this city to meet the demands of our readers in furnishing any article of merchandise, and that such would be appreciated. We are able to announce that arrangements have been perfected. Many of our patrons cannot find just what they want in the smaller towns, and many of them can more easily send by mail than make a pilgrimage to the far-away store. Our feeling in the matter has been justified. Experience has demonstrated the fact that there is a large mail and express trade done in the country. We simply come to our subscribers and offer to do the business for them that others have been doing, providing we can do it satisfactorily. We claim special advantages for our Purchasing Agency. It can be run at such a trifling expense, that we can do work for less margin than is possible, when the agency is the only business. We have no office rental to pay—our present offices affording us ample room; we have no wages to pay; we do our own purchasing; we have no advertising and printing bills to pay—we use our own mediums. Thus we are able to surprise those who give us their trade. We do not fear competition, for we are able to meet it successfully. We are determined to give satisfaction, for by so doing we not only retain the customer's trade, but we wed the customer to our paper, and that is of large importance to us. The family of readers—and a large family it has now become—is invited to use our agency when they can do so to their own interest, and without doing an injustice to any other person or business. We feel confident we can please, and we feel sure that we can make it profitable to those who order through us. Order anything. There is nothing in the market which we cannot handle.

"The magnificent new sleepers just built at the Pullman shops for the SANTA FE ROUTE, to run between Denver and Chicago, are said to rival anything in the way of sleepers ever seen in the west. The interior is finished in silk plush, but little of the mahogany and cherry wood being visible; while the smoking room and lavatories are finished in the same material, harmoniously blended with hammered brass. It may be a stereotyped phrase to call the new cars rolling palaces, but the appellation is decidedly appropriate. At either end of the cars are beautiful arches of mahogany and so ingenious are the arrangements that one believes he is in an elegant drawing room."

STARTING IN LIFE.

To Begin Right is Half the Battle.

BY EVELYN MC CORMICK.

As a forcible illustration of the idea which I shall endeavor to impress upon my readers, I shall here quote entire a short, pungent article clipped recently from a paper. "A young man that works for his board, no matter what honest work he has, has no reason for shame. A young man who eats the bread of idleness, no matter how much he has, is disgraced. Independence first. The young man who pockets his pride and carries a stiff upper-lip, need not starve, and stands a chance to become rich if he cares to." These are homely truths, worth a fortune to those wise enough to recognize the value of them, and possessed of enough manly and womanly courage to adopt them as their standard. If I mistake not, the sons and daughters of the farmer are much more apt to embrace and put into practical use this theory than their weak and nervous city consins. They are growing old fashioned, too, in these days of lightning rapidity in the matter of getting rich. Some prefer robbing a bank, or appropriating a few hundred thousand trust funds committed to their care, and stragling conscience, flit away to some new land to enjoy their ill gotten gains, where, if conscience did not die they would be forever haunted with the horror-stricken faces of the widow and orphan rendered beggars by their hands. But these sentiments quoted illustrate some of the old-fashion ways it pays to follow, and woe be unto those who heed them not. It's very perilous to be without a conscience and to cultivate a tender, peaceful one is the province of every human being, and thus assure to themselves a fountain of rest and happiness no material wealth can itself purchase. Conscience is our rudder and we can never reach a haven of rest without it; the light-minded will sneer at this no doubt, but the man or woman who claims that ill-gotten gains can bring the sweet returns that honest toil surely does bring to the honest toiler, shows a perverted and vitiated character. It is a strange fact that the one thing most sought after in this world is the most unstable, uncertain of retaining after gaining of most any other thing one prizes: as poor old Captain Hardy in Charles Reed's Hard Cash, so pitifully sings, in his half-demented state over the loss of it, "riches have wings, riches have wings." How many, many young men of our time are chasing this bauble in utter forgetfulness of the true riches all about them, leaving bright minds and grand souls to lie fallow, never for a day devoting themselves to the elevating work of developing the riches of their own character and laying up a fortune no chance but death can rob them of. These days everything seems to go by extremes to a great degree. Either the youth is over-worked or let to run wild entirely. Over-indulgence amounts to a vice. Some dispositions can bear this latter way, others can not. Some boys remain harmless, neither become vicious nor good for anything, simply lead an empty, rapid life, neither wronging any one especially nor benefiting themselves nor any one else. While this is comparatively innocent, is it filling our idea of a creature made in the image of God? Is there anything so grand and noble as a young man whose heart is beating high with a courageous ambition to run a good race on the highway that leads to honor and fame, in any of the many honorable industries this life of ours affords? On the other hand, is there anything more ignoble, more contemptible, than the young man who starts out in life with the secret aim to do as little and get as much as possible from, and of his fellow man? "Independence first." Yes, who that has a soul in him can bear to be dependent, having the capacity to become self-sustaining? I am inclined to the opinion that there is a sentiment gaining ground among the farmer's boys and girls these days, that farm life is too prosy, too slow for their newly acquired views of life, and too many are making the terrible mistake of turning their backs upon the happiness and independence that awaits them. Many a farmer boy intended to the city by the erroneous idea that fortune and fame stand waiting to empty their treasures on his head, in a few short years has come to sigh for the field and the woods, and would be right glad to step into the place he had relinquished, and grow broad and strong under the influence of hardy toil, while along with it growing higher and purer in character from his communion with nature all about him. By his brief absence he had learned that a living, which the family of a thrifty farmer does not consider in summing up losses and gains, in the city's workshop, was secured only by devoting himself assiduously to the interest of another from early morn to night fall, and that too, possibly, in the atmosphere of an electric lighted, rear office or basement room where the rays of the sun, which he had been accustomed to basking in as a boy from sunrise to sunset, never found entrance. To gain independence being the first requisite, let us look into the matter seriously, and try and ascertain where the fault lies that so many of our young people seem to be afraid of their own weakness and utterly lack courage to enter the battle for preferment. In my opinion it is just here, in the manner of rearing, the boy and girl of the present day are being enervated and dwarfed by the over-indulgent parent. Let them try what it will do for a young sapling in the forest, to build a barrier around it sheltering it from all the winds and storms, nourishing it with artificial warmth and moisture. God's ways cannot well be improved upon by puny man, and the boy that is strengthened, toughened, seasoned as he develops from boyhood to manhood by duties imposed, by cheerful efforts at difficult tasks of hand and brain, is the boy that is going to stand the crucial test of man's best places in this grand, stirring world in which we live, and feel the joy of success achieved that the petted, sickly, spoiled youth can know nothing of through his whole life. Of this latter sort did not come our military heroes, engineers, bridge and railway builders, our sea captains and scientists, indeed, any of the great army of stalwarts who keep this sublime world of ours growing into new and grander proportions each year, dazzling us with the possibilities of the coming years. I had thought courteous manners, integrity of character and an honest purpose in building up a fortune by persevering industry, in some honorable pursuit, whether by hand or brain or both, constituted the definition of a gentleman and should give him a passport to any society in the land. In fact, I do think such an one could well afford to dispense with the acceptance or declination of this supercilious class, gaining rather by rejecting him. No great soul can submit to the ban of enforced idleness. It must be about its master's business in some one or other of the great or small workshops of this never ceasing working world of ours, and cut some small epitaph for itself on the tablet of time, that it may be remembered, at least, a decade or two by its fellow man. What is not possible to the ambitious boy or girl, especially to those endowed with a strong and vigorous physique? And where will you find the greater number of stalwart, heaven-built lads and robust, rosy lasses? Why, on the farm, of course, not in the stifled atmosphere of fashionable society in the cities. These boys and girls, carrying with them the clear, strong heads, and warm, ambitious hearts, that come of stalwart, healthy bodies, the result of life in the open air; busy lives, too, are the very lads and girls that are to be the foundation stone upon which is to rest the salvation of the race. Who but can see with what lightning speed the thing called fashion in our great cities is crushing all the true womanhood and manhood out of life? The only hope is from the country. New blood, new brain force must be poured into this rioting, nerve-destroying, rushing, fever-breeding mode of life, or the wheels of commerce will cease to revolve and the race itself will cease to exist, except in institutions for the care or cure of diseased minds and worn out bodies. Work is noble. It is the only honorable life; for a Christian it is obligatory. But work we must with wisdom and understanding, cherishing

our strength both physically and mentally. No rule can be established to fit anyone's ability; each must study and know himself and then half the battle is won. I beg of you boys and girls of the farm, don't leave the pure air of the country, where you can see and hear the beautiful songsters singing their praises on high, while the city folk are pained with seeing them only, dead, upon the fashionable woman's bonnet. Don't leave the country where your beautiful, devoted shepherd-dog can lie in the sunshine, or in the shadow as pleases him, unmolested or assailed by the gamin of the city. Don't leave the farm where the air is laden with the perfume of new-mown hay, and the eye feasted upon tasseling corn and blooming buckwheat, an undulating blossoming earth at your feet, a sky overhead unclouded by the murky smoke stained atmosphere of the city. Don't leave the farm where you see your fine steeds, in all the perfection of nature as God made them, prancing and cavorting over your green fields; not as the city folk are pained to see them clipped, high-checked, robbed of beautiful mane and tail, with blinders, the principal use of which is as a convenient place upon which to display the initial of the owner; a sordid custom to my idea, as it springs of a desire to advertise the fact that you own a team at last. If there were no farm life, whence would come the inspiration for such charming and refining poems as "Holland's Mistress of the Manse," or Whittier's "Among the Hills?" Remember, my friends, "God made the country and man made the town," and while man is doing some wonderful things these days in developing the riches of this life, the country life brings us nearer to the God that made it all than any other can. Colleges equipped in every particular for the complete education of the boys and girls of all tastes are springing up all over the land, and nowhere can the farmers' sons and daughters boast of greater advantages of education, right at their very doors, too, than ours of the hoosier state. The Purdue University is rapidly gaining a national reputation. Nothing stands in the way of the farm lads and lasses of Indiana building for themselves an enviable manhood and womanhood, if, as I said in the beginning, they start right, not "looking through a glass darkly," but with a steady hand and strong heart, looking the future in the face with an eye for conquest, and grasp happiness and fame and fortune, if you care to, as it dies.

FOR FARMER'S WIFE.

Who is to Blame?

BY MARIE M. BRUNER.

Is the male sex the cause of the disfranchisement of women? If so, what is the effect?

It is generally conceded by both sexes that man is the supreme cause. This one admission alone decides our fate if the concession itself is a substantiated fact.

If on the meeting of two great armies just ready to engage in battle, one of the commanders should step forth and say to the other commanders, "I know you will win this battle; why, we all know that we shall be made prisoners, for have you not a larger and stronger army, and have you not before held this whole army prisoners?" What would be the effect on that commander's army? They would say, as many women say to-day, "What is the use? They are stronger than we, and unless we can win some of the enemy's ranks to our side, wherein is the use of a conflict which is already decided?" This true that to some it would inspire with greater heroism, to the majority it would hang above as an inevitable fate, and sink them into a lethargy that all the powers of heaven and earth could not rouse.

And so it is with the majority of our women to-day. It is conceded that man can and will keep woman down on a low plane of inferiority, and they sink of their own accord without a struggle. Only a minority, who possess superior minds, unflagging zeal, and unceasing energy, are enabled to cope with the tempest, and rise like a gallant vessel, sail proudly o'er the waves.

If men were and are the cause of woman's disfranchisement, the very knowledge of it becomes to them a weapon in every man's hand, if he but choose to wield it, and the poor shrinking women are confronted by an army so compact and formidable, that, if women were to rise en masse, and try to force their way through to the other side, there would be but a short and decisive conflict, which would ultimately result in the resubjugation of woman, which would be all the more intolerable from a sense of humiliation and defeat.

If men are the supreme cause, the effect will be lasting. Jacta est alea, nothing can avert our lethality. Again, if men are the supreme cause, why are they the supreme cause? There is no limit to cause and effect, for it does not travel in a straight line, but in a circle. We find this illustrated all through the universe, even in the most trivial circumstances.

There is no cause without effect, and that very cause was the effect of some other cause. We may trace from cause to effect, and likewise may trace from effect back to cause. Backward we trace round the circle, and forward we trace round the circle, but either leads at last to God, the center and controlling influence around which the circle is built.

Therefore, we ask the question, what caused man to set deliberately to work to bring about the fall of woman to a plane beneath him, mentally, morally and socially?

What object could he possibly have in view? self-development? Would it make him brighter, mentally, morally and socially, because he had succeeded in putting his companion, mother or sister beneath him? Would we ourselves feel ourselves rising to a higher sphere because we had degraded another? Common humanity answers "no!" Again we ask, what is the object of mankind in doing this? We can not conscientiously accuse our fathers, husbands or brothers of setting about to encompass us and promote our downfall. Do we not know that they would prefer us as companions and equals rather than slaves or menials?

So if we will reason a little in this way regarding our own fathers, husbands and brothers, can we not gradually widen our reasoning faculties until we shall finally be enabled to grasp the subject in a higher, nobler, and broader sense than ever before.

Our country is made up of families, and reasoning from this can we not compare our country to one large family (every family has one black sheep) where fathers, husbands and brothers will be proud to see their wives, mothers and sisters rise, not fall, mentally, morally and socially.

Some of them conscientiously believe that it is essential for the development of women that they enter not into politics. They do not seem to grasp the subject in its broadest sense. They think only of their individual mother, wife or sister, and not of the benefit it will be to us as a nation. We must open their eyes and educate them to this fact, and then no longer will woman censure man.

But there is a cause exists, and if we hold the male sex blameless, where lies the blame? At our door, certainly. It is woman that brings about the downfall of woman. If one of our sex fall from the pedestal of womanly virtue, who is the first to point the finger of scorn? Is it man or woman? Shame be unto us, but truth forces us to acknowledge ourselves the culprits.

Many a poor innocent lamb has been shut out of the fold, and exposed to the bleak, cold, biting winds of degradation and despair, because some suspicious female chose to gossip about the defenseless one.

Oh, mothers! educate your daughters against this one great sin, and womanhood will have made a long stride toward attaining perfection and godliness. Teach them to assist the fallen to rise, instead of turning to them the cold shoulder of scornful mockery. Who can tell how soon your daughter will be in a position of disgrace, buffeted about on this cold world so wide, with no friend to assist her to regain her lost womanhood; for you, perhaps, will be lying in the cold and silent grave, and even though your spirit be free and stretch forth your arms to guard your cherished treasure, you know full well that spiritual arms cannot reach a suffering child in the material universe. Again, dear mother, teach your child that intellectual and spiritual attainments are higher and nobler than a silk gown or a new spring bonnet.

The little prejudices that women are heir to is another hindrance to her development. Much work must be done all over the land ere we accomplish the desired end. But rest assured that as soon as the women of our land become reasonably, and become self-educators and self-reformers, the day will then be not far distant when the sun shall rise on a thrifter, happier, and nobler nation than has yet trod on any part of the globe. For better women means better men, and better men a better government; a better government means no more monopoly of any kind; neither shall the halls of Congress resound to the tread of the feet of men alone, but the light, gentle, quick steps of women's feet shall form a sweet accompaniment, and we will bow our heads and say esto perpetua.

Woman's Opportunity.

BY MRS. NETTIE S. SUTT.

It was with pleasure I read of the founding of the National Woman's Alliance, which promises to fill a sore need in social economy, as well as to aid in the promotion of the great cause of humanity now agitating our political world. Working women have been too much neglected by the founders and advocates of labor organizations. In many cases devoting their whole time and attention to the organization and education of men, while women are far greater slaves to wage tyranny than men, and consequently stand in greater need of organization.

This neglect is partly due to woman's disfranchisement, but is also partially woman's own fault, in not claiming her rights of recognition in such orders as afford a semi degree of equality.

One of the planks of the platform of the Knights of Labor is to secure equal pay for equal work, but this will never be accomplished until woman herself stands boldly and unitedly for that right. Let women then organize under their own banner, that they may become better able to secure their rights. The future of the industrial woman depends much upon herself. She may rear her own castle, or remain in a hole of her own choice. She can assert her right to independence, or remain a slave to the needle or the loom. The world is indifferent as to her choice. She must make the choice for herself. If she toils with man in his daily occupations, justice demands for her equal pay and emoluments. It is her right, and a failure to demand that right is not only a wrong to herself, but to all industrial women.

The National Order of Videttes advocated equality of sexes, and carried out the principle in their order by receiving women on exactly the same terms as men; and the Union Labor party, through the influence of prominent Videttes, placed a plank of equality in their platform. In 1887, since which time woman's opportunities have been increasing, and as she lays hold of these opportunities she progresses towards perfect equality and rights of citizenship.

If one doubts the coming triumph of woman, let them study the reform movement of the past four years. In the summer of 1887, when the writer first went upon the rostrum, advocating the principles then so decidedly unpopular, but to-day being proclaimed from farm and house-top, there was but one other Kansas woman—Mrs. M. E. Lease—possessing the independence and courage to face the scorn and disapproval of both sexes, and publicly stand for the God-given rights of Americans, male and female, while the female lecturers of the whole country advocating those principles could be counted upon the fingers of one hand. But the little hill has grown to a mountain, and to-day, wherever those principles are taught, through the St. Louis platform, female lecturers lift their voices, proclaiming them from the rostrum; and woman is fast being recognized as a powerful auxiliary in the efforts to secure a more just contribution of the world's wealth to those who produce it.

The Woman's National Industrial League has also helped to awaken an interest in the public mind, until, through these joint forces, a great controversy by the industrial people has arisen as to the best methods of dignifying labor, and uplifting the industrial woman. Woman's opportunity now stands before her, and if every advocate of female suffrage would join issues with every great political reform element, enrolling the nation's toilers under its banner, woman's triumph would bless even this generation, bringing in its train the overthrow of many other powerful evils. Then let not woman undervalue the power and influence of organization, but under the banner of the Woman's Alliance join hands throughout the length and breadth of the land, bringing victory by making our power felt as industrial and political forces.

The Dress Reform Movement—The Education of American Girls Abroad—Queen Victoria's Household Expenses—A Typical Georgian Woman—Baths for Children.

What Shall Woman Wear

THE agitation for the reform of feminine dress which began at Chautauqua has spread all over the country. The problem as to whether woman shall wear trousers, and if so what kind of trousers, or if they shall continue to wear skirts, and if so whether the skirts shall be long or abbreviated, excites the liveliest sort of interest in feminine minds from Maine to California.

Among other women who are interested in this momentous question is Kate Field. It is obvious that she is disposed to regard trousers with respect. Also that she knows whereof she speaks. For she says, "There are trousers and trousers." There are, indeed. There are trousers that fit and trousers that don't, trousers hideous enough in pattern to make a cast iron canine howl with anguish, and trousers lovely in hue as a poet's dream, trousers that are paid for and trousers that are not and not likely to be.

But it is the Turkish women's trousers that Kate Field most admires. She declares that they are by no means unsightly, and that a feminine costume modeled after them might combine utility with beauty. Unquestionably it might. But it by no means follows that this will induce woman-kind to adopt the Turkish style. Disguise them or expand them as you will, trousers are still essentially masculine, and dainty women will never consent to appear in public in a garment that is immediately associated with masculinity in the mind of every beholder.

A great many women would like a new style of dress that would give them greater freedom of movement, and that would not doom them to humiliating awkwardness or fatally bedraggled ankles if they venture abroad on a wet day. But they want something that is wholly feminine. They don't want trousers, and they won't have them. As for Miss Field's further suggestion of the ancient Greek dress for women, we fear that this, too, is impracticable. It might be very lovely on a pretty woman in a cozy drawing room, but on the streets it would hardly be in place.

On the whole, it looks as though the solution of the problem which the dress reformers are bravely confronting was a long distance away.

One Fair Face.

The natives of Georgia, a country in Asia, situated on the south side of the Caucasian range, and now included in the Russian Government Tiflis, belong to the Caucasian race, and have been as much celebrated as the Circassians for the athletic frames of the men and the beauty of the women. These qualities have created in bygone times a large demand for the men to serve in the armies and for the women to become inmates of the harems of the Turks.

The German nobles long derived their chief revenue from this traffic, valuing their serfs only for the money which they could obtain for them in the Turkish markets. Under the Russian sovereignty, which was established in 1800, this traffic has ceased, and the distinction which divided the whole population into the classes of nobles and serfs, nearly equivalent to those of masters and slaves, though still subsisting, has been greatly modified. The Georgians belong to the Greek Church, and the Bible was translated into their native language as early as the beginning of the fifth century.

Educating Our Girls Abroad.

As a rule the American girl seeks Europe for special study, either of music, art, or for the purpose of acquiring one or more of the continental languages—German, French, and Italian. The question where, when and how to use time and money most profitably, i. e., to which province or cities to enter at once a pension school where only French, German, or Italian is spoken; or to live in some family where either language is spoken exclusively; or, to take rooms and live en famille, taking, perhaps, some meals at restaurants. Each method has certain advantages, also some objections. In deciding where to go, for instance, to learn German, the Berlin cult will say: "In Bavaria the language is not spoken so purely as in Northern Germany;" while the South German habitant claims the better accent, the Saxon and Austrian Germans have each local claims; but, in point of fact, German is well spoken and well taught by educated people throughout the German Empire; yet, in each separate province, peasants and laborers and their children speak dialects which are as distinct as are the languages of the different tribes of American Indians, and can be understood nowhere else. Hence the conclusion that, all other things being equal, one province is as good as another for acquiring the language.

One of the greatest objections to the pension or boarding-school is the insufficient diet. European cooking is so different from American, and, at first, so unpalatable, that young girls who ought to have appetizing and nourishing food, and plenty of it, could not be sufficiently fed. Then, again, though these schools guard very carefully their pupils, association with girls so differently taught, and whose moral training may or may not have been the best; also, the absence of home and religious helps, is a vital objection to pension schools. Of these schools, the Swiss are said to be the best, and in them French is far more readily acquired than in the Paris schools where so many American girls are sent, and where, as would naturally be the case, the English-speaking pupils associate in their own language.—(Mrs. A. G. Lewis, in the Ladies' Home Journal.)

not generally known that at the end of every year the English Queen's household expenses are audited and checked, and that copies of them are printed with a view to future reference. One of these having fallen into my hands, I herewith append a few facts and items which may interest more humble people. The royal tea, which is always bought at a quaint, old-fashioned shop in Pall Mall, and has been during her five predecessors' reigns, costs $1.35 per pound, and was for a long time known as Earl Grey's mixture, he having recommended the present brand to her Majesty. When she gives a dinner to the extent of $250 is ordered, but for an ordinary dinner three kinds of fish are put on the table, whiting being almost invariably one of them. A sirloin of beef is cooked every night, and is put on the sideboard for the next day's lunch—the Queen seems, in this instance, much like ourselves—and the cheese, of which there are always six or seven kinds, is invariably obtained from one particular firm. The Queen takes, after her dinner, one water biscuit and one piece of cheddar; the Prince of Wales eats a piece of gorgonzola with a crust of household bread. The tea, as well as the cheese and the royal bread, are invariably taken with the Queen wherever she goes. Her Majesty's wine, which is well known to be incomparable, is always kept in the cellars of St. James Palace and is sent in basketfuls of three dozen to wherever she may be, though this is more for the guests and the household than for herself, as her Majesty, when alone, drinks very weak whisky and water with her meals, by the doctor's orders. At banquets, however, she takes two glasses of burgundy. The clerk of the kitchen, who always carves, receives $3,500 per annum, the chef the same, and the two confectioners, who attend to all the pastry, jellies, fruits, etc., get $1,500 and $1,250 respectively.

A Sturdy Old Man.

Oak Cliff has a citizen who is now a robust old gentleman of fine physique and is descended from a very long-lived ancestry, their ages running to 96, 98, 106 and up to 112 years. He has all his teeth except two, which were knocked out by an accident, and they are as sound as a dollar, although he is now 70 years old. He has grown three-fourths of an inch in height since he was 35 years old, and he wears a size larger hat now than he wore then. From that age up to 41 or 42 years his weight remained at 199 pounds, and now, at three score and ten years, his mental faculties, he says, are brighter than ever before.—[Dallas News.]

SERMONS FOR SUNDAY.

A FEW SUBJECTS FOR ALL TO PONDER OVER.

Get Out of Your Own Light—A Pastor Who Never Had Trouble—Trust God Always—Grains of Gold—Religious Notes.

How God Reached Him.

THE other day a young girl was putting a button on her father's coat. She was sitting with her back to the window, and she said, "Father, I can't see; I am in my own light." He said, "Ah, my daughter, that is where you have been all your life." This is the position of some of you spiritually. You are in your own light; you think too much of yourselves. There is plenty of light in the Sun of Righteousness, but you get in the dark by putting yourself in the way of that sun. Oh, that your self might be put away! I read a touching story the other day as to how one found peace.

A young man had been for some time under a sense of sin, longing to find mercy; but he could not reach it. He was a telegraph clerk, and being in the office one morning he had to receive and transmit a telegram. To his great surprise, he spelt out these words—"Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." A gentleman out for a holiday was telegraphing a message in answer to a letter from a friend who was in trouble of soul.

It was meant for another, but he that transmitted it received eternal life, as the words came flashing into his soul.

O dear friends, get out of your own light, and at once, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world!" I cannot telegraph the words to you; but I would put them before you so plainly and distinctly that every one in trouble of soul may know that they are meant for him. There lies your hope—not in yourself; but in the Lamb of God. Behold Him; and as you behold Him your sin shall be healed.

Never Had Any Trouble.

"I once asked an aged man in regard to his pastor, who was a very brilliant man: 'Why is it that your pastor, so very brilliant, seems to have so little tenderness in his sermons?'" "Well," he replied, "the reason is, our pastor has never had any trouble. When misfortune comes upon him his style will be different." After awhile the Lord took a child out of that pastor's house, and though the preacher was just as brilliant as he was before, oh, the warmth, the tenderness of his discourses! The fact is that trouble is a great educator. You see sometimes a musician sit down at an instrument, and his execution is cold and formal, and unfeeling. The reason is that all his life he has been prosperous. But let misfortune or bereavement come to that man, and he sits down at the instrument, and you discover the pathos in the first sweep of the keys.

A young doctor comes into a sick room where there is a dying child. Perhaps he is very rough in his prescription, and very rough in his manner and rough in his feeling of the pulse, and rough in his answer of the mother's anxious question, but the years roll on and there has been one dead in his own house, and now he comes into the sick-room, and with tearful eye he looks at the dying child and he says, "Oh, how this reminds me of my Charlie!" Trouble, the great educator! Sorrow—I see its touch in the grandest painting; I hear its tremor in the sweetest song; I feel its power in the mightiest argument.

Doing Errands for Christ.

"Mamma," said a little 5-year-old boy, "I wish Jesus lived on earth now."

"Why, my darling?"

"Because I should have liked so much to have done something for Him."

"But what could such a little bit of a fellow as you have done for the Saviour?"

The child hesitated a few moments, then looked up in his mother's face and said: "Why, mother, I could have run on all His errands for Him."

"So you could, my child, and so you shall. Here is a glass of jelly and some oranges I was going to send to poor old sick Margaret by the servant, but I will let you take them instead and do an errand for the Saviour, for when upon earth He said: 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these ye did it unto Me.' So remember, children, whenever you do a kind act for anybody because you love Jesus, it is just the same as if the Saviour were now living on the earth and you were doing it for Him.—[The Illustrator.]

Trust Him Always.

The Bible is full of lessons that teach us as clearly as anything in language possible could, that God wants His children to understand that they can depend upon Him under all circumstances. He has declared, and tried to make plain in hundreds of different ways, that He is an ever present help in time of need, and yet he finds it hard to find people who will take Him at his word and trust Him as He would be trusted. There are so many of us who are like the servant of Elisha. The moment dangers of any kind surround us, we lose our faith, our courage and our peace, and become so paralyzed with fear that we forget all about God, and try to make a way of escape for ourselves, when if we could but know it, we are at that very moment in the safest place in God's universe. If God does not expect us to trust Him always what does the ninety-first Psalm mean? Was it put in the Bible simply to fill up? Surely in no way is God more greatly dishonored by His children to-day than in their failure to believe and appropriate His promises." He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.

His Test.

A dealer in pictures who makes it his business to find as many new painters as possible, both in this country and abroad, was asked recently in regard to his methods of selecting pictures to buy. He was very frank in his talk, and one thing which he said is shrewd enough to be worth quoting.

"Of course," he said, "with my experience I am able to judge whether there is promise in a painter's work, but I never buy with any idea of putting the painter on my list until I have seen the man and talked with him myself. I always watch him closely, and I never buy his picture unless his eye lights up when I talk to him about his work and about his profession."

The artist whose heart was really in his work could not discuss it without kindling, and the man who did not paint from the heart was not the one whose pictures the dealer wanted.

The remark was not only one which showed insight and shrewdness on the part of the dealer, but it is one of a good deal of significance in regard to all work. The man who does anything worth doing is the man who cannot talk about what he has accomplished or what he hopes to accomplish with enthusiasm, no matter how far short of his ideals what he has actually done may seem to him to fall.—[Youth's Companion.]

Exceedingly Literal.

A Philadelphia physician was called by a foreign family, and prescribed "One pill to be taken three times a day, in any convenient vehicle." The family looked into the dictionary to get at the meaning of the prescription. They got on well as far as to the word "vehicle." To this they found cart, wagon, carriage, wheelbarrow. After a grave consideration they came to the conclusion that the doctor meant that the patient should ride out, and while in the vehicle he should take the pill. The supposed advice was followed to the very letter, and, in the case of a few weeks, the fresh air taken to regularly completely cured the patient.

Book-Keeping on the Farm.

NO one who has not noted the results can fully appreciate the value of book-keeping to the farmer and his family, says a writer in Farm and Fireside. He is not found complaining of hard times, because he discovers the small leaks and applies the remedy. He saves himself from embarrassment and his farm from the mortgage. His wife, keeping her accounts of receipts and expenditures for butter, eggs, poultry, dry goods, groceries, etc., acquires business knowledge and sagacity, and at her husband's death does not find it necessary to call in a stranger to act as administrator, who like a leech, sucks the life blood from the estate—the joint earnings of husband, wife and children—and finally, with the aid of lawyers and court fees, perhaps leaves the wife and children in absolute want. No, her knowledge of business principles enables her to administer her own affairs.

The boy who is permitted to earn his spending money, and taught to keep his little accounts and compare receipts and expenditures, will the earlier learn the value of money and apply his wits to live within his income. Such a boy will not accumulate debts for his overworked father to pay; neither is he so likely to fall into fast company or fast living. He is educated for business, and will be able to hold his own in the battle of life.

The girl who has her allowance and is taught to make accounts, will appreciate the value of a dollar and use discretion in its expenditure. A young lady once told her lover, when he proposed, that although she loved him she would not marry him until he had $10,000. He was somewhat discouraged, but went to work to obtain the money and the girl. A few weeks later she inquired how he was succeeding. He replied: "Very well; I have saved $17."

"Well," replied the lady, "I expect that will be sufficient; we may as well get married."

We hear so much in this day about practical education. But practical education is that which practically fits boys and girls for the active duties of life, and any education which falls short of this is neither practical nor complete. Fit a child to earn a living and you do better by him than to give him wealth. Fit him to appreciate and care for property before he is safe to be entrusted with a legacy.

A Post Driver.

The accompanying plain engravings show, says Farm and Home, a most effective post driver and one that can be made entirely at home excepting the weight and hook.

A block of iron weighing forty to fifty pounds is required. Sometimes a chunk can be bought for a song second hand, but it will be cheaper usually to have it cast. Its essential features are a ring to hoist it by, and grooves in the sides in which to slide the tongues attached to the uprights. To have the dump self-acting the hook must be made of the precise pattern shown. Any blacksmith can reproduce it. The hook is pulled down to the weight resting on top of the post and slipped into its ring. As the weight is hoisted the hook-ring will be seen to remain at the left-hand end of the slot as in Fig. 1. When it has reached the height at which it is desired to drop the weight, the long tongue of the hook trips against a rod or slat extended across the frame for the purpose and is pulled down. This act lets the weight slide to the left and the hook-ring to the right in the slot, as in Fig. 2. The weight is instantly freed and falls heavily on the post. The driver works on the principle of a railroad pile driver.

Thirteen-foot planks are firmly braced on the front ends of stone boat-planks held together by irons and bolts eight feet from the ground so they will not interfere with the posts being driven. When being drawn from one field or farm to another the boat planks are connected in front and behind by hooks made of heavy wire. This prevents their spreading. Two pulleys are made of double thickness of inch board with the edges chamfered before they are bolted together. The grain of these boards is placed at right angles the one to the other to prevent splitting. One is hung at the top of the upright to receive the rope from the weight hook, and the other at the rear end of the boat-planks on a brace. A horse draws the machine along astride the fence row, and the posts are held in place by the uprights while being driven. Any boy can raise the weight by pulling on the rope at A.

Good Breeding Sense.

One of the most profitable things a farmer can do is to set squarely at work to post himself on the established principles of breeding farm animals. At the present time, and in the full blaze of the intelligence of the nineteenth century, we believe that not one farmer in a hundred has made such a study. It is mortifying, in the extreme, that there is such a vast amount of ignorance on these important questions. Of all men on earth the farmer should be a well-posted breeder. Of all men on earth he ought to have a library well stored with what the wisest breeders have said or written. Yet 99,100ths of our farmers are absolutely at sea on the question: How to breed a dairy cow? or: How to breed for mutton? or: How to breed a valuable roadster? Not only these, but there are plenty of other questions connected with breeding, such, for instance, as inbreeding to a certain extent. We hear farmers every day talking against inbreeding, and declaring that no good ever came from it. Now had these men ever studied the question as they ought, had they read the history of all the leading families of our domestic animals, they would see that breeding potency has been always established by more or less of inbreeding. There is a mass of knowledge that the breeder must know if he becomes successful in breeding, which the average farmer seems to think is of no value to him. Yet he is the man who must raise the farm animals. He is the man on whom all progress, honor and profit to the community and State in this particular must depend. As he averages in knowledge and skill so will the country or State average. If the average farmer breeds from grade sires, and has no clear, well-defined ideas of the tools he is using, and their effects, the result will be just as it has been. The low average of milk production per cow is due mainly to the low average of breeding sense and judgment among the farmers in that line. The average cow is just what the average farmer has made her. Certainly no man but he is responsible for her. There will never come any reform, any improvement of the knowledge and fortune of the farmer, until he changes his habits, and becomes more of a student. He must use his mind, and to his knowledge, enlarge his judgment, in short become a more intellectual man.

With too many study and thought is distasteful. But every time they are punished for it. The mysterious forces of life, the deep problems that lie in the great question of breeding, never unlock their secrets to the man who will not think. If he would think wisely toward expression, he must study the experiences of others. Every sunken reef has been discovered at the expense of a costly wreck. The record of the reefs, as well as the clear water, constitute the literature of breeding as well as navigation.

Why the Boys Leave the Farm.

The answer is self-evident—perpetual toil in good weather all through the busy season, and perpetual loneliness in bad weather and most of the winter season. The time when the farmers have leisure is, in half the country, the very time when they cannot get away from home by reason of their isolation and bad roads; yet such is the hunger of the heart that the boys revolt against this unendurable loneliness and even now often walk miles through the rain or the snow to spend half a day in sitting around the stove in the country store. Already, in many sections, the young people of both sexes have broken through the barriers and established farmers' clubs and little societies of one sort or another; and improved roads have done much to aid this relief. But why should not this natural tendency be reasonably directed, and all ages and both sexes enjoy their long winter evenings together?—John W. Bookwalter, in the Forum.

THE POULTRY-YARD.

Feeding Soft Food.

Soft feed is not natural to birds—that is, wet and sloppy materials—as nature provides them with the means of reducing the hard substances. We have fed hens on glass, broken flint, powdered china and other substances, but the gizzard ground them to an impalpable powder. Hard, sharp substances assist the gizzard in grinding the food and the process is such as to pass the food slowly into the digestive organs. When the crop is filled with soft food the work of the gizzard is lessened, and the process of forwarding the food too rapid, the result being indigestion. It may be noticed that when a full meal of ground grain is given, the hens at once they remain in a state of inactivity until the crop is emptied of its contents.

The Ideal Fowl.

The ideal fowl is a very practical sort of a bird. One that is plump, fine-flavored and quick of growth, that is what any one wants in a broiler—a good roaster with heavy breasts, tender flesh. As layers we want hens that will begin to lay when six months old, that will lay eggs two ounces each in weight, with rich, yellow yolks. Every hen should lay at least 100 eggs and rear a brood of chicks the first year and a half of her life. This is not wanting too much, but there are many fowls kept on the farm that fail to come up to what constitutes good, practical stock. It is a poor policy to retain poultry which does not retain an equivalent for its food.—J. W. Caughey, in Agriculturist.

LIVE STOCK

About Hogs.

GENERALLY the profitable side of feeding hogs is that which makes the growing pig most comfortable.

ONE advantage in feeding wheat middlings made into a slop with skim milk to hogs is that it will give a better proportion of lean meat.

THAT their is considerable in the management is shown by the fact that while some are making a fair profit others are losing money.

In feeding for growth only give sufficient to keep in a good thrifty condition, while in fattening they should have all that they will eat up clean.

NEARLY every year good cured hams and bacon sell readily at good prices and pay the farmers a better profit than selling the hogs when fat.

HAVE both the sow and boar in a good thrifty condition when mating to breed. If this is secured they will impress their offspring with constitutional vigor.

It is not good economy to feed all sizes together. Divide up according to size and feed accordingly; it is a great waste of feed to do otherwise, while a part of the pigs at least will not do as well.

THE best time to fatten hogs is reasonably early in the fall. At that time a better grain in proportion to the amount of food given can be secured.

A good sow should raise two good litters of pigs in a year. One in the spring to fatten and butcher in the fall, and one in the fall that can be fattened and marketed the latter part of spring or early summer.

THE DAIRY.

A Questionable Procedure.

Cows that are large milkers and fresh in milk when turned to pasture should be milked three times a day instead of twice. They are hearty feeders and have plenty of paunch room, and having been bred and developed almost with the one object of turning fodder into milk, their production is limited only when they can hold no more. Contrary to a common opinion, by so doing the milk obtained will be of a better quality, as well as increased in quantity.

When anything greatly disturbs the cow the percentage of fat in her milk is lessened to even a greater extent than the milk flow. This has been proved by repeated tests, when they have been worried by dogs, abused by ill tempered milkers, or in any way frightened or excited. Perhaps the fever in the blood burns out the fat, or causes it to be absorbed into the system. But whatever the reason the fact is abundantly proven and as over-distention of the well-filled milk-veins and glands cannot help but cause pain, this will explain why the milk is richer in solids, and especially in butter fats, than when it is drawn out twice.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

How to Make a Water-Filter.

Chas. Wilson, of Winnetka, Ill. has contributed the following to the "Short Cuts" column of the Practical Farmer: Not feeling disposed to pay $8.00 for a three-quart crock filter, I filter my water with a ten-gallon keg and ordinary water cask, as shown in sketch. A number of one-quarter inch holes are bored into the bottom of keg. Inside I put a four inch layer of coarse gravel, another of sand, same thickness, near a layer of pulverized charcoal, and this covered with a piece of cheese cloth, to catch any coarse material. Gravel and sand, of course, should be previously well washed. I fill my keg from the cistern; but the waterspout from the house could be connected with it. Cost of filter is very slight.

CHILDREN'S COSTUMES.

GOWNS THAT ARE BECOMING TO LITTLE GIRLS.

Youth Is Always Beautiful and Its Delicacy, Its Harmony, and Its Coloring May Be Destroyed by an Unbecoming Gown, or Killed, as the Artists Term It, by Too Bright a Color.

What They Should Wear.

PEAKING of children, some philosopher has averred that, no matter how much trouble they make, they always pay their way. Manifestly, this writer hadn't a large family of daughters or he wouldn't have made this remark. I don't know how many children Fox, the founder of Quakerism, was blessed with, says our New York writer, but I've often suspected that he had a large family of daughters, and hence preached against the abomination of fine clothes from the standpoint of economy. Certain it is that Cornelia's jewels, of which she was so proud, were both boys, and it is quite likely that had they been girls she would not have been so eager to call them into the room and show them off, for they would have been sure to cry out in the same breath: "Oh, mamma, buy us some of these pretty gowns!" This silly prejudice against girl babies took its rise in barbarous and semi-barbarous times when the chiefs longed for sons to take up their battles where they left them off. Girls couldn't fight. Thank heaven for that; but they may look beautiful and carry sunshine into the hearts and homes of men. Cornelia's two sons came to bad end. Had they been daughters they might have lived to delight their mother's old age. A mother fortunate enough to possess a daughter should avoid two dangerous extremes in feminine adornment—she should neither dress her too old nor yet too young. Youth is always beautiful, and its delicacy, its harmony, and its coloring may easily be destroyed by an unbecoming gown, or killed, as the artists term it, by too bright a color.

Princess or corselet gown: always look well on young girls, especially if they are slender. Let the gown be made of any woolen material of becoming color, and the upper corsage, plastron and epaulets of pongee. Close the corsage at the back with hooks. You may outline the plastron with a bias border of the woolen stuff. The skirt needs a little ornament of some kind, say several rows of narrow ribbon or galloon.

In my first illustration I present for your consideration a charming evening costume for a young miss—a dotted tulle made up over a straw-colored surah. The skirt, plain in front, has fan pleats at the back, and is bordered with a deep flounce of gathered tulle. The corsage is made on ordinary lining and closes in the middle. The corselet is sewed on one side and hooked on the other. The basques are of the tulle. The ceinture and braces may be of silk or of velvet ribbon. The braces start from the shoulder. The sleeves have ribbon bracelets. It would be difficult to devise a lovelier costume for a girl of 14 to

AUTUMN TOILET FOR YOUNG FOLKS.

16. It is the very perfection of good taste, and any attempt to increase its attractiveness must result in failure.

A pretty afternoon toilet for a young miss may be made up in woolen material of a turquoise blue with a square yoke ornamented with a steel galloon and framed with a narrow ruffle of crepe de chine of the same tone. The corsage closes at the back with steel buttons, and is set off by a broad ceinture or Swiss belt made on stiff material and whaleboned. On the left there is a bow of broad turquoise ribbon with long ends.

In my first illustration you will find admirably pictured two costumes for young girls, the one on the right being in cafe au lait cashmere with spots of a somewhat darker tone, and intended for a miss of sixteen or thereabouts. The lining of the corsage closes in the middle and the yoke and plastron have no seam. The yoke is ornamented with vertical bands of cornflower blue velvet. There is a turn-down collar and bouffant sleeves, cut straight, ending in cuffs ornamented with encircling bands of the velvet. The belt is ornamented in the same way, and there is a rosette at the back to conceal the opening. The plastron and yoke are lined with silk and there are no darts except in the lining. The overskirt is cut toothwise, which parts are lined with silk. To make these teeth you baste the stuff on a band of silk, stitch out the teeth in outline and cut away the superfluous stuff; then turn under the edges. The band of silk is fastened to the skirt by invisible stitches. The skirt is finished with a band of the cashmere, about twelve inches deep, and ornamented with three rows of the ribbon. The teeth must be caught here and there to this band. The skirt is gathered at the waist and has numerous pleats at the back. The costume on the left is intended for a little girl, and may be made up in any woolen stuff, gray, nutbrown, or turquoise blue, while the velvet used to set it off may be black or light brown. The dress is gathered at the neck instead of a collar. The corsage closes at the back. The velvet revers are held in place by large buttons; cuffs in same style. The velvet ceinture has a large bow at the back. It is a charming make-up for a little girl.

Difficult as it is to make a gown that will not rob a child of that delicious expression of youth, that softness and delicacy, that pastel look as distinguished from the sharp outlines of a pen-and-ink drawing, yet it is still more difficult to devise a bit of headgear that will accentuate and emphasize rather than injure or destroy the sweetness of the little face, spiritualized by its masses of tangled curls or encircled by tawny, silken tresses, like a snow scene in a golden frame. I have a couple of hints for you in this line.

In my third illustration you will find a lovely little hat for a child—a cream felt, trimmed with a folded band of cream woolen stuff with bows back and front and large and small pink winers, making a very dainty and delicate head covering, from underneath which the loosened tresses of a wee and winsome maiden curl with charming effect.

My last illustration pictures with good effect a bit of head gear for such a face.

PEARL GRAY FELT.

It is a pearl gray felt, the crown being trimmed with a plaid velvet ribbon, gray and French blue, with a stylish bow on the side as represented. I have noted a very pretty and original costume for a child of 10 or 12 consisting of a little frock, princess style, its skirt having a deep border of torchon or Valenciennes lace, or of embroidery, and a pointed ceinture of the same. Over this is worn quite a long loose jacket of hea- or material, made with bouffant sleeves ending in deep embroidered cuffs, and having a broad, square-cornered lay-down collar of the lace or embroidery. Of course, the frock needs no sleeves. By exhibiting good taste in selection of materials and mode of trimming, you may achieve a very pretty result. The long coat should reach the top of the lace flounce. To keep the coat in place, fasten a string to the center seam at the waist, pass it through the opening of the frock, and tie it underneath the skirt. Smocking is still a popular mode of adding style to children's dress, but it should not be overdone. Instead of making use of this effect on waist and sleeves both, merely content yourself with four or five rows at the throat, and resort to other modes of garniture to complete the scheme of trimming.

It is astonishing how much you can find out about human nature by charging 10 cents for admission.

A WOMAN has been selected to drive the last nail in the woman's building at the World's Fair.

THERE is no round in the ladder of fame too high for woman to stand side by side with man.

THE Kansas State Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union have endorsed universal suffrage.

THE FARMER'S WIFE did not intend to irritate his majesty, the New York Standard, on Protection.

THE F. A. & I. U. of Kansas, by resolution, recommended the FARMER'S WIFE to all Alliance Women.

THE Kansas Equal Suffrage Association will meet in State convention in Topeka Nov. 18 to 20, at the state house.

AN extra edition of the FARMER'S WIFE will be sent out December 15th. This will be our great holiday edition.

BEWARE, the women will stand as one and assert their rights and rise upon the plane of their own sphere. And then what?

THE F. A. & I. U. of Kansas endorsed the steps taken by the women in organizing the National Woman's Alliance, at their annual meeting at Salina last month.

WE hear that the Alliance is dead. If that is so, what is all this talk about? A dead trouble is nothing to a living one, you know; so if dead they ought not to worry. It can do no harm.

WHEN the National Woman's Alliance is rightly interpreted, it will read that all females at the age of 21 years demands the right by the use of her ballot to place men and women side by side at the head of our government.

YES, we often hear that when women vote our country will be ruined. If there is a set of women in this united kingdom that can make any more unjust and injurious laws for the country than has been made by the men, I think it would be a rare treat to meet them. Certainly they would be curiosities.

THE party that will lift aloft the banner on which is inscribed in good faith, "Universal Suffrage," with no special privileges and no privileged classes," will commend itself to the great common people. For thirty years the party in power has made promises. We women have been welding the chains about us. We have found out what we have been doing, and now propose to remedy the evil. The system of disfranchisement must be destroyed.

REV. MILLS, of Chicago, said in his sermon at the Second Presbyterian church of Topeka, October 25th, that men and women together were responsible for the laws of our government. Is it not an injustice to women to hold them responsible for the deeds of men, when by a law made by them we are powerless to suppress the great evils that seem to enumerate every hour. Give us the mighty weapon, the ballot, and then we will not complain if we are held responsible for our laws. But until then we object, to being classed with those who make or break the many unjust laws.

Our friends ask us why we advocate the Alliance principles. Because we think it nearer real Christianity than any other organization. The women are treated as equals. Not only are we accorded equal rights in the work at home, but women are chosen as delegates to all the meetings, thus showing to the world that our work is appreciated and needed; in other words, the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Unions are the only true friends of the women, as far as equal suffrage is concerned. And let me say to my sisters outside of the Alliance, that it is only by the help of those organizations that we will ever have a free and unconditional use of the ballot. That was proven to the women of Kansas in the winter of 1890, and we propose to work for those who work for us, who endorse their words by their deeds, recognizing and demanding our rights as they go along. The time has passed and gone by for women to be deceived by any party, as they have been by the party in power. So we say to those outside, join us, work for the demands of the Ocala platform, and our victory is sure. Then the intelligent woman may stand as an equal by the side of the men who can neither read nor write, and by her ballot help make the laws that are to govern this country.

And who dares to say that the Lord and the women are not with this great organization of the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union. Take courage, most noble brothers, the women were not slow to grasp the meaning of "equal rights to all, and special privileges to none," which has been proven to you by the vast number that have joined your ranks. The Lord, you see, endorses all things that will benefit his children alike, and don't you know the women are a part of his children. May heaven's choicest blessings be showered upon this noble reform work, and shall be our prayer.

It has been said to me: "It is just that woman should have the suffrage, and we are quite ready to give it to them when the majority ask for it." To this I would say that the noblest men and women do not wait till they are asked to be just. Directly they perceive a duty they are ill at ease till they have fulfilled it; and the burden of the injustice actually weighs more heavily upon them than it does upon the person to whom they owe the justice.—Mrs. R. Scott.

LANSING, MICH., Oct. 20, 1891.

Mrs. Emma D. Pack, Dear Editor:

It seems to truly belong to Kansas to take the lead in the reforms of the day for the betterment of humanity. Though she is young in years, the old States, a century old and older, must sit at her feet to learn wisdom.

I am glad and proud that the name of Michigan women as workers are not unknown to Kansas, and are to be found in your columns. With such Michigan women as Mrs. Emery, Mrs. Todd, Dr. Mary Green, known to you, may I not also be an interested spectator of the "good time" not coming, but already here.

Michigan has begun the work, and is marching slowly but steadily toward the light. Her women are not so fully awake as I would like, but they must awaken in the future. The organization of the Grange, the Patrons of Husbandry, and best of all the Farmers' Alliance, have taught much of the equality of the sexes. May the good good work go on, not only in your beautiful State, but throughout our whole land. "The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few."

ALICE MAGUIRE.

We would recommend "the Voice of True Reform," published quarterly by the Rev. Dr. Jas. H. Lathrop, the persistent worker and thinker on all reform. You will find rare food for thought not tasted before, and well worth the 25 cents for the 100 page copy, library form, or $1.00 a year. Mr. Lathrop is one of the oldest advocates of women's rights, and will be found on the side of right at all times.

Single Tax Letter.

KINGS CO., N. Y., Oct. 15, 1891.

Mrs. Emma D. Pack, Editor FARMER'S WIFE:

DEAR MADAM: The "Single Tax Letter Writer" column in the Standard, of New York City, says that your paper has a plank in its platform of the National Woman's Alliance favorable to "Protection."

By this I suppose is meant the taxing of the whole people for the benefit of a portion, with the expectation that it will make everybody better off.

One of the arguments in favor of farmers embracing the doctrine of "Protection" is that it gets them a better market for their products at home. When it is borne in mind that the price of grain is regulated by the biggest market of the world, which is the foreign market, it will be seen that the domestic market is secondary to the foreign one. The exports of the United States, since the adoption of the free trade principle by Great Britain in 1846, when they first became of magnitude, have been almost exclusively of agricultural products, grain, meats, butter, cheese, cattle.

About that date commenced the "homestead" system, originated through the exertions of "Land-Bill Allen," the one man of all others that the people of the United States should pension. His agitation led to the passing of the "homestead bill," giving to actual settlers 160 acres of land for $1.25 per acre. It is the immense quantity of cereals and meats, exported in all these years, that has mainly made this country as rich as it is to-day, has paid off our war debt to less than one-third, and pays the fixed charges of the government. The pensions have supplanted the war debt. These cereal crops have been raised on that cheap land. The grain fields that forty years ago waved all through the fertile valleys of the eastern portion of the United States, are planted no longer. Our flour is made at Minneapolis, and not Rochester and Richmond.

The Protectionists are exceedingly lucky in having abundant crops of this past season to bolster up their theory, coupled with a corresponding short crop in Europe to create a good demand. But this an unusual state of affairs. It is not that the domestic market is the best, but that the foreign one is a better one than usual this year that is the real fact.

It is not protection, but cheap land, that should be the reason for congratulation. But every year, as the country is settled up, land becomes dearer, and as this grows in value for other purposes than raising grain alone, the farmers' capacity for competing with the world's market with dollar wheat becomes lessened; but his taxes will, on the contrary, become heightened. He essays to increase revenue by taxing all kinds of personal property, from bank stocks to tools of trade. All taxes other than that on land values are laid upon the results of labor. If labor has to earn such taxes, then labor is deprived of part of its reward. If there is unequal apportionment of the benefits intended to flow from the use of the taxes by the government, then somebody is robbed, that is, in that benefits are distributed unequally. The owner of property in land receives an unequal share as the land rises in value. The farmer from the necessities of the case is an owner of property in land, but his position is different from that of the mere landlord, as he farms his land for a living, while the landlord holds his land, rents it to others, and lives by the exertions of others; or holds his land, prevents others from working it, and reaps his profits on its final sale. When he pays his taxes, he does as every one else is by law compelled to do, his tax bill is really his license from the State to occupy his holding.

It is often incorrectly said that a tax on land values will bear severely and unjustly on farmers; that if the tax be taken off house values, that more would be remitted on expensive houses in the heart of the city, in proportion, than from less valuable farmers' residences. That may be so, if individual instances are selected, but not in the aggregate.

It can be shown very clearly by the recent land rush to Oklahoma. It is so recent a circumstance, and deals with land entirely unoccupied upon the books of the land office, as to be plain to the understanding. As the hour of noon on the stated day arrived, the rush began, with all the exciting incidents so fully reported in the newspapers.

Imagine, if you please, one of the "boomers," a farmer "locating" 160 acres, and getting it certified upon the books at the land office. The adjoining quarter section, land exactly as good, is selected as a "town site" by one hundred and sixty men, presumably at greater expense. The exact number of men may not be one hundred and sixty, but several. I only take that to give each one a town lot, an acre in size. A mayor and town officers are elected, the land office business attended to, and the various accompaniments of stores for the supplying of provisions, clothes, tools, with the inevitable "saloon," to prey upon the appetite, and all the life of a town started; streets, from necessity, are laid out, and the corner lots become valuable for business. Originally the lots only cost each man perhaps five dollars, when acting in concert at first. Now corner lots 25x100 become more valuable, perhaps rise in value to $50, with inside lots at half that. There are about sixteen lots, 25x100, to an acre, and 2,500 in a quarter section. The one farmer raises a crop, and we will say his quarter section the second year becomes worth $5 an acre, or $800. The one hundred and sixty men's holdings in the town-site at only $25 per lot are worth, however, $4,000. One section is worth $800, the other $4,000. Both are the same size, but the town is far more highly valued for speculative and for assessment purposes.

It is easy to see that as there must be buildings and improvements on both the farm and on the town site, yet if there be no other tax imposed than on the bare land values in either case, the revenue derived from the land values in the town will greatly exceed that from the land value of the farm.

Irrespective of this argument, there are many others from an ethical side of especial importance to women; and Keep Woman's Help and Cheer.

The People's party is the first big national party born of both men and women. Keep the sisters in it. Let no conventions or gatherings of the new party be such that women cannot in decency take part in it. Give us no candidates woman cannot cheerfully support with her voice till she gets her vote. We need her bright counsel and cheer along every pathway of the People's party. Let every action be good enough for her endorsement—for her zealous and spirited espousal in the home and on the political battlefield.

What might have been the fate of other righteous new party movements, had they had woman's heart and hand in it?

No order ever reached a point of any considerable eminence in the United States, giving woman equal rights within its doors, that has failed, and workers who plan for the early downfall of the Farmers' Alliance do well to see that they do not dig a pitfall for themselves.—Rural Press.

LABOR AND LABORERS.

ECHOES FROM THE OFFICE, MILL AND BENCH.

Paragraphs Bearing on Labor Picked From all the Newspapers of the World—How Wage Earners in Every Country Live—Strikes, Lockouts, Etc.

Wages of the World.

THE wages of the world are a matter of interesting and instructive study, as showing not only their variation, but their independence of some of the commonly received causes as to their status and fluctuations. The collation of these statistics embracing both the old world and the new, is largely due to the consular reports of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Germany. These complications may be accepted as approximately accurate, the authority being good and the investigations thorough. Among some of the remarkable facts as substantiated by these inquiries we find that wages seem independent of forms of government. Lower California, Mexico, Malta, and Ceylon under British rule, Algiers and Tunis under French, pay less than Russia cramped with despotism, or Spain under ecclesiastical dominance.

As a rule, the Anglo-Saxon pays more than the German; the German more than the Latin; the Latin more than the Semitic, and the Semitic more than the Malay and Mongolian. The average wages per week as paid to labor, the world over, are classified in the following table, the amount calculated in United States gold dollars:

Germany.....	$2.10
Spain.....	$2.10
Algeria-Lorraine.....	$2.00
Berlin.....	$2.00
Belgium.....	$1.85
Brussels.....	$1.85
London.....	$1.85
Dusseldorf.....	$1.85

Bordeaux.....	$1.85
Marseilles.....	$1.85
Paris.....	$1.85
Belgium.....	$1.85
Brussels.....	$1.85
Antwerp.....	$1.85
Switzerland.....	$1.85
Berne.....	$1.85
Basle.....	$1.85
Average fifty cities.....	$1.85
Austria-Hungary.....	$1.85
Bohemia.....	$1.85
Holland.....	$1.85
Denmark.....	$1.85

This table is of course, limited to the Old World, the figures in the New World showing that outside the United States the city of Toronto and the South American Republics of Venezuela and Ecuador, pay the best figures. Australasia, however, leads the way and surpasses the rest of civilized nations in industrial remuneration. The following table speaks for itself:

Canada.....	$7.25
Ont. (10 cities).....	$5.50
Toronto.....	$8.00
Montreal.....	$6.75
New Brunswick.....	$6.00
Nova Scotia.....	$6.25
Prince Edward Is-land.....	$6.00
Mexico.....	$2.70
Lower California.....	$1.85
British Honduras.....	$3.40
U. S. Columbia.....	$3.80
Venezuela.....	$7.25
British Guiana.....	$3.84
Brazil.....	$4.44
Rio de Janeiro.....	$4.44
Paraguay.....	$4.44
Ecuador.....	$8.00
Bahamas.....	$3.00
Cuba.....	$6.50
Australia.....	$10.50
Victoria.....	$10.50
West Australia.....	$10.50
New Zealand.....	$10.20

Of course deductions from the figures can only be general. They represent various conditions of industrial development, availability of resource, intelligence, civilization and commercial possibilities. It would be puerile to suppose that divergences in wages are the result of a common cause, and as infinitely foolish to suppose, that any effort to fix wages in defiance of economic laws can ever succeed.

How Do You Spell It?

If this story isn't true you can have it out with Mr. Thomas E. Willson, the erudite editor of the New York Weekly World, and he probably would shift the responsibility to the old acquaintance who told it to him. I have forgotten the name or this acquaintance so I will call him Mr. Zloblovnyshchoffski. If I call him Brown, or Jones, or Smith you might think it was funny that I should forget so easy a name. Well, Mr. Z. was one day seated in the writing-room of the Leland Hotel in Springfield, Ill. Several other gentlemen were seated there, too. One was writing, one was reading a newspaper, and others were sitting about smoking, or chatting, or looking out at the windows. Presently the man who was writing looked up and, addressing nobody in particular, said: "How do you spell choir?"

For a moment nobody answered. Then the man who was reading the newspaper asked what kind of a choir he meant.

"A church choir," said the writer. "That is q-u-i-r-e," said the other, and resumed his reading.

There was a little titter about the room and the writer looked up, asking: "Is that right?"

"No," said Mr. Z., with a beg-your-pardon-sir sort of look at the man who was reading; "q-u-i-r-e is right. Q-u-i-r-e does not spell that kind of a choir."

"Well," said the reader, "I've spelt it q-u-i-r-e all my life, and I've got money that says q-u-i-r-e is right."

Now, Mr. Z. had a few talkative dollars in his pocket, too, and he hastened to yank them out. A joint debate was soon settled between $50 of his money and a similar sum which the newspaper reader invited forth from his wallet.

"How shall we settle it?" asked the reader.

"By Webster's dictionary," said Mr. Z.

So they sought the clerk and he found a dictionary for them and there, sure enough, was, "Quire, a body of singers; a chorus; a choir."

Mr. Z. struggled a little, but the terms of the wager were such that he was clearly loser, and after shaking the bottle pretty vigorously, he took his medicine.

About two weeks later Mr. Z. sat in the writing-room of the Palmer House in Chicago. A man was writing. Another man was reading a newspaper.

"How do you spell choir?" asked the writer, addressing the ceiling.

"Mr. Z., who was sitting out of sight, jumped to his feet and said:

"We spell it in Chicago just as we spell it in Springfield."

The jolly jokers then recognized him and, having taken him to the bar-room and sipped up a few bottles of wine at their expense, they confided to him the fact that they had been on the road eleven weeks with that word and had cleared about $500 a week above all expenses.—[Free Press.

It is under the direct supervision of one who is not only an experienced teacher, but also a practical reporter. Each pupil receives individual instruction in all departments, and has actual experience before leaving the school, for which he receives full compensation. Hence its phenomenal success.

THE DENVER REPUBLICAN SAYS THAT:

"The magnificent new sleepers just built at the Pullman shops for the SANTA FE ROUTE, to run between Denver and Chicago, are said to rival anything in the way of sleepers ever seen in the west. The interior is finished in silk plush, but little of the mahogany and cherry wood being visible; while the smoking room and lavatories are finished in the same material, harmoniously blended with hammered brass. It may be a stereotyped phrase to call the new cars rolling palaces, but the appellation is decidedly appropriate. At either end of the cars are beautiful arches of mahogany and so ingenious are the arrangements that one believes he is in an elegant drawing room.

ACCORDING to Mr. Seaples, the rich Hopkins widow proposed to him, he waited a year before accepting her, and then three years before marrying her, so as to be sure the lady knew what she was about. That settles it. No sane woman would have left a big pile of money to such a stupid financier.

THERE is one thing that may be said to the credit of a woman. When

THE farmer who does not read the newspapers is not entitled to much sympathy when he gets swindled by a trick so often exposed as that of the sale of worthless "gold bricks." John Appleman, a farmer of Columbia County, Pa., is the latest victim. He paid $3,500 for gold bricks alleged to be worth $21,000, but which turned out to be made of brass. How a same man could expect to get $21,000 for $3,500 is difficult to understand.

CHICAGO looks with apprehension, as well she may, on the proposed embarkation of Boston in the business of pork-packing. So far as the markets of the world are concerned the "Hub" is not likely to prove a very formidable rival to the great pork-packing center on the shore of Lake Michigan, but it will cut Chicago off forever from the New England demand. And this will be a great loss unless Chicago, with her aptitude for divorces, can procure a divorce of pork from beans.

NOT long ago a line officer in one of her majesty's regiments on duty in Central Africa resigned his position to be made at one stroke Commander-in-chief of an African king and son-in-law to the same party. The army and the bride are both large and very black, and the incentive for such a step is said to have been that the King is immensely wealthy, possessing $15,000,000 worth of diamonds and untold millions worth of other property. And yet the English are having many a sly dig at Americans because a 35-year-old paperhanger married a 70-year-old widow who was very wealthy.

GERTRUDE POTTER, the coy daughter of O. W. Potter, the millionaire Vice President of the Commercial Bank, Chicago, created her last sensation by wedding Julius Clark Daniels, of New York. Gertrude, though yet but a girl, has been married three times; one husband being divorced, another—her present husband—marrying her the second time without ever having procured a divorce. She also at one time fell in love with a newsboy and would have married him, had her father not succeeded in getting the prospective groom into the penitentiary. Gertrude is not a safe toy, and he who allows her beauty and beauty to captivate his affections, is truly "like clay in the hands of the Potter."

THERE is no excuse for the Indiana outrages. The laws can be enforced in every county by the proper officers. There is, therefore, no excuse for the existence of White Caps to insure good order and repress vice and crime. They are lawless scoundrels who commit the outrages with which the State has been disgraced simply to get revenge upon personal enemies or to gratify the impulse of lawlessness, which comes very quickly when a lawless act is permitted to go unpunished. These White Cap scoundrels can be discovered. It is impossible that twenty or thirty men can take a man or woman out of a house and whip him or her without exposing themselves to detection. The evil is growing, and the friends of law and order should organize at once to seek out and punish these cowardly White Caps, who are little or no better than assassins.

HOW FAR upward does the jurisdiction of a court of law extend? We have pretty well-defined notions in this land as to how far out a court may reach in a horizontal way and yank a citizen in, but it is important that we know how high in the air that hand can be stretched in potency. This inquiry is propounded because we learn that the saloon-keepers of Atchison, in prohibition Kansas, have been ordered by the officers of the law to remove their saloons to the upper floors, and that, having done so, the saloon-keepers now enjoy peaceful immunity and their customers, free from restraint, revel in the blessed constitutional privileges of life, liberty, and the pursuit of liquid happiness. If men on the upper floors of Atchison's little buildings are beyond the reach of the State courts, the question is, won't the inhabitants of Chicago's proposed thirty-four-story block be out of the reach of the highest court in the Union? If there is going to be a conflict of authority between us and St. Peter we ought to enter into diplomatic relations with him and find out where we stand.

FRATERNITY AND UNITY.

The North Carolina State Farmers' Alliance, to the Brethren of the North and Northwest.

From the Progressive Farmer.

GREETING: Having turned our backs upon the issues of the dead past, we henceforth look resolutely, earnestly and hopefully to the future, determined upon the discussion and settlement of living issues, involving the rights, liberty and prosperity of the people, we clasp your hands, brethren, hands fraternally and patriotically extended to us, and standing boldly and firmly upon the Ocala demands, we will move unitedly and hopefully to the rescue of our country from the hands of the spoiler, that we may restore the government to the people for whose sole good it was instituted and to whom it belongs.

The above resolutions were unanimously adopted by the North Carolina state alliance at its recent meeting at Morehead. That body was composed of representative North Carolinians, chosen by the members of our order from every county in the state. Similar expressions were given out by each of the state alliances of the south. All of these adopted similar resolutions in 1890. And herein lies the hope and strength of our order. Fraternity and unity between the great industrial elements of the country, without regard to sectional differences or divisions, is the sheet anchor of our safety, not only as an organization, but as a people.

Upon this rock of fraternity we must build. We can never cure the evils which afflict and oppress us by sectional organizations. The patriotic, reasoning, thinking men of the country, realize this important truth. The southern state alliances feel and know its force, hence these declarations. The alliance people of the northern state alliances feel and know its force, hence these declarations. The alliance people of the northern states are equally impressed with it, and hence they meet us fully half way in this great and patriotic work, and heartily reciprocate our advance.

Much concern is manifested by a certain class of partisan papers in the south at the appearance in our midst of certain alliance representatives of our northern brethren. Much indiscreet, not to say unjust criticism has been indulged, and in some instances gross misrepresentations of these brethren have appeared in their columns. It has been charged that they came here at the instance of certain national officials. The above resolution is sufficient warrant for the action of our state authorities in inviting them here. We are glad they came. We are proud of the kindly and fraternal reception so cordially extended to them by our people. We hope they will continue to come, and in increased numbers. It will do us all good. It is significant that a certain class of partisan papers in the north are adopting the same mode of warfare upon our southern brethren who visit that section and preach the gospel of peace and reconciliation. We say to all such papers, quit your fears and cease your unjust and needless criticisms, for you cannot stop or prevent it. The alliance of North Carolina has the right to invite northern speakers here—the alliance of the north has the right to invite southern speakers there, and you cannot prevent it by your officious interference. You give more attention to your own business and you will do and feel better.

The following conversation occurred between Baker and the superintendent while here:

Baker—How are those men going to vote?

Superintendent—All right.

B.—Have you organized labor employed here?

S.—I do not know. I never ask the men whether they are organized or not.

B.—Do you know any men in the works that are followers of these "clammy howlers?"

S.—I never have inquired.

B.—Well, I want you to give notice to the men that if they vote for these cranks we have no place for them. Organized capital of this country is more than a match for foolishness. We have already concluded on a course to pursue that will effectually control these men, who have not money enough in the entire state to run a township campaign.

B.—A very easy one to carry out. Deprive them of employment and destroy their credit. When their backs and bellies come together there will be and monopoly should be eliminated from the policy of the nation, and this must be so.

THE COMING ISSUES.

The following paragraphs are taken from a longer article in the Kansas Farmer, so selected as to give the main features discussed:

What are to be the issues in the contest of 1892?

It is well to ask this question now while the excitement lulls; while the situation may be seen—to use a figurative expression—free from the smoke of the conflict, while passions are not aroused, and while party whips are not chastising every voter who dares to entertain an idea not in strict harmony with the teachings of party dictation.

Even the most superficial review of recent manifestations of public thought renders it certain that the questions on which attention will be fixed, the questions on which the people will desire to express their opinions by their votes, are economic questions, questions affecting the prosperity of those who toil, questions affecting the distribution of the comforts of life, questions affecting the amassing of wealth, questions as to the feeding, clothing, housing, education and enjoyment of 65,000,000 of people.

It transpires that in practical politics, while economic issues may be of chief importance in the estimation and in the discussions of candidates, their statements, their arguments and their conclusions are distorted to fit the particular interests which have promoted their nomination and election.

There can be but slight difference between the economic interests of farmers in two states situated as are Kansas and Missouri. Yet in the campaign of 1890, when an economic question—that of the tariff—was a leading issue, the farmer vote of these states gave excessive majorities on opposite sides of this question, indicating a blind devotion to party leaders and a subservience to partisan prejudice, preventing a fair and candid judgment on the questions at issue.

Now the questions of the next campaign, in which the farmers and all other workers in the United States are interested, are those of the production and the distribution of wealth. The principal divisions will be tariff, money, transportation.

By reason of being both capitalist and laborer, owning his farm and cultivating it, the farmer is in position to give a more impartial consideration to these subjects than can be given to them by other members of community.

It is therefore a matter of great importance not only for the farmers' own interest, but for the interest of the entire people, that now, while the excitement of political warfare is allowed to subside, the farmers consider carefully and discuss thoroughly every branch of economic policy which is likely to become of public interest, with a view to arriving at dispassionate and correct conclusions and to so acting in harmony as to make fair and just measures prominent both before and after election.

THE WEARY RICH.

From the Mechanicsburg, Pa., Farmers' Friend.

The "weary rich" are discussing through the magazines how to dispose of their money. Carnegie suggests that it is better to dispense charities while living. Gladstone proposes a rich men's corporation in which each binds himself to give away annually a certain portion of his income. There always will be room in the world for charity. To multiply provisions for free giving only increases the number of applicants. The gospel among both poor and rich will solve many a vexed problem. "Let him that stole steal no more." The man who steals coal to warm himself and children is not so bad as he who corners wheat and robs every man of a nickel on each sack of flour. One steals contrary to statute, the other according to law. To carry on the present system of commerce, immense combinations of capital are necessary, and there must be men to control them—captains of industry. In 1896 Dinde Disponde, a London merchant, said to the Duke of Burgundy:

"Trade finds its way everywhere and rules the world." With how much more truth can it be said now, when the ends of the earth are brought together and trade knows no day, no night, and in its transactions it outspends the stars in their course. It rules kings and cabinets and bids the churches obey its behests.

GOODBYE.

From the Topeka Journal.

The Shawnee farmers' alliance and the county citizens' alliance held a big farewell demonstration at Lincoln Post hall in honor of the departure of Senator W. A. Peffer and Congressman J. G. Otis and their wives for Washington.

Congressman and Mrs. Otis and Mrs. Peffer were present. Senator Peffer is already in Washington, but he sent a telegram to A. A. Heath, of the Kansas Farmer.

This meeting was planned several months ago, and the committee on arrangements, Mrs. I. W. Pack, Mrs. D. I. Furbeck, Mrs. Clark and Grant McConnell, succeeded in making it the social alliance event of the season.

The large hall was crowded with guests.

The guests were not sent home hungry. In the banquet room a table was spread with 125 plates.

Congressman and Mrs. Otis, accompanied by their daughter Elida and son Willie, have now gone east. Next week they will be at Springfield, Ohio, where the national grange will be in session, and the next week will go to Indianapolis to attend the national alliance, after which they will go to Washington.

Mrs. Peffer will not go to Washington, but will spend the winter in Topeka.

About 300 people attended the reception.

LIBERTY or freedom consists in having an actual share in the appointment of those who frame the laws and who are to be guardians over every man's life, property and peace; for the all of one man is as dear to him as the all of another; and the poor man has an equal right, but more need, to have representatives in the legislature than the rich one. They who have no voice or vote in the electing of representatives do not enjoy liberty, but are absolutely enslaved to those who have votes and to their representatives, for to be enslaved is to have governors whom other men have set over us, and be subject to laws made by the representatives of others, without having had representatives of our own to give consent in our behalf.—Benjamin Franklin.

In 1863 18,000,000 bales of cotton or 25,000,000 tons of bar iron would have paid our national debt. Now that the national debt has been decreased nearly 50 per cent, it would require 30,000,000 bales of cotton or 32,000,000 tons of iron to pay it. Has the debt increased? Oh, no. What's the matter, then? Simply been making an "honest" dollar by crowding into it twice as much cotton, iron, wheat, corn, beef and pork as it had in it twenty-five years ago.—Topeka Tribune.

COTTON BLOSSOM CLUB.

BEAR TRAP GETS IN ITS WICKED WORK.

Several Members Elected and Two Candidates Rejected on Account of Little Peculiarities—A Letter from Bennington—An Attempt to Molest the Club by Judge Callopie Winters.

Club Proceedings.

WHEN the janitor opened Watermelon Hall Saturday afternoon to make ready for the evening gathering he discovered that the big bear trap set under the middle alley window had been sprung. A further investigation proved that the window-sash had been pried up from the outside with a chisel. The miscreant, whoever he was, doubtless intended to fire and destroy the hall, but his evil intentions were defeated by the presence of the trap. He was barefooted, and as he dropped a leg through the window his foot hit the trap. It was a close call for him—so close that the jaws shaved off a piece of his big toenail as they came together. This fragment, which is about the size of an old-fashioned 10-cent shin-plaster, is the only clue left behind, and unless the villain becomes conscience-stricken and reveals his identity he will probably escape detection.

TO BE EXPECTED.—The matter created a great deal of excitement when the members began to gather in the evening. Brother Gardner, Sir Isaac Walpole, Waydown Bebee and others carefully examined the fragment and gave it as their opinion that the former owner was a lopsided colored man with very plaid the President. "All charters granted from Detroit hold good; and all branches will be expected to report at these headquarters."

WILL NOT BE LIABLE.—A communication from Griffin, Ga., stated that Judge Callopie Winters, a prominent colored man of that place, had shot one of his thumbs off while hunting rabbits. His object was to send a dozen rabbits' feet to the Club as a present, and he now proposed to hold the Club financially responsible for his disaster. If the sum of $20 was forwarded to him at once he would get along with one thumb as best he could; if not he would raise the biggest kind of a fuss.

The Secretary was instructed to answer the letter in red ink, and in a very firm hand, and to say that the Cotton Blossom Club would fight the case to the death.

METEOROLOGICAL.—Humidity Jackson, Weather Prophet for the Club, being called on for his report, handed in the following predictions:

"Along about de middle of dis month dar will be great atmospheric disturbances in de Rocky Mountains an' many grizzly ba'rs will be upst and killed."

"About de fust of October look out fur a hurricane which will blow all de ole hats an' pillars out of de winders on Thompson street."

"Dar won't be no aithquakes in October. Dat is, I doan' dun see no signs of any, although it will be jist as well to be on de lookout."

"I predict an airy winter, an' a hard one—not becase I am workin' in a coal yard, but fer de reason dat de goose bone has already begun to turn dark, and becase de co'n-husks am unusually thick."

The report was accepted and placed on file, and Brother Gardner privately instructed Giveadam Jones to ascertain whether the weather prophet got a commission on coal sold to colored people.

TAKES NO RISKS.—Shindig Watkins then arose to ask for information. He was sometimes troubled with neuralgia in the chest. On such occasions his wife prepared hot cider and cayenne pepper for him to drink. On two occasions at least, after drinking this compound and going out on the street, a policeman had regarded him in a peculiar manner and motioned for him to move on. He wanted to ask if, in case he was arrested, charged with having indulged in the flowing bowl, the Club would stand by him and help him prove his innocence.

A HARD WINTER COMING.—"Brudder Watkins," replied the President in a very solemn manner, "dis Club doan' dun take no risks on any of its members. When yo' git dat pain in yo' chist it seems to me dat de best pain would be to put a hot brick on de spot an' stay at home till de pain goes away. If yo' stick to de cider an' pepper yo' must do so at yo' own risk. De Jedge will smell of yo' breaf, and if he am dun satisfied we shan't raise no fuss."

ANOTHER POINT SETTLED.—Pickles Smith also wanted information. In case he traded a blind dog for a shotgun with a colored man in Weehawken and the man afterwards became a member of the Club, would he (Smith) be expected to say that he was sorry and make reparations?

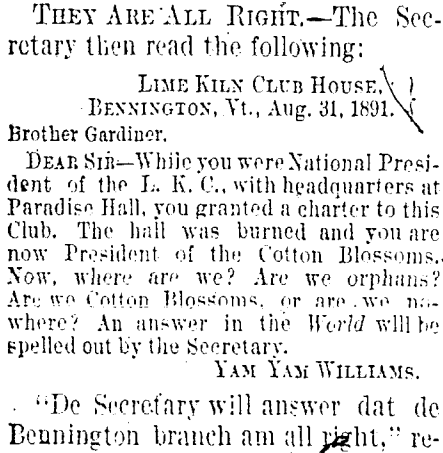

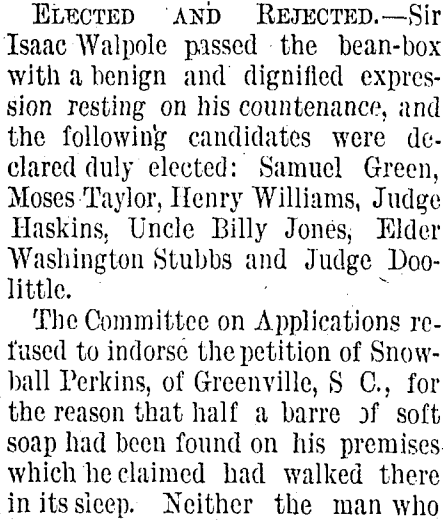

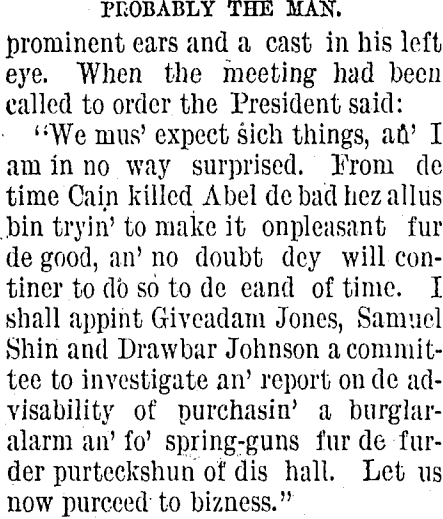

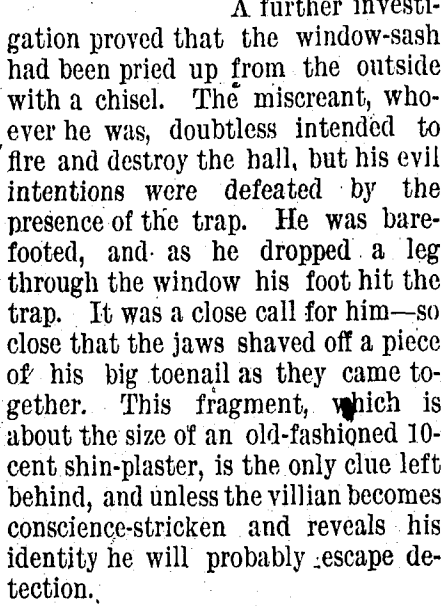

"Skassly, Brudder Smith—skassly," replied the President. "We expect every member of dis Club to feel a fraternal feelin' towards every odder member an' to use him a leetle better dan an outsider; but when it comes down to a trade every pusson mus' look out fur himself. If dar am a member who kin poke a blind dawg off on to me in a trade, or who kin sell me an ole mewl fur de price of a young one, he am at liberty to go ahead an' try it on. We will now abscond de meetin' an' go home."—[New York World.]

Circumventing the Fly. Put a fly on the window, and up he goes toward the top; he cannot be made to walk downward. A St. Louis inventor hit upon an idea. Why not use that habit against them? Forthwith he made a window screen divided in halves. The upper half lapped over the lower, with an inch of space between. As soon as a fly would light on the screen he would proceed to travel upward, and would thus walk straight out-of-doors. On reaching the top or the lower side he would be outside. Not being able to walk down he had no way to return to the room. By this means a room can be quickly cleared of flies, which always seek the light.

THEY ARE ALL RIGHT.—The Secretary then read the following: LIME KILN CLUB HOUSE, BENNINGTON, VT., Aug. 31, 1891.

Brother Gardner, DEAR SIR—While you were National President of the L. K. C., with headquarters at Paradise Hall, you granted a charter to this Club. The hall was burned and you are now President of the Cotton Blossoms. Now, where are we? Are we orphans? Are we Cotton Blossoms, or are we not? where? An answer in the World will be spelled out by the Secretary.

YAM YAM WILLIAMS. "De Secretary will answer dat de Bennington branch am all right," re-

PALMER'S GREAT HOBBY.

Where the World's Fair President Has Laid His Money.

It is a tableaux vivant, a living picture of colonial life in its most attractive phase, this log cabin, the summer home of the Hon. T. W. Palmer, ex-Minister to Spain, and the portly and genial President of the World's Fair. Next to the Spanish baby, the choicest treasure found on another continent, this is the most valued of his possessions. Here he forgets for a time the turmoil of public life and becomes—as he loves to call himself—a horny-handed farmer.

T. W. PALMER.

The farm and cabin are situated on Woodward avenue, about six miles from the center of the city of Detroit. It is a pleasant drive along the platted but only partially occupied future residence part of the city, which the associations of early years have made the Mecca of his wanderings. From Woodward avenue the cabin is reached by a maple-lined driveway skirted to the right by tiers of natural woods, the foliage a perfect study of beautiful coloring, while on the left a willow-fringed stream

Sparkles out among the fern To bicker down the valley.

A rail fence incloses the lawn, a rustic gate opens the way to the well-house, where an old-time bucket gives mute invitation to drink, and who could refuse a draught from such a poet-honored source.

A soft, sinking carpet-like sward slopes from the house to the river. The house is a veritable log house, built in colonial style, and in all the details carefully carrying out the characteristics of the time when our forefathers loyally cried out, "God bless the good Queen Anne." The large front door, divided across the center and opening with a latch, the diamond-paned windows, the water barrels, the kegs lying near the door and suggesting great bumpers of the juice of the apple, all belong to the past. From the benches of the broad porch, over which the woodbine clammers, you get a pleasant view of prosperous country beauty.

Within the house is filled with mementos of Mr. Palmer's childhood. The little chair, the trundle-bed, the old-fashioned toys occupy the places of power, together with the carefully preserved handiwork of his venerated mother. The floors are covered with rag carpet which time has dulled to a tender gray. Grandmother's braided rugs protect the carpets and chintz curtains shade the windows. In the parlor old secretaries and bookcases hold old books and relics, while the antiquated furniture is polished as only our old grandmothers could do it. The straight-backed chairs are adorned with patch-work cushions, and from cords fastened across the raftered ceiling are hung hanks of yarn such as were spun by the good wife's busy hand. In the dining-room a venerable four-poster, valanced and covered with a patchwork quilt, shares the room with the large dining-table. The dash churn and a spinning-wheel, innocent of ribbons or gilding, stand by the hearth. On a shell rests the well-scoured brass kettle in which were compounded all manner of jams and conserves, while fragrant and pungent herbs droop from the ceiling. Antique furniture fills the upper rooms, where ingeniously constructed trap-doors open to hiding-places in case of Indian attack. All through the house is carried out the same thought of the past, and the visitor unconsciously expects to meet some white-capped dame walking with stately dignity through the rooms or greet a rosy-cheeked Ruth or Priscilla hastening backward or forward to the music of the hurrying wheel. But the house, withal so homely, has yet that air of beauty and luxury which only wealth and good taste can give.

Near to the house is a wood of some extent, where a great amount of ingenuity has been exercised. It is as nature made it except for drives that have been cleared through it and made to cross and recross in such a labyrinthine style that the puzzled traveler would be lost but for the many signboards nailed to the trees. By their aid he passes from Surprise avenue to Sassafras lane, from Sylvan avenue to the bower where Senator Palmer has entertained many distinguished guests, who, coming expecting little, have had indifference turned to admiration. One of the features of the lawn is the group of trees planted by Senators who have visited the farm. Among the names of those who have performed the task are some of the most notable of American statesmen.

Jersey avenue leads from the woods to the barns and offices of the farm. The farm has 700 acres, and is in a perfect state of cultivation. If the house is antiquated, all the agricultural operations are carried on with the latest improvements and conveniences. The stables are filled with noble Percheron horses, about 150 in all. Even those that are employed in daily work seem to disdain the earth they tread. The animals in the sale stables are types of massive power and beauty, from the snow-white Anchovite, who for thirty years has been the pride of the farm, to the latest addition, Fenelon, whose jetty form seems a fit dwelling-place for some hero of the Valhalla.

On the farm there is a large herd of Jersey cows, who graze quietly indifferent to the fact that theirs is a long pedigree, and that to possess them means a small fortune; equally careless, too, that Mrs. Palmer should pass them by to lavish her attentions upon the common red cow which is her special pet.

Speculators cast covetous eyes upon this property, and many inducements are offered Mr. Palmer to part with it. One syndicate offered a million for it, but was refused.

"I almost parted with it a short time ago," said Mr. Palmer to a friend, "but I am thankful ever since that I did not, for then I would have been left without a hobby."

What's in a Name?

The physician in charge of an insane asylum in Ohio prescribed a large dose of castor oil for one of the inmates, a man of great strength and wild, unmanageable temper. The attendant who had been commissioned to administer the nauseous dose foresaw that he was likely to find the task more or less difficult, and therefore took with him several assistants. On reaching the lunatic's cell, the attendant put on a matter-of-fact air, and, cup in hand, stepped inside the door. The madman divined his purpose instantly, and rushed furiously upon him. The assistants were too quick for him, however, and, after a severe struggle, threw him down and attempted to pinion his arms. The man fought like a tiger, but found himself overmatched. Suddenly he became perfectly quiet, and, putting his hand to his mouth, said in a whisper to the chief attendant, "Call it oysters." The attendant was a man of great natural shrewdness—as dealers with the insane need to be—and at once understood the lunatic's meaning. Directing the wondering assistants to release the patient, he took the cup from the shelf on which it had been set, approached the crazy man, and said in a tone of ceremonious politeness: "Good-morning, Mr. Smith: will you try this dish of very fine oysters?" The lunatic smiled pleasantly, returned the bow with one still lower, and answered: "Thank you very much; you are very kind." So saying, he took the cup and drained it with every appearance of the deepest satisfaction. "Ah," said he, as he finished the dose and smacked his lips, "those are, indeed, fine—the finest oysters I have ever tasted." He had saved his self-respect and had taught his keepers an excellent lesson in their own line.

Population of India.

The last Indian census shows that in the last ten years the natural growth of India's population has been 27,500,000. The population now numbers 286,000,000. One can hardly appreciate what these figures mean except by comparison. India contains more people than all Europe, exclusive of Russia. Its provinces are as populous as great European states. Bengal contains a population larger than that of the United States and all British North America, and fully one-fifth of the entire human race lives upon this little peninsula jutting out from the coast of Asia into the Indian Ocean.

John Bull at Work on This Side.

Great Britain is going steadily ahead in the work of fortifying the coast line of her American possessions on both sides of the continent. Important fortifications are being built on the British Columbian coast, and the authorities have now decided to place two revolving turrets at the Fort York redoubt at Halifax. One is to be placed at the northern end and one at the southern end of the fort. Each turret will be built of stone and will contain four sixty-ton guns.

DOGS SURPRISING OWNERS.

A man's pride in his dog is one of those things which often exist without cause and only partially die under discouragement that would kill an Apache," said a keen observer of human nature the other day to a New York Tribune man.

"I remember a farmer who lived near us when I was a boy. He had a collie dog that had been in his family for years, a faithful servant and a brave defender. It had a litter of pups, all of which died except one, and the old man persuaded himself that the pup, though it was not by any means of the purest breed, possessed all the virtues of its mother, magnified and intensified a dozen-fold."

"He came over to our house one warm spring day with the shaggy little pup peeking out of his big overcoat pocket and he began to brag about the good qualities of the animal. We boys were always ready for fun, and we had a little black Spanish hen, with a flock of chickens, that was as cross as two sticks. In order to 'chaf' the old man we told him that his pup was no good and that we had a hen who could 'lick' the dog in two rounds."

"The old man's pride was hurt. He took the pup out of his pocket and followed us outdoors to pit him against our hen. My brother drove the hen and her brood up to us and the old man 'sicked' his pup on to her. The hen thought the dog was after her chickens, and with a vicious squawk she dashed around behind him in the twinkling of an eye, and, fastening her strong beak firmly in the long hair of his back, began to beat him so vigorously with her wings, and kick up such a cloud of dust and such a 'bobbery' generally, that the pup, though certainly not hurt, became frightened almost out of his wits at the queer attack, and fled, yelping and howling as if for his life, with the hen still holding on to him for a score of yards."

"The old man could not help but join in the laugh we all enjoyed, but he felt so crestfallen that when he went home he drowned the pup that was 'licked' by a hen."

"I remember, too, an uncle of mine, who owned a farm in another part of the State. We boys used to go and visit him occasionally, and when we did he always cautioned us not by any chance to leave open the gate of a big paddock, where he kept a prize thoroughbred boar, of great size and fierceness, with curling tusks and erect bristles. This boar was the deadly enemy of my uncle's pet dog, a fine beast, a cross between a mastiff and a bloodhound, as heavy almost as a yearling calf, and able to knock a man over as easily as to bark at him."

"This dog and this boar used to make faces at each other, so to speak, through the closely built rail fence that surrounded the paddock. The dog would bark furiously at the boar, and the boar would foam at the mouth and champ his great tusks at the dog. They would both race along the fence like mad, meanwhile looking for any hole or break through which they could get at each other and tear one another to pieces. The fierceness of their aspect used to put the whole family in a tremor sometimes, thinking the dreadful consequences that would follow if a rail some time should be left down or a gate open."

"One day my uncle had caught me in some particularly wicked piece of mischief and had boxed my ears. I resented this assumption of my father's prerogatives so much that I resolved to revenge myself by letting that dog and that boar have a free fight. Accordingly I pulled out an entire rail from one part of the fence surrounding the paddock and lay low to await results."

"Lion, the dog, was away with uncle to the postoffice at the time, and they both came home together. Lion had had no fun that day and he started to have a little chase with the boar, who was waiting and ready for him. Away they went, on either side of the fence, one barking, the other squealing, and both gnashing their teeth. Uncle began calling Lion off, but the dog paid no heed, and soon uncle's anxious eye caught sight of the missing rail. With a shout he started for the spot, but Lion and the boar were bearing down on it at a fearful rate and would certainly get there before he could."

"A cold sweat broke out all over the old man, and his face blanched as he strained every nerve and muscle to prevent the approaching combat, which, if the animals once came together, could not but end in the death of one or both of the valuable combatants."

"But it was no use. The dog and the boar were now rushing along at a furious gait, filling the air with dust and clamor, and scanning with fierce eyes every foot of the fence that separated them. Presently they came to the gate and found themselves at last face to face."

"They stopped, they stared, and then in wild surprise and abject terror of each other turned tail simultaneously and fled like the wind in opposite directions."

"Uncle Zeke breathed a long sigh of relief, but he never valued either of them half so much again."

The Farmer's Wife Purchasing Agency.

We wish to call the attention of our readers to The Purchasing Agency, which is managed with the business department of THE FARMER'S WIFE, having received many requests to establish an institution in this city to meet the demands of our readers in furnishing any article of merchandise, and that such would be appreciated. We are able to announce that arrangements have been perfected. Many of our patrons cannot find just what they want in the smaller towns, and many of them can more easily send by mail than make a pilgrimage to the far-away store. Our feeling in the matter has been justified. Experience has demonstrated the fact that there is a large mail and express trade done in the country. We simply come to our subscribers and offer to do the business for them that others have been doing, providing we can do it satisfactorily. We claim special advantages for our Purchasing Agency. It can be run at such a trifling expense, that we can do work for less margin than is possible, when the agency is the only business. We have no office rental to pay—our present offices affording us ample room; we have no wages to pay; we do our own purchasing; we have no advertising and printing bills to pay—we use our own mediums. Thus we are able to surprise those who give us their trade. We do not fear competition, for we are able to meet it successfully. We are determined to give satisfaction, for by so doing we not only retain the customer's trade, but we wed the customer to our paper, and that is of large importance to us. The family of readers—and a large family it has now become—is invited to use our agency when they can do so to their own interest, and without doing an injustice to any other person or business. We feel confident we can please, and we feel as sure that we can make it profitable to those who order through us. Order anything. There is nothing in the market which we cannot handle.

MRS. EMMA D. PACK, Purchasing Agent.

CHRISTMAS DAY.

GOOD old-fashioned Christmas, with the logs upon the hearth, the table filled with feasters, and the room a-roar 'th mirth. With the stockin's crammed to bustin', an' the modders piled 'th snow— A good old-fashioned Christmas like we had so long ago!

Now that's the thing I'd like to see ag'in afore I die. But Chris'mas in the city here—it's different, oh my! With the crowded hustle-bustle of the slushy, noisy street, an' the scowl upon the faces of the strangers that you meet.

Oh, there's buyin', plenty of it, of a lot o' gorgeous toys; an' it takes a mint o' money to please modern girls and boys. Why, I mind the time a jack-knife an' a toffy-lump for me. Made my little heart an' stockin' jus' chock-full of Chris'mas glee.

An' there's feastin'. Think o' feedin' with the stuck-up city folk! Why, ye have to speak in whispers, an' ye dar'n't crach a joke. Then remember how the tables looked all crowded with your kin, when you couldn't hear a whistle blow across the merry din!

You see I'm so old-fashioned-like I don't care much for style, an' to eat your Chris'mas banquets here I wouldn't go a mile; I'd rather have, like Solomon, a good yard-dinner set. With real old friends, than turtie soup with all the nob's you'd get.

There's my next-door neighbor Gurley—fancy how his brows'd lift! If I'd holler "Merry Christmas! Cought, old fellow, Chris'mas gift!" Lordy-Lord, I'd like to try it! Guess he'd nearly have a fit. Hang this city stiffness, anyways, I can't get used to it.

Then your heart it kept a-swellin' till it nearly bust your side, an' by night your jaws were achin' with your snile four inches wide, an' your enemy, the worst one, you'd just grab his hand and say: "Mabbe, both of us was wrong. John. Come, let's shake. It's Chris'mas day!"

Mighty little Chris'mas spirit seems to dwell 'tween city walls, Where each snowflake brings a soot-flake for a brother as it falls; Mighty little Chris'mas spirit! An' I'm plinn', don't you know, For a good old-fashioned Chris'mas like we had so long ago.

CHRISTMAS ROMANCE.

TWENTY-FIVE years ago this Christmas Dorothy Hope stood before a glass in her own room at her father's house in New England dressing for her wedding. Suddenly she cried: "Oh, you wicked creatures! You, who were my school-mates, willing to marry me to that wretch!"

"Pray, Dorothy, if you do not want to marry Mr. Pulsiver, why did you go so far as to engage yourself to him?" inquired the tallest of the bridesmaids, gravely.

"My father bade me do it, Hester," said Dorothy. "Oh, indeed, he did, but I did not care. I did not know what love was, and the wedding day was set, and I met—"

"Go on. Whom did you meet?" "Charles Pulsiver," sobbed Dorothy. "But he is your bridegroom," broke in the other girls.

"No," said Dorothy. "It is old Mr.

Charles Pulsiver I am to marry. It is his young cousin I met and loved; but he promised to save me, and the hour is a most here and he has not done so. Oh, what shall I do?"

At this moment something struck the window. Dorothy started up, her cheeks all aglow, and drew aside the curtain and threw up the sash. A piece of paper wrapped about a stone lay on the sill. She opened and read:

"Your bridegroom will not come to-night. Don't retire until you hear this signal once more."

She thrust the note into her pocket and turned to the bridesmaids:

Time passed on and no bridegroom appeared to celebrate the pretty Christmas wedding. At midnight the bridesmaids kissed the bride, who had already changed her wedding dress for another, and departed.

The girl waited patiently, and presently heard the signal repeated. The note read:

"As soon as you can, come to me at the side gate under the sycamore."

"Dorothy was not long in complying with this request, and she soon joined her lover, who, with a saddled horse in readiness, was waiting at the place appointed.

"It's two o'clock. What can they want out of a Christmas night in such weather?" said old John, who kept the toll-gate, to his wife. He stepped out and shouted:

"Toll-gate, two pence."

"Here, keep the change," said the horseman, who tossed him a coin and passed through the gate only to halt a little beyond.

"There is some one following us," he said to the girl who rode behind him and clasped her arms around him tightly, "and we had better stand here under the trees until he goes by."

It was young Charles Pulsiver who spoke, and Dorothy Hope who answered. "It may be my father, Charles. If he finds me I am undone."

Then they saw the toll-man hold out his lantern, and heard him cry: "Toll-gate, twopence."

"Here it is, Mr. Tollman!" said an amiable voice, deep-toned but soft. "Poor old toll-man, he's led to a big tree in his park," said Charles, "where a very fierce highwayman in a very fierce mustache overtook him as he rode to his wedding. Meanwhile the mustache is in my pocket. But then, a fair, and so forth."

The tollman had discovered that the last arrival was the minister, who was blatted, and insisted that he might remain all night, which his reverence proceeded to do. The horse was led to the stable and then all was quiet.

"Dorothy, heaven favors us. Here's a parson to marry us. Say nothing, but let me tell him what I please," said Charles, in a whisper, as he helped Dorothy to alight, and taking her by the hand led her to the tollman's door.

"Hello! have you seen a clergyman ride through here?" he asked, as John answered his summons.

"The Rev. Timothy Narro-way would have ridden through," replied the old man, "but the road is beset with highwaymen to-night and I begged him to remain here."

"Sir," said Charles to the Rev. Narro-way, as he appeared, "you went to marry a couple at the house of Mr. Hope, and the bridegroom did not show himself. Have you ever seen Mr. Charles Pulsiver?"

"Never," replied the clergyman. "The girl's father is my friend."

"This is my card," said the young man, drawing one from his pocket. "Mr. Charles Pulsiver," said Mr. Narro-way, reading.

"I am glad to see you; and you, too, Miss Dorothy."

"Sir," said Charles, "I am most unhappy at having been delayed from being present at my wedding to-night, but I have brought my Christmas present with me, hoping to overtake you, and I desire that you should marry us. John and his wife will be our witnesses."

"I shall be very happy to do so," said Mr. Narro-way, "and to turn our misadventure into a romance."

The ceremony was performed in the little back parlor, and the bridegroom had just saluted his bride, when clattering over the bridge and along the road, came two horses with riders who spurred them on in hot haste.

"Tollman John," cried a voice they knew to be Mr. Hope's. "There is trouble at my home," said that gentleman, as he opened the door a moment later, accompanied by the elder Mr. Pulsiver. "Has any woman ridden through the gate to night? I am looking for my daughter," he went on excitedly.

"My dear friend," said Mr. Narro-way, advancing, "it is all right. Your daughter is here. I have just married her to that gallant little gentleman, Mr. Charles Pulsiver, who has brought good luck up to his married life by beginning it on Christmas."

The elder Mr. Pulsiver soon understood the situation, and at once made the best of it.

"Let me be the first to congratulate you," he said, and the two men shook hands.

Lovers of Science.

Every time we strike a match we are indebted to the men who have studied science for the mere love of it, says the Aluminium Age. The men who worked away at coal-tar "just to see what was in it" made the whole world their debtors by discovering alizarin, the coloring principle of madder. And to those men the world is indebted also for aniline, antipyrine, and more than 100 other coal-tar products. Scientists, wondering what was in crude petroleum, found paraffine and vaseline. Pasteur wondered what caused fermentation. He found out, and brought a new era to wine-making.

The singing and dancing of the tea-kettle attracted the attention of a brain, and we have as a consequence all the applications of steam. The swinging of a chandelier in an Italian cathedral before the eyes of young Galileo was the beginning of a train of thought that resulted in the invention of the pendulum, and through it to the perfecting of the measurement of time, and thus its application and use in navigation, astronomic observations, and in a thousand ways we now pass by unnoted, has been of such practical value that the debt to a scientific thought, even in this one instance, can never be known. Science, in its study of abstract truth, is ever giving to man new beginnings. While the devil is engaged in finding mischief for idle hands to do, science is eternally at work finding something useful for them to do.

Annual Meeting of the Kansas E. S. A.

The Woman Suffragists held their annual meeting at the State house in Topeka, the 18th, 19th and 20th of November, with delegates from nearly every part of the State. The meeting was not a mere formality, but to again lay siege to the citadel of the ballot box. Municipal suffrage is not enough. They want a free and unrestricted suffrage; and they will not put up with less than their sisters in Wyoming have secured. After years of labor of the Equal Suffrage society with the legislature, they secured the passage of a bill in 1887 allowing women to vote at municipal and school elections. That was considered quite a victory at that time, but they want more. They want the unqualified right to vote every time the men do.

The address of the president, Laura M. Johns, says among other things:

"The State legislature controls the city government, marks its limitations, and grants its powers. How are women to be satisfied to vote in city system while excluded from voting for the men who make the system? The legislature makes the laws that enter our homes and control our dearest interests. We want to help make legislatures."

Referring to the Prohibition law she said: "Threatened danger to the Prohibition law says to the party of Prohibition: If in the day of your arrogant supremacy you had armed the daughters of the State with the ballot, you would now have a wall of granite upon which the waves of the resubmission movement would waste their fury."

Continuing, she said: "Women have moved forward in journalism. Thirty-four papers are edited by women in our State. Some of these women are publishers and proprietors. Besides these there are thousands of women writers who are building sentiment for our cause, and making votes for us. Ours is a government of newspapers, and women are getting the newspaper."

J. K. Hudson, editor of the Daily Capital, who through courtesy was invited to make a few remarks, took advantage of the situation, and took exceptions to the statement of Mrs. Laura M. Johns, who in her address said: "Suffrage societies and woman's alliances and woman's councils should strive to teach citizenship instead of partizanship. Public service instead of party service should be inculcated and rewarded."

He then said: "If women are partizan and men are partizan it will be possible to carry out reform, but without a party they are powerless to accomplish their object."

He called the Alliance women, which composed nearly one-half of the audience present, calamity howlers, and used language unbecoming a gentleman, who was merely invited to speak on Equal Suffrage. He then took occasion to insult the women of Topeka for the part they took in the Topeka spring election, and charged them with electing a Democratic mayor. Be this as it may, the Prohibition laws of our city have never been enforced better than they are to-day, and the women that voted for Mayor Cofran have never had any reason to be ashamed.

Mrs. Johns in answer says: "I desire to inform Major Hudson that the E. S. A. of Kansas is not quite ready to be turned over to any party."

Mrs. Amanda Way says to Mr. Hudson: "The women will vote just as they please."

Mrs. H. M. Case says: "Mrs. S. A. Thurston, and myself in particular, were members of a citizens' committee of five, which asked all voters in the city to vote for Mr. Cofran for mayor, in the interest of good government, not that we had anything against Mr. Quinton personally, but that we did not want the old Republican ring to have charge of municipal affairs; and we will stand by all we did."

Mrs. S. A. Thurston, president of the Topeka Suffrage Association, was righteously indignant, and said that while she did not care personally what Major Hudson said, it was an odium he was trying to place on the Topeka women, which is unjust. She then went on to show that this banner Republican city of this banner Republican county of this banner Republican State elected a Democratic mayor, because the best men and women of all parties voted for him. If it was not woman's vote it must have been their influence which they now claim would be lost if woman had the right of suffrage.

OFFICERS ELECTED.

Mrs. Laura M. Johns, of Salina, was unanimously elected president. This is the sixth time that she has been elected to the presidency.

Mrs. Noble L. Prentiss, of Newton, was elected vice president, and the following were re-elected: Mrs. Anna C. Wait, recording secretary, Lincoln; Mrs. Elizabeth Hopkins, corresponding secretary, Salina; and Mrs. Martha L. Berry, treasurer, Cawker City. Mrs. H. M. Case of this city was elected district president. Mrs. Johns, Mrs. Case and Mrs. S. A. Thurston were appointed a committee on constitutional revision.

Mrs. Johns is a Republican, Mrs. Wait is People's party, and Mrs. Case is a Democrat; so it can be set down that the E. S. A. of Kansas is non-partisan, and the Major's calamity speech didn't work. The women will always be found battling for their rights, regardless of party.

THE INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE.

To be Held at St. Louis, Feb. 22, Washington's Birthday—The Marthas Will be There.

The industrial organization known as the National Woman's Alliance have decided to take part in the conference, and have selected the following partial list of delegates. The whole list will be published in the January number of the FARMER'S WIFE:

Mrs. M. B. Cloud, Alabama; Mrs. Emma Ghent Curtis, Colorado; Mrs. Annetta Nye, California; Mrs. Marian Todd, Mrs. L. E. Roberts, Illinois; Mrs. Helen Gougar, Indiana; Mrs. Annabella McCoun, Kentucky; Mrs. Mary H. Ford, Mrs. Sue Snyder, Missouri; Mrs. Eva McDonald Valesh, Minnesota; Mrs. S. E. V. Emery, Michigan; Mrs. Elizabeth Rodgers, New Jersey; Mrs. Anna D. Weaver, New York; Mrs. L. D. Stillson, Arkansas; Mrs. E. M. Wardall, South Dakota; Mrs. Alice J. Taylor, Mississippi; Mrs. F. J. Blanchard, New Hampshire; Mrs. C. Estella Bachman, Pennsylvania; Mrs. Mary M. Clardy, Mrs. Bettie Gay, Texas; Mrs. Elizabeth Osborn, Virginia; Mrs. Anna L. Diggs, Mrs. Bina A. Otis, District of Columbia; Mrs. Helen Lockhart, Wisconsin; Mrs. D. F. Pierce, Washington; Mrs. Mary E. Lease, Mrs. Fannie McCormick and Mrs. Emma D. Pack, Kansas; Mrs. Mary A. Shafer, Nebraska; Mrs. Anna Tallman, Oklahoma; Mrs. M. L. Gelfs, Ohio; Mrs. E. M. King, Florida.

F. M. B. A.

The national meeting of the F. M. B. A. endorsed equal suffrage and prohibition. The following are the resolutions:

Resolved, That the right of suffrage is inherent in citizenship, irrespective of sex.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this assembly that we are unalterably opposed to the legalizing of the liquor traffic.

Mrs. MARY E. LEASE, of Kansas, responded to a call from the audience at Indianapolis, and made a few remarks in relation to the woman's side of politics. "Give us an opportunity," she said, "to crystallize our opinions in the form of ballots. No government can be complete without woman, any more than can the home."

GEORGIA is going to tax bachelors. A bill for that purpose has been brought into the Georgia Legislature, and the house committee on hygiene and sanitation has reported it favorably. Under its terms it will cost a Georgian $25 to begin the bachelor business at thirty-five years of age, and on a rising scale of $25 for five years a man of sixty and over will be at the expense of $200 per annum for the privilege of going without a wife.

The Farmer's Wife.

IF our gilt-edged navy officers would mind their own business and never go to sea we'd have more cruisers in our new navy.

THE convicts who escaped from the Idaho penitentiary by simply taking a door off its hinges ought to have left a request that the officials "excuse haste and a bad pen."

A NEW YORK doctor thinks he has discovered that music is a cure for nervousness. Nonsense! It makes almost any man nervous to face the music.

COAL, zinc, lead, etc., have been discovered in Oklahoma. If an artesian well could now be struck with a natural flow of "old budge," what a stampede there would be for the Territory!

AN exchange says: Mrs. Lease, the fiery and eloquent denunciator of soulless corporations and the plutocracy in general, is a woman of superior talents and much capacity for managing. She travels on a railway pass.

WHY is it that horseback riding on Sunday is considered wicked by some people, and riding in a buggy is not? There is certainly nothing more pious in giving a horse a heavy load to haul than in putting a light one on its back.

THE first thing that was done to you when you came into the world was to give you a bath. It will be the last office performed for you when you are dead, and there are some people who look as if they never took a bath between times.

MRS. FRANK LESLIE'S age is given in her marriage license as 38. Two years ago she was said to be 39. This is growing old the other way—getting three years younger every time she gets two years older. It's a paradox, but many ladies do it, somehow.

IT may occur to Dr. Patton that if his Christian brethren were half as anxious to promote Christian influence as they are to tangle him up in his theology the cause of the church would be materially advanced. The great trouble seems to be that there is too much theology and too little Christianity.

THE German socialists dignified their cause a little when they shouted to the extremists "Aus!" which is colloquial Teutonic for "get out." Under the circumstances therefore there is little left for the Anarchists save removal to America where they will be in direct line for the work house or the penitentiary according to their abilities.

THERE is no sensational grief when a woodcove or even a passenger steamer goes to destruction by running aground; but it does seem a little hard for a haval vessel to meet the same fate. One likes to think of our naval defenders as floating till they are sunk in action instead of being run down by a coal barge as the Tallapoosa was or wrecked on a shoal like the Despatch.

TO THE attention of the so-called Sabbath Reform Association—by which phrase is probably meant the Sunday Reform Association—which announces its intention of stopping Sunday newspapers, Sunday trains, Sunday street cars, and other things of that sort, is respectfully commended the interesting and instructive tale of how Mrs. Partington attempted to turn back the Atlantic Ocean with her mop.

A BIG crop of old maids seems imminent, judging from statistics. If the statistics of Great Britain are correct, the excess of women and girls over men and boys in that country is about 900,000, an increase in ten years of about 200,000. In Germany the number of females in excess of males is about 1,000,000. In Sweden and Norway the "weaker sex" is in the majority by about 250,000; in Austro-Hungary by 600,000, and in Denmark by 60,000. In the United States, Canada and Australia the males are in the majority. In this country there are about 1,000,000 more men than women.

THE masher seems to have been recognized as a type among our social eccentrics, and so long as he simply shows his vanity he is harmless. But it appears that there are varieties of the species which are not quite so free from harm. A more despicable personage than the "masher" who flirts in cars and on the street with unwary married women with a view to blackmailing them afterward it would be hard to imagine. Yet it appears that such creatures exist. The re-establishment of the whipping-post would be necessary before society could make the punishment fit the crime in their cases.

IF your heart is not in an undertaking you might as well give it up. There is nothing so provocative of failure as faint-heartedness. Be the undertaking great or small, it will certainly prove futile, unless prosecuted with an earnest ambition. It takes very little to discourage the average individual, very little to turn him from a set determination, yet his life and happiness may depend upon his ability to succeed in the undertaking he contemplates. Persons labor under many different incentives and from widely varied ambitions, yet there are few individuals who enter heart and soul into the tasks they assign themselves. Still this is an essential feature of all enforced effort. No achievement is possible that is not coveted.

IF it is true that the Despatch could have saved herself from the wreck on the Virginia shore if her machinery had not been worn out, and her general equipment poor, we shall have a fine illustration of the penny-wise and pound-foolish policy. The matter will now come up for investigation, and there must be no shielding of responsible parties. No ship of any class should be sent to sea with worn-out boilers. The nation is, perhaps, unduly sensitive about the conduct of the new navy, and the alarm about the Atlanta seems to have been exaggerated. But it was cheering to learn that she had weathered a fifty-hour gale, although the slitting of a hawse-pipe had filled her forward compartment with water. Croakers will now please take back seats.

ONE popular fallacy in connection with fish may be noticed, namely, the oft-repeated assertion that the eating of that particular food increases brain power. No one who has studied the subject can possibly believe the assertion. A man might eat a huge portion of fish every day of his life, and on the day of his death, if the quantity of phosphorus (the brain invigorator) consumed were to become visible, it would not amount to more than might probably suffice to tip a couple of lucifer matches. Communitaries have existed that lived almost solely on fish; but these ichthyophagists were certainly not famous for intellectual attainments. No fishing community has given to the world a great man. Men of mark—poets, preachers, lawyers, warriors, philosophers and physicians—have emanated in Scotland, at any rate, from all classes except the fishing class.

THE Census Bureau has summed up the immigration statistics of the last fifty years, showing that within the half century nearly 15,000,000 foreigners have landed on our shores in addition to the tourists who came with intention to return. During that time the conditions have completely changed. In the pioneer days the journey from Europe took more time, more money, and more courage. Hence it could only be undertaken by the better class of people, whose acquisition was highly desirable. After arrival here the struggle for existence, mostly amid the hardships of pioneer life, developed manhood, with the result that the children of those early immigrants are among the best of our citizens. Now ocean travel is cheap, and the methods of "assisted emigration" have changed the character of the average arrival. He is relatively poorer both in purse and mental stamina. Some good people come here yet, but they are accompanied by paupers, dependents, delinquents, and those physically or mentally incapable of earning a living for themselves. Our immigrants now include many Anarchists and criminals and members of secret societies which have murder in their creed. The great majority of the arrivals now are unskilled in work and below the physical standard of their predecessors. Not only do they depress wages, but they fill the almshouses and the penitentiaries. No one can deny that the continued influx of such people is dangerous to the community.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES VS. THE FARMER.

From the Railroad Trainman's Journal for November.

JUST now it is the policy of certain organs supporting corporation interests to distort and misrepresent facts to the end that the railway employees may combine in opposing the political issues agitated and upheld by the farmers. So clearly is this wool pulling manipulated that in certain parts of the country railroad men have already been induced to organize themselves into clubs for the avowed purpose of fighting the farmers' interests. The main argument used is, that the prosperity of railroad corporations is threatened by the reform proposed by the alliance, and that the wages of employees are influenced by the receipts of the employer. This latter is obviously untrue, and the fact that the idea is advanced by organs which are pledged to the support of corporation principles should be sufficient warning to the railroad employees. Wages are adjusted by the ratio of supply and demand of skilled labor and not by the profits of the employer. To make this fact perfectly plain, it is only necessary for the reader to call to mind the most prosperous business firms with which he is familiar, and compare the rates of wages paid with those of less prosperous firms. He will find that in the same city the millionaire merchant pays the same wages as the trembler upon the verge of bankruptcy. So it is in railroad matters, the prosperous road pays no more than the road which is running upon an unprofitable basis. It is, of course, to the interest of a corporation to hire its help as cheaply as possible, but the laboring man of to-day is in a position to say to any employer, "This is the standard rate of pay and I will work for no less." The farmer has no interest in lowering the wages of the workingman; in fact, it is for his best interest to raise them. The farmer is, to an extent, the producer of the common necessities which the laboring man consumes. The wages of the workingman mean more profits to the farmer, and better facilities for the farmer mean cheaper products to sell to the laborer. The harder it is for the farmer to pay his debts the more profit he wishes to make from his farm products. That some of these farm products must pass through the hands of a manufacturer makes more remote, but does not alter, the mutual relations of the farmer and the laborer. The railroad man should not be deceived into the belief that in helping a railroad corporation he is helping himself. He stands in just the same position toward political principles as the man who handles the trowel. He is a wage-earner, just as they are, and will find that his dollar purchases no more than theirs, though the dollar of his corporation is inflated to purchase twice as much. Let the railroad men unite heartily with the farmer in demanding such laws as will give his labor the greatest purchasing power.

COLONIAL BILLS OF CREDIT.

By an English Writer.

THIS was the monetary system under which the American colonists prospered to such an extent that Burk said of them, "Nothing in the history of the world is like their progress." It was a wise and beneficial system, and its effects were most conducive to the happiness of the people. Take the case of a family, industrious and enterprising, driven by persecution or misfortune to seek a refuge in the wilds of the new world. With their scanty means they purchase a tract of land. Many years of hard labor, privation and anxiety would have been necessary to bring that family into a state of decent competency, had they been required to purchase gold and silver by labor and by the produce of labor before they could effect the improvements of their property. But half the value of his land was advanced to the head of the family in notes which circulated as money. With these notes he could hire labor and purchase implements of husbandry, and cattle; and thus where, without the notes, one acre of land could be cleared, cultivated and stocked in a year, ten would, by the assistance of the paper money advanced, be reclaimed from the forest and rendered productive. Thus hope entered the dwelling of the poor emigrant. Ten years found him with the whole of his debt to the government discharged, the proprietor of a happy home. And the kind hand of a paternal government was stretched out still, to advance to him again one-half the increased value of his land, and thus enabled him to clear more of the forest and to settle his children in new homes. Such was the system by which "a set of miserable outcasts" were converted, in a short space of time, into happy, contented and prosperous colonists. * * * In an evil hour the British government took away from America its "representative money," commanded that no more paper "bills of credit should be issued, and that they should cease to be legal tender," and collected the taxes in hard silver. This was in 1773. Now mark the consequences. This contraction of the circulating medium paralyzed all the industrial energies of the people. Ruin seized upon these once flourishing colonies; the most severe distress was brought home to every interest and every family; discontent was urged on to desperation, till, at last, "human nature," as Dr. Johnson phrases it, "arose and asserted its rights." In 1775 the congress first met in Philadelphia. In 1776 America became an independent state.

BONDS OR WEALTH, WHICH.

From the Anderson, S. C., People's Advocate.

THAT there is a change necessary in our financial system, and that there is urgent necessity for an increase in the amount of currency in circulation, seems to be admitted by all classes, by private citizens as well as by public officers, by the press and people, and by many of our senators and representatives in congress. But just here the point of divergence begins, as to the means by which the desired end shall be accomplished. Senator Butler, in his speech at Prosperity and Batesburg, dwelt strongly upon the idea of removing the 10 per cent tax on state banks and allowing them to issue currency two dollars for every one of capital. Congressman Tillman has also suggested the same thing, but both seem to forget or ignore the past experience of the country with state banks of issue. But now comes Congressman Hemphill in his recent Lancaster speech, and proposes that this 10 per cent tax be removed and that these banks be allowed to issue currency based upon state and county bonds as a basis. This is the underlying principle of the national banking system, and appears to us faulty and vicious, because it permits the state to back upon the evidence of its debt and not upon its wealth. Why should this be done? Why is it necessary to have bonds as a basis of circulation? Why should the state issue currency based upon what it owes? This appears to be a very anomalous way of doing business and not according to sound business principles. No private individual would even think, much less attempt, to do business based upon his debts, for if he did he would be thought to be a fit subject for the lunatic asylum, and no more can we see any reason why the government should issue currency based upon its debts than the individual should do business upon his debts. The greater the wealth and property of the individual, the larger and safer business he may do, and as the government is behind all wealth and has the power to tax it, why not issue a currency based directly upon that wealth? And why not issue it directly to the people who hold that wealth? Why should it be necessary to issue a bond, an evidence of a lien upon that wealth, before a dollar can be put in circulation?

CONCERNED ABOUT HIS POLICY.

From the Montgomery, Ala., Alliance Herald.

DEMOCRACY, to the machine politician, simply means office. The people are not particularly interested in what individual shall hold office, but they are interested and concerned about what policy that officer shall pursue. They ask and demand relief from their burdens, and they want men in office in accord with that purpose. That is true democracy—a party of the people and for the people, and not a party of politicians for office and the advancement of the interests of office-holders. This matter ought to be understood and acted upon by every voter with the interest of his country at heart.

WERE GOOD FOR TEN YEARS.

From the History of the Isle of Guernsey.

AFTER the fall of Napoleon, the treaty settling the land steals between France and the other monarchies of Europe omitted to mention the island of Guernsey, in the English channel, and for a time that little island with its 30,000 inhabitants, its 14,000 acres, and its wealth of £4,000,000 was practically independent. The people wanted a market house. They had no money; they called on the governor for aid. Measures were taken at once for the issue of notes by authority of the law-making body. The estimated cost of the market was £4,000. Four thousand 1-pound notes were issued. These were paid to the contractor as the work proceeded. With these he paid wages of those employed. They in turn gave them to the shop-keepers or goods, the shop-keepers gave them to their landlords for rent, and they again distributed them among society. In due season the market was completed. It contained eighty shops which were let to butchers at $5 per year; so the annual rental was £400 pounds. At the end of the first year the £400 which had helped build the market, having been re-received as rent by the states who were the owners of the national building reared up with national money, were burnt in the presence of the official authorities. The operation was continued from year to year for ten years, at the expiration of which period all the notes were redeemed, and, being cancelled, of course passed out of existence. But the annual rent did not cease. It exists to this day, and is applied to local improvements. Thus a substantial reality was created out of a symbol, for it is plain the market did not cost a farthing to any one of the Guernsey people. In the same manner bridges, railways and canals may be constructed without costing a farthing of interest.

PEOPLE'S PARTY VOTE.

TOPEKA, J. C. Hibbard, the people's party statistician, is preparing for publication in the reform papers a statement of the vote cast in Kansas at the fall elections. He has heard from ninety-seven of the 106 counties, and the showing is remarkable. The only counties yet to be heard from are Stevens, Garfield, Stanton, Seward, Kearney, Trego, Logan, Hodgeman and Ness, and in these counties less than 5,000 votes were cast. Mr. Hibbard has taken the average people's party vote for the county officers in each county and compared it with the vote for the people's candidate for secretary of state last fall. The returns footed up show that, instead of losing, the people's party polled 3,000 more votes in an off year than were cast for Willis, their candidate for governor, last fall, and only 8,000 votes less than were cast for their candidate for secretary of state. This was done with a falling off in the total vote of more than 30,000.

The average vote cast this year is 106,972 for the people's party candidates. Although the straight democratic vote cast has not been fully compiled, it will be less than 30,000. The returns have surprised even the most sanguine of the people's party leaders. Each county's vote will be published in the reform papers with the per cent of the people's party vote this fall as compared with last. On the whole, it will show an increase in the people's party vote of 5 per cent. Mr. Hibbard stated that the people's party vote had been increased in the counties in which it had polled a comparatively small vote last fall, while in many counties where the people's party swept everything last fall, its vote was greatly decreased.

HOW LARGE FORTUNE'S ARE MADE.

From the Beatrice, Neb., Arbor State.

THE argument that even the poorest man might become wealthy by saving from his scanty income may hold good if it be "wealthy means to possess, say $10,000 or $20,000." But large fortunes cannot be and never have been accumulated from the savings of any one man's labor, who did not employ other men or acquired land or other property bearing interest or returning rent. Large fortunes have invariably been created by the labor of men other than he who came into their possession. It is this fundamental wrong which the labor movement is striving to correct.

SOMETHING TO THINK ABOUT.

From the Boston Advertiser.

IS America passing into the hands of aliens? Nearly 30,000,000 acres owned by aliens. More than 21,000,000 under the direct control and management of thirty foreign individuals or companies.

THE New York World warns the democracy of the socialistic features of the alliance, while "The People," the leading socialistic paper in the country is abusing the alliance because it has no socialistic tendencies.

Mrs. Emma D. Pack, Editor,

The patient hen does all the work,
The rooster does the crowing;
Some women, too, toil like a Turk,
While the men do all the blowing.
LET 1892 be a year of rejoicing,
AND a year of advancement.

LET the voice of women be heard all over the land,
AND universal suffrage be heard from every rostrum.

ENDORSE and encourage no man for office who is opposed to equal suffrage.
THE Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union of California have endorsed equal suffrage.

OHIO places an equal suffrage plank in their platform.

THE Kansas Farmers' Alliance and People's party favor woman suffrage.

THE W. C. T. U. and the E. S. A. women of California endorse the Farmers' Alliance, and were represented at their meeting, and so the good work goes on. Let every true woman buckle on the armor and fight for our noble cause.

THE kindest men and causes are treated with contempt, as reforms, truths, rights, etc.

They are ridiculed through misrepresentation and misunderstanding of their nature and aims.

But true virtue and aims are always right, no matter how much sacrifice they cost.

Many may be suffering in innocence, but it is far better than successful guilt.

Men cannot throw upon women the guilt of their unjust laws.

Let the women take advantage by the unwise mistakes of their brothers, and do good to all alike.

"Our debts stand for our prosperity," says the Kansas Republican League. We can't understand how a man can owe everybody and still be prosperous, unless he runs in debt in his own name and keeps all of his effects in his wife's name.

THE women will be at the February 22d meeting at St. Louis, and will take a hand in shaping the platform which will lead the grand army of reform on to victory.

Mrs. JOHN A. LOGAN says there will be an early dissolution of the Republican party unless there is a reform in the ranks and she has not been called a calamity howler either.

HEAVEN and earth created he them, and after due deliberation he made man. After looking him over he said, I can do better even than that, so he caused the man to sleep, took one of his ribs and made woman, and he was so well pleased with her that there has been more women than men in the world ever since. Hon. Jere Simpson says it was the best job he ever done.

UNITED STATES SENATOR PEPPER says: "At the dawn of the twentieth century, the United States will be governed by the people that live in them. When that good time comes, women will vote and men quit drinking."

AN Illinois legislator recently asked Sister Helen Gougar if, "When you women get to vote, if we get into war, will you help us to fight it out?" no doubt thinking he had extinguished the woman before him. Those who know Mrs. Gougar can almost hear her voice in the reply, "We think it quite as important to have the boy brought up right, as it is to make preparations to shoot him." It is needless to say the legislator was speechless.

Mrs. SARAH C. SANFORD, of California, in a letter referring to the People's party convention in that State, says: "During the report of the resolution committee great enthusiasm prevailed. The eighth plank, 'We are opposed to the saloon and liquor business in all its forms,' was received with great cheering, but the tenth, 'We hold that no citizen of the United States should be deprived of the electoral franchise on account of sex,' called down a perfect storm of applause. Amid the wildest enthusiasm the platform was adopted as a whole, without a dissenting voice. Old men stood on chairs and shouted themselves hoarse, while hankerschiefs of the women fluttered all over the house. The piano struck up 'America,' and we all joined with a vim." Speaking on the ballot, she told how man as he rose in civilization defended himself with the ballot in place of brute force, and she said that woman needs something to protect her besides her finger nails and broomsticks; and she thought the day was not far distant when the ballot would be given to woman to convert it into the ballot of the people.

JULIAN HAWTHORNE says American magazines are "polished, unobjectionable and worthless." It is needless to say Julian is not a subscriber to the FARMER'S WIFE.

IN writing to an unmarried woman upon formal or business matters she should be addressed as "Dear Madam" rather than "Dear Miss." The use of "Miss" without the name is inelegant.

WHAT can be thought of men calling themselves civilized and decent, and living in an enlightened Eastern State, who will tar and feather a girl of eighteen and turn her out on a cold night in a public highway without clothing? There are reform schools, there are prison reformatories, there is law enough in any county of the Union to properly punish a girl of that age, no matter what her crimes may be. The day may come when these men will not be proud of their exploit.

I DO NOT blame men for their past tyranny and injustice, nor do I blame women for their abjectness and indifference. These are our inheritance from the barbaric past. As soon as there were women in any number strong enough to appreciate freedom and strive for it, there were men generous enough to help them. The demands that women make for recognition and opportunity find a response in the sense of justice that lies in each man's heart, and the same spirit that prompts her to ask moves him to give. In this way has the present advantageous condition of women been reached, and in this way the large-hearted of either sex will work together until a full and complete justice is established. Margaret Fuller said: "Man is not willingly ungenerous; he lacks faith and love because he is not yet himself an elevated being. He cries with sneering skepticism, 'give us a sign,' but if the sign appears, his eyes glisten and he offers not only appreciation but homage."

THIRTY years ago the women lost an opportunity when the word "white" was stricken from the Constitution; the word "male" should also have been erased. We do not blame the women so much as we do the men that were in sympathy with our cause. That this was not done, but another golden opportunity awaits us:

The time has come—
It is here now;
Let our lawmakers take warning,
The women will vote.

Let the women of all classes and conditions make a vote, and here and now resolve that they will no longer be robbed of their enfranchisement. Sound the alarm; get ready for the work. The people are supreme. Our legislators must not be listless and inactive. They must awaken to the demands of womankind or they will arise in their might and the robe and honor of office will be taken from you. You must give voice to the demands of truth, right and justice—equal right to all, regardless of sex. Yes, the women are in it for 1892. They come demanding; will you hearken unto them.

Have you founded your thrones and altars there, On the bodies and souls of living men? And think ye that building shall endure? What equal sufferings can cure?

We hear over and over again that women must be educated before they can vote. That, to be sure, is a very important step. But, pray tell, who takes it upon themselves to look after the education of the poor foreigners who are unloaded in New York by the ship-load; and, by the way, who are looking after the education of numbers untold in every city, and all over the entire country, who can neither read nor write, that walks boldly to the polls and cast their ballot, not knowing by their own reading who they are voting for.

MISS AMANDA WAY says women will vote first as they please. That is the way they have been doing in Topeka in the past, and will continue to do so in the future. The time has passed for politicians to place a candidate in the field and say to the women, "You must vote for the one we tell you to."

SOME say women make so many mistakes in voting. Do they? Are they the only ones who make mistakes? Give women the opportunities that men have to inform themselves, and they would excel them in many ways.

We are tired of hearing the cry of intemperance. Let the men who have the love of the cause so near at heart work for universal suffrage, and the women will forever settle the question for them.

WHAT if the Democrats, Republicans and People's party should all put an equal suffrage plank in their platforms, then I guess we would vote; and then if they should occasionally give the women an office—whew! if—if—if—Dear me, how confused we get.

WHY should not mothers be interested in this the most important campaign of years, whose heart is wearing with anguish, like a mother's, as she gathers her little ones around her, knowing full well that soon they will be driven from home by the cruel fiend, the mortgage; and as she lifts her voice to heaven, she cries out in her misery and woe, "Lord, have mercy upon them."

THE NATIONAL WOMAN'S ALLIANCE

Endorsed by the National Conference of the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union.

Resolved, That we endorse most heartily the educational bureau recently established, known as the National Woman's Alliance, which has for its objects the education of women on economic questions and of placing reform literature within reach of all the people. [THE FARMER'S WIFE is the official organ.]

A conference of Alliance women was held at the parlors of Hotel English, and after discussing various methods of educational work a committee was appointed to recommend several lists of books for public libraries. The committee consisted of Mrs. Marian Todd, Mrs. E. V. S. Emery, Mrs. B. A. Clover, Mrs. Bettie Gay and Mrs. Annie Vincent.

Mrs. HELEN GOUGAR says: "I visited the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union at Indianapolis, as fraternal delegate for the N. W. C. T. U., and was most kindly and enthusiastically received. I find a determination, deep-seated and uncompromising, to wheel the People's party into line for Woman Suffrage and Prohibition, and I don't believe that there will be any flinching at the February conference. The decision of the F. M. B. A. and of the F. A. and I. U. to enter the party is of momentous importance. I see in the near future a party in which we can all unite. Wouldn't it be glorious to fight in such a phalanx in 1892? I believe we will do it. You cannot get the slightest idea of the abominable lying of the old party press about this Indianapolis gathering, except as one was there to see the opposite to the reports. All was peace, harmony, dignity and patriotism. I wish that the annual address of Colonel Polk could be published in full in all our papers. The reform elements must get together in 1892, and we can if we will."

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO, Nov. 23.—(Special Correspondence).—The Ohio State Grange, which has been in session during the past week in this city, adopted the following resolution by a unanimous vote:

We declare the traffic in intoxicating liquors an evil that is the prolific source of poverty, crime, and wretchedness, and that any revenue that can be collected from it sinks into insignificance in comparison with its enormous cost and resultant evils. We therefore declare that all legislation should be for the total suppression of the traffic.

A resolution was also passed endorsing woman's suffrage.

We wonder when the men will decide whether their wives are a part of the people or not? And if not, who are they? The inquisitive women are anxious to have them make the decision soon.

Yes, the women are organizing, and "for what?" do you say. By organizing we proclaim to the world that we demand our freedom.

THE Woman's Column of Boston tells us that Mayor Grant of New York has declared that he will not appoint any more women on the school board. We read and re-read the article, and after reading and carefully reflecting upon it, we thought, could it be possible that a man like Mayor Grant could be so blinded to a sense of duty and justice as to exclude mothers from such an important office. Who has the welfare of the schools so near the heart as the mother? Who will exert themselves and use all honorable means to place at the head of our schools true Christian men and women than the mothers? Who works any more hours and harder to pay school taxes than the mothers? We ask, who is any more capable of holding the office than the intelligent mothers all over the land. No one will guard the interests of their children as mothers. Then why rob them of the right? We say to the wives and mothers of New York, stand together and resent the insult of Mayor Grant. "In union there is strength," and we take the liberty of saying to Mayor Grant: Beware! even great men like you have made mistakes. There is an end to woman's patience. This time is fast approaching when the voice of woman will be listened to, and she will have the privilege of saying who shall make the laws that she obeys.

A Word to the Little Ones.

DEAR CHILDREN: Another Merry Christmas is very near at hand, and I just want to tell you a little about the many merry ones I have had (as well as some very sad ones, but of those I will not speak). The very happiest ones I ever spent was in my youth, when father, mother, brothers and sisters were all at home, when the family circle was unbroken.

Ah! it was then the cup was full; but then I could not realize my happiness. I longed to grow up to womanhood. Youth could not be content with freedom, with no care, naught but pure unalloyed happiness. But now, when Christmas comes, my mind wanders back to my childhood home, between the hills of Pennsylvania. I can see dear, patient mother, as she assigns a place for each stocking. And I think I can see father, with his hand before his face, listening to our prattle about "Santa Claus," and begging of him to leave just one door open for Santa to come in at; and we are told that we must go to bed very early that evening, for Santa will never come while we are up. And so we go to bed, to dream of Santa and his Reindeers.

And very early in the morning we were up looking for our stockings; sometimes we found them, and sometimes we did not. And often some one of us would give way to tears of disappointment; perhaps Santa had left another a toy that we coveted. But soon weeping was changed to laughing—no sorrow for the children on Christmas. With candies, nuts and toys, and a nice dinner, as only mother could get up, our happiness was complete.

But now, where are the parents who planned Merry Christmas for us? Sleeping in the grave; and sisters and brothers, too, who then were of the number, are numbered with the dead. Those of us who have been spared are scattered. All have homes and little ones to make happy on Christmas. But when I see a cloud of disappointment flit across the children's face, I wonder if it grieved my parents when we showed signs of discontent, after all their planning to make us happy.

My dear children, if you have father, mother, brothers and sisters around you; if your home has never been visited by the angel of death, be thankful. Father and mother is more than all else. This may be the last Christmas that you will have together, so let it be a merry one. Let nothing mar your happiness. Youth is your sweetest time; no care, free as the birds. You may not see it now, but as you grow to manhood and womanhood, you will look back and wish for one childhood Christmas. But childhood goes, never to return. So, my dear children, be youthful as long as you can. Age will creep upon you ere you are aware, and with it comes cares and sorrow; and often you will weep over your childhood days when you think of the lost opportunities for happiness.

I will close by wishing you all a Merry Christmas and happy New Year, and begging you not to trust to the world alone for your happiness. Learn in youth to look above, for when bitter troubles come, earthly friends will fail you, but your Heavenly Father never! So in youth, when all is merry, put your trust in heaven, and then when trouble comes you will feel that you have some one to lean on, and in the assurance of a dear friend your trouble will be lighter, and soon the rays of the sun will shine bright again.

Money in Cabbage and Celery.
"Blood will tell." (33.) crops cannot be grown with poor strains of seed. For sixteen years Tillinghast's Puget Sound Cabbage Cauliflower and Celery Seeds have been gaining in popularity. The most extensive growers all over the Union now consider them the best in the world. A catalogue giving full particulars regarding them will be sent free to any one interested. When writing for it enclose 20 cents in silver, or postage stamps, and we will also send "HOW TO GROW CABBAGE AND CELERY," a book worth its weight in gold to any grower who has never read it. A SELFISH TRAVELER.

Forced to Give Up Seat Retained Through Lying.

The subject of the ethics of politeness as manifested by travelers in yielding or retaining their seats forms a never-ending topic of conversation among those who have occasion to study the various phases of the problem, says the New York Herald.

In connection with the subject a commercial traveler gives an illustration of an event that recently came to his attention. It occurred one day last autumn on an accommodation train running on the Pennsylvania railroad, between Columbus, Ohio, and Indianapolis, and was as follows:

"The train was entirely inadequate to accommodate the travelers," said the speaker. "It had come through from Pittsburgh, and the passenger-car was already well filled when I entered it at Columbus. There were but few vacant places.

"The first seat I espied was by the side of one of those human hogs that one encounters more frequently upon railroad trains than anywhere else. He had carefully spread his overcoat, gripsack, and sundry other articles on the seat by his side so as to make it inaccessible to another passenger.

"I did not like the man's looks, but as the car was crowded I approached him to ask if the seat was taken. Before I could put the question he looked up and said gruffly: 'This seat is taken, sir.' I was rather surprised at his adding the word 'sir,' and I knew that he lied when he made the other statement. However, it did not trouble me much as I soon found an unoccupied place.

"While I journeyed along I heard the hog tell fifteen separate distinct lies in order to retain the entire seat. He varied the formula somewhat. At one time it was a wave of the hand and a glance at the rear of the train to indicate that the occupant of the seat was in the smoking-car. Another time, to the inquiry of a mild-mannered and timid questioner, he replied with a stolid stare.

"I was tempted to crawl behind him, to call him a liar, and then thrash him. I did nothing of the sort, however, and eventually I had my revenge.

"It came in the shape of a big, red-faced countryman, who boarded the train at a way station. The newcomer weighed fully 250 pounds, and from his soiled clothing I judged he worked in a slaughter-house or something equally savory.

"As luck would have it, the only vacant seat was the one beside the selfish hog. As the other human porcine halted, the guardian of the latter said: 'This seat is—'

"That's all right," said the sweet-smelling heavy-weight as he plumped himself with a thud beside the occupant. 'I guess I'll keep it till the other fellow comes along.'

"Our selfish traveler started to bluster, but the red-faced ruffian soon took that out of him by sundry threats of violence.

"After awhile the second barbarian grew good-humored. He told funny (?) anecdotes and poked the first hog in the ribs, as he himself went off with long-continued rounds of coarse laughter. He wanted to know where his companion came from and where he was going. He spat tobacco juice across him out of the window, or expectorated on the floor near the first traveler's effects.

"It was easy to see that the original hog was about the most miserable man in the world.

"At last the latter could stand it no longer. He crawled out of the seat, gathered up his traps, and entered the smoking-car, where for forty miles he alternated between standing and occupying a most uncomfortable seat on a woodbox."

Telephone Complications.

One of the young ladies at the telephone central office has a singularly pleasing voice, and it is just possible that her features just match it, says the Brooklyn Life. It is just as well right here to give the reader to understand that no names are to be mentioned; they are suppressed in the interest of a gentleman who holds a public office and was talked of for mayor. His clerk, who usually did the telephoning, never spoke to the central office girl without a term of endearment. The discussion over the wires generally began with: "Is that you, dear?" and wound up with: "Good-by, darling!" In the absence of the clerk the distinguished public man went to the telephone in person, Central promptly answered, and failing to recognize the voice asked, "Is that you, dear?" "No, darling," responded the distinguished public man, "it's the other fellow." It is the good fortune of some wives to make their appearance just in the nick of the most exasperating time. That is what happened in this instance. Behind the distinguished public man when he said "No, darling, it's the other fellow," stood his wife, who had concluded to visit her husband that morning. She startled him by exclaiming: "Well, I like that!" Did she?

"What brand of cigars do you generally smoke?" "The brand I buy myself."

CHRISTMAS DAY.

WHAT'S this hurry, what's this hurry. All throughout the house to-day? Everywhere a merry scurry, Everywhere a sound of play. Something, too, 's the matter, matter, Out-of-doors, as well as in, For the bell goes clatter, clatter, Every minute—such a din!

Everybody winking, blinking, In a queer, mysterious way; What on earth can they be thinking, What on earth can be to pay! Bobby peeping o'er the stairway, Bursts into a little shout; Kiddy, too, is in a fair way, Where she hides, to giggle out.

As the bell goes cling-a-ling-ling Every minute more and more, And swift feet go springing, springing, Through the hall-way to the door, Where a glimpse of box and packet, And a little rustle, rustle, Make such sight and sound and racket—Such a jolly bustle, bustle—That the youngsters in their places, Hiding slyly out of sight, All at once show shingling faces, All at once scream with delight.

Go and ask them what's the matter—What the fun outside and in—What the meaning of the clatter, What the bustle and the din. Hear them, hear them laugh and shout then, All together hear them say, "Why, what have you been about, then, Not to know it's Christmas Day?"

he deposited his burden on the spacious hearth, where a huge fire was already blazing, and began to pile on the long, dry sticks of beech and hickory until in a few moments a perfect sheet of flame was roaring up the wide-throated chimney.

Grandma Botsworth, who sat in her accustomed corner by the "jamb," busy with her knitting, made no reply, while Uncle Billy proceeded to remove his coat, hat and boots, and, having filled and lighted his pipe, sat down to enjoy himself. Outside a furious snow storm was raging, and already the earth was heavily carpeted with white. Presently his two sons, Jacob and Milton, came in from doing up the chores, and like their father, were soon divested of caps, coats and boots, and seated before the rousing fire talking over the events of the day.

A little later Mrs. Botsworth joined them, and then the family circle was complete. No, not complete, either: a daughter was missing. Three years ago this Christmas eve she had gone out from the parental roof to marry the man she loved, but whom her father had forbidden some time before to enter his doors. But Mary had gone; and she and her husband, a poor mechanic, went out West to build up for themselves a home and fortune. After they were married, a day or two before they were to start for Dakota, Mary and her husband drove to the old home, where she got out of the buggy and started to go into the house to say good-by. She did not ask nor expect forgiveness from her father for what she had done; but she knew her mother and her brothers still loved her, and would gladly have her come to see them. So she just had her hand on the latch, and, with tear-filled eyes, was taking in the dear and familiar surroundings, when her father, coming round the corner of the house, saw her. "Don't yer come in here," he yelled, hoarsely. "Don't step your foot inside 'o that gate, Mary Ellen Botsworth. You're no darter 'o mine. Take yer hatchet-faced paint-slinger an' git."

For a moment she stood as if stunned at his words; then, without a word, turned and went to the buggy. Her husband helped her in, and then, standing up and shaking his whip at Uncle Billy, said: "Bill Botsworth, if you wasn't my wife's father, I'd thrash you till you couldn't walk for a week. You obect to me for a son-in-law only because I am poor; but I'll see the day I can buy an' sell you 's if you was a back, darn you."

Here Mary laid her hand on his arm and said, "Stop, Will; it won't help things any to quarrel; let's go." It was well that Will heeded her advice, for old Uncle Billy had started for the buggy with murder in his eye; and there is no telling what might have happened had not Milton and Jacob at this juncture made their appearance and urged him to be quiet.

So Mary went from home an' around; and, as the buggy disappeared about the bend in the road, Milton turned to his father, and, with tears in his eyes, said, reproachfully: "Pap, you oughter have done it."

And Mrs. Botsworth, who had come to the door just in time to take in the affair, echoed her son's words: "No, pap, you was too hasty," she added. "Mary Ellen was allus a mighty good girl; an', though I'd ruther she'd not a married Will Konney, yet I hope the Lord will prosper them both."

"You are right, mother," said Jacob, the elder of her sons, "you are right, mother." "Filsey" (the nickname the boys had bestowed upon Mary when she was a toddler) was the best girl in Indiana; kind an' lovin', an' a sister worth the havin'.

As for Uncle Billy, seeing his whole family up in arms against him, he vouchsafed no reply, but turning, strode rapidly in the direction of the barn.

From that time on he had never spoken his daughter's name. And although he knew that mother and the boys got occasional letters from her, yet he never by sign or inquiry showed that he ever thought of her, or had the slightest interest in knowing whether she was dead or alive.

But on the Christmas eve that I have introduced him to your notice, he sat by the fire thinking; and his thoughts were of her. He had long ago admitted to himself that he was too hasty when he drove his only daughter away from his home; but he still remained silent. At each family reunion, always held on Christmas day, he had missed her. And as the coming one was to be held at his house, and his brothers and sisters, with their families, would be there, he, with some bitterness of feeling, was brooding over the fact that, through no fault of his, he reasoned, the pleasures of the day would be marred. Everybody missed Mary; the children of his nephews and nieces would ask for her and talk about her, despite the admonitions they had received to the contrary. As he was busy with his thoughts, gazing the while moodily into the fire, and now and then punching up the fore sticks in a spiteful sort of way, Grandma Botsworth suddenly spoke up and said:

"Tomorrer'll be another white Christmas. This makes two on 'em right hand runnin'." Three years ago was a mighty mild winter, and we had a green Christmas that year."

Here the old lady paused and heaved a sigh. No one said anything and she continued: "I recollect now there was mo e buryin's that year in the Bald Hill buryin' groun' than there has been since all put together."

"Yes," assented Mrs. Botsworth, reflectively, "a green Christmas allers makes a fat graveyard, they say, an' I never knowed it to fail."

"I reckon it'll be good sleighin' to-morrer," observed Uncle Billy, "an' all the folks'll come over in the bobs. Eh! what's that?"

The exclamation with which he concluded his remark was caused by the furious bark of old "Maje," the watchdog, the sound of voices in the front yard, and what seemed to be the cry of a child in fear.

The two boys started for the front door, while the remainder of the family sat intently listening and wondering who could be their visitors. They had not long to wait; for a minute later the sitting-room door was flung open and Jacob strode in, bearing in his arms a bright and lusty 2-year-old boy. Almost snatching the wraps from about it, and holding the little fellow up, he shouted: "Pap, look at your grandson; Filsey's come, an' this is her boy."

"The devil it is," roared Uncle Billy, springing to his feet, with a face as black as a thundercloud. "Take him away; I don't want ter see him."

"Hold on a minute," shouted a clear, strong voice in the doorway. It was the son-in-law who had spoken, and who stepped into the room, his figure erect and eyes blazing with anger. "Hold on a minute, I say," he continued; "I want a word, Bill Botsworth, I can buy and sell you. I am a rich man, but you don't have to own me for a son-in-law on that account. As for me, I can get along without you. But Mary here wanted to come back and see her mother and all of you once more, and I said she should; and more than that, I said you should treat her and baby right, or I'd make you; and, by thunder, I'll do it! Understand me, I ask no favors for myself; but for this poor girl here, that still loves you, but who wants to come home only for a little while, I will speak for, and fight for, too, if necessary." Even while he was talking, mother and daughter were weeping in each other's embrace, and Grandma Botsworth, rising with difficulty from her seat, laid her hand on her son's shoulder. "William," she said, "now's as good a time to give in as ye'll ever have. If Mary an' Will can afford to forgive you, I don't see how you can help forgiven' them. Come now, son, do right."

For an instant he stood struggling with his passion, then love conquered, extending his hand to his son-in-law, he said: "Billy, I knock under; I've made a mistake an' am sorry for it. Daughter, come here."

With a glad cry Mary put her arms around his neck and kissed him again and again.

"There, there, child," the old fellow murmured, in a voice husky with emotion, "it's all forgot now, an'—"

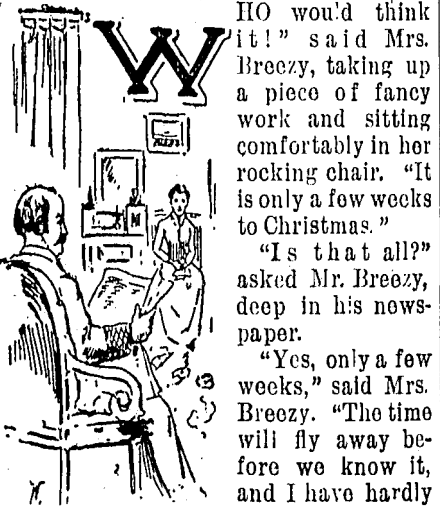

But he did not finish the sentence. And, while Mary was kissing grandma and all were silently crying for joy, he began to hustle round and get on his boots to go out and "see about the horses." But, as Will and Mary had come to the station, only two miles distant, by rail, and had there hired a man and team to bring them over, his services in this direction were not needed.

He did, however, build up such a fire in the old fireplace as it had not seen for many a day, and, as they all sat around it, and talked until long after the stroke of twelve, it was, indeed, to them a happy Christmas.—Arkansas Traveler.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

Mr. Breezy Gets Just the Sweetest, Nicest Present in the World.

"How would I think it!" said Mrs. Breezy, taking up a piece of fancy work and sitting comfortably in her rocking chair. "It is only a few weeks to Christmas."

"Is that all?" asked Mr. Breezy, deep in his newspaper.

"Yes, only a few weeks," said Mrs. Breezy. "The time will fly away before we know it, and I have hardly thought of presents. I have so many to make, too. Now you are elected, I suppose you won't grumble, as you usually do at this season of the year. There isn't any excuse for your saying that you can't afford to give me a few dollars for presents this year. It's high time I had a little money to commence with, too. Suppose you let me have a check for a hundred dollars in the morning, and—"

"A check for what?" asked Mr. Breezy, looking up suddenly.

"Only a hundred dollars to start with," said Mrs. Breezy, putting her thread a little through her work.

"A hundred dollars to start with?" ejaculated Mr. Breezy. "Start what?"

"That's all the attention you ever pay to anything I say," said Mrs. Breezy. "I suppose you haven't heard a word I've been saying. Do put down that everlasting newspaper and pay a little attention to your wife for once in your life. I say you may give me a check for a hundred—a hundred and fifty dollars in the morning for Christmas."

"You just said a hundred," said Mr. Breezy.

"I knew you'd notice that," said Mrs. Breezy. "I know I said a hundred a moment ago, but I've changed my mind. The fact is, I should really have two hundred dollars."

"My dear, if you keep raising the limit at this rate I shall have to draw out of the game."

"I don't understand your horrid gambling terms, and I wish you would confine yourself to respectable language," said Mrs. Breezy, fumbling around in her work basket for a particular shade of silk. "Two hundred and fifty dollars won't be any too much for—"

"I call," cried Mr. Breezy.

"There you go again," said Mrs. Breezy. "For heaven's sake drop on—stop that slang. You know you can well afford to give me a few hundred dollars for Christmas presents, and the man who has met with the luck you have this year in politics should not kick—object to giving his wife a little Christmas money. You wouldn't think anything of spending three or four hundred dollars on vile liquors and cigars for your—your constituents, as you call them, but when your wife asks you for half that sum—"

"Suppose we return to the original estimates and call it an even hundred?" said Mr. Breezy, pulling out his check-book.

"Do you suppose I can get along with a miserable hundred-dollars?" cried Mrs. Breezy. "Why, your present alone will cost nearly that. Yes, I expected to give you a real handsome present this year, but if you are going to be so stingy, of course you will have to take what I can afford to give you. Then think of the children, and of dear mother, and of grandmamma, and my dear sister-in-law, to say nothing of brother Jack and cousin Harry and your own mother. You don't want me to forget your own mother—"

"You hold over me," said Mr. Breezy. "Scowp the pot," and he threw down a check. "Fill her out to suit yourself."

"Do you really mean it?" asked Mrs. Breezy.

"Yes."

"Well, you shall have just the sweetest, nicest present in the world." And Mrs. Breezy gave her husband a tremendous kiss upon the lips, and flitted out of the room with the check.

"The first time in this year," gasped Mr. Breezy, as he slowly recovered from his astonishment.

Jimmy Surprised Them.

A few years back, when the large cathedral that adorns Brisbane was in course of construction, the collector for the building fund called upon a well-known mercantile firm for a subscription, but he was politely told that he should go to the rich people, who might be in a better position to "help the work along." "Go to Jimmy Tyson; he has more than any of us." (Up to that time "Jimmy's" name was never seen on any list for more than one pound.) "Well," said the collector, "as Tyson is a rich man, I will go to him for a donation." "Do," said the head of the firm, "and whatever he gives you we will guarantee you the same amount." The collector, a few days later, meeting Mr. Tyson, related to him what had taken place, and concluded by saying: "So, Mr. Tyson, I do not know what amount the firm is going to give until I have your name on my list." "Well," said Mr. Tyson, in a gruff voice, "give me yer pen and ink and I'll give yees a bob or two." "Jimmy" wrote out a check for five thousand pounds and gave it to the astonished collector.

FANCIES OF FASHION.

ACTRESSES RARELY ORIGINATE MODES.

The Widespread Notion that Fashions Are Set by Popular Footlight Favorites Is an Erroneous One—No Marked Changes in Style for This Season.

Some of the Latest.

HERE is a widespread notion, writes our New York correspondent, that actresses set the fashions, and it is an erroneous one. While it may be true that an actress of strong personality and real genius may now and then devise some novelty in female toggery that will take the public eye and attain a certain degree of modishness, yet, as a rule, the actresses of our leading theatres have other things to think of than devising or inventing new costumes. This reputation that actresses have as the originators of modes comes from the fact that changes of modes first make their appearance on the stage. The actress of to-day courts notoriety and public attention, and what better way than to apply to some well-known designer of costumes for a novelty in apparel when she is about to assume a new role? No; actresses very rarely originate modes, but actresses very frequently are the animated frames upon which designers hang their creations in order to try the effect of them on the public. And it's a good scheme, too.

To turn from generals to particulars, I think I hear you ask, as the stockbroker does concerning the market: Well, how do modes stand to-day? My reply is that I don't note any marked change. There's a fall in those lofty sleeves, which have held their own for so long. Skirts are still quoted as cut bias, close and tight-fitting at the top, and full at the bottom with large folds. There is not the same demand for caboching; their popularity has a downward tendency. As a prime favorite, I might quote moire antiques in dull colors, either in satin stripes or with floral figures. For dinner dresses straw color, sea-green, silver-gray, Parma violet on black ground are great favorites. Rough-surfaced plushes and velvets are much worn. In making up these materials, you use no skirt foundation but line it with flannel and thin silk to give it more body. Velvet appliques promise to be very modish trimming for evening costumes, either plain or open-work over tulle and down with jet, the effect of which so used is altogether charming.

One of the handsomest of these cloth and silk gowns that have come to my notice is the one which I set before you in my second illustration, an altogether refined and stylish garment fitted for calling and afternoon reception purposes. Let me describe it for you. The dress is a gray vicuna cloth and has small pleated panels of plaid silk, silk skirt foundation with a false hem and a drawing-string, the skirt being plain in front and fan pleated at the back. The pleating of the panels grows finer toward the top. The cor age has basques in man's dress cut style, without any trimming. The fronts of the lining hook in the middle, and they are covered with a full gathered plastron of the silk. The corselet starts from the sides of the corsage and is so laced as to display the plastron below it; leg-o-mutton sleeves and straight collar of the silk. You may, if your fancy so dictates, make up this dress in black or brown material.

In my third illustration you'll find another very pretty silk and cloth combination costume for a young person. The color of the cloth is quite a matter of taste, while the blouse should be either in foulard or pongee. The dress is made up princess style; the corselet lacing in front over some thin lining. It closes either with hooks or pearl buttons on a band of the same material. If you use hooks, you must make two small pleats to conceal the opening. The straight collar is set off with a bow made of the silk. The skirt foundation has a small ruffle at the bottom. The front breadth, which extends only to the waist line, is bias on both sides and has a small hem which conceals the seam. The front of the corselet is boned its full length. It runs somewhat to a point at the back and is piped. A very pretty color to choose for this dress would be cafe au lait, with a straw-colored blouse.

As for the ribbons used for hat trimming, I may say that they run in every color of the rainbow and still keep in delicate tones, forming most pleasing effects. Nothing could be more stylish than those tiny capotes in colored chenille without any other garniture than a large velvet bow set in a crumpled crest-like fashion in front, with broad strings in the same color. I have two stylish bits of modish headgear to set before you. The first one, which is pictured in my fourth illustration, is a light-gray felt edged with black velvet turned sharply up at the back and trimmed with a bow of light-gray ribbon brocade with pink, the ends of which are brought around to the front and hide the crown. The other is a very elegant hat in coral velvet and black passementerie. I should add that the small theater hats are made up of bright, sparkling material. All capotes have strings rather broad and long. In one instance I saw that instead of the bow tied in the middle there was a bunch of ribbon on one side and from it there were hanging two long ribbons quite to the knee. Round hats are certainly smaller. One of the most stylish and striking shapes is the Marquis. It is in black velvet, has a fine feather border and is set off by a tall tuft of feathers, and at the back there are two bunches of bright-colored satin ribbon standing out in bold relief.

One of the prettiest visiting costumes that I have seen this season was made up in reddish-brown—a very modish color—and the skirt and cuffs were bordered with black fox. There was a sort of figaro jacket corsage, gathered all the way down the front and opening on a plastron of white peau de soie, of which the standing collar was made.

I have noticed that it is quite a common thing this season to make up underskirts in black faille or mervellex, garnished with lace flounces or ruches or bias bands of velvet.

"QUEENSWARE" is so called from the fact that when, in 1763, Josiah Wedgwood perfected earthenware for table use the British Queen was so greatly pleased she gave it her name and patronage. Thereafter the word "queen" was stamped on all such dishes made by Wedgwood.

HOME AND THE FARM.

A DEPARTMENT MADE UP FOR OUR RURAL FRIENDS.

Secretary Rusk on the Needs of Farmers—Invest Your Surplus on the Farm—Large Profits from One Cow—About Poultry—Household Hints and Decorations.

Needs of the Farmers.

Now, as to the ignorance of American citizens not farmers regarding the needs of agriculture and the conditions of the farmer, says Secretary Rusk in the North American Review, I must in this respect ask my readers to take my statement on trust, as that of a man who has had special opportunities for judging and who is conscientiously convinced of the necessity for absolute sincerity on this subject. I ask the reader to take my word for it that, great as is the ignorance of the average farmer in regard to business matters and city life, it is no greater than that of his city brother in relation to things agricultural, nor indeed is it so great. This being the case we find ourselves confronted in the present grave economic emergency with a serious condition of affairs. We have a patient sick with a disease our physicians do not understand; as a result the sick man and his friends, blinded a little, perhaps, by suffering and sympathy in their efforts to arrive at a true diagnosis, yet endeavor to secure relief from suffering by such means as they can command or devise; and who shall blame them if, in the absence of physicians who know something about the case, they are perhaps misled into the adoption of certain nostrums? The farmers at least know their own condition; and of what use is it to decry the remedies they suggest if ignorance of their true condition and of their needs makes it impossible for you to suggest one? For the last twenty-five years you have been giving the farmer and his needs little or no thought; you have been letting agriculture take care of itself and him. All other classes, all other interests and industries, existing though they do only by reason of the fact that agriculture has called them into existence and supports them, have received your consideration, have been the objects of your special study. Is it surprising then, that, as the result of your selfishness, the farmer should be indisposed to trust any one but himself? Even when you talk to him fairly, he detects at once that, while you talk well and know much about many things, you know little or nothing of him and his surroundings. If, on the one hand, the farmer lacks business training and experience in affairs, you, on the other hand, who have both, lack to an even greater extent, and in a most pitiful degree, knowledge of agriculture, acquaintance with its followers, and familiarity with their needs and conditions.

Invest Your Surplus on the Farm.

When a thoroughbred or a high-grade cow will make $100 worth of butter in a year, and a scrub cow only makes $40 worth, while it costs but little more to feed one than the other, money invested in improved breeds of cows, or in a pure male from which to raise up a herd of grades, will pay better returns to the dairyman than can be obtained from bank stock or railroad shares or Western Farm mortgages.

When a small extra investment in better seeds and more liberal manuring will increase the crop without increasing the labor of cultivation, or when extra cultivation will make an increase in the money return four times as great as the expenditure; when better tools will save their cost in one season's labor, while with care they will do good work for five or ten years, then is the time when the farmer can make money by spending money.

When the expenditure of $25 or $35 per acre for tile drains will enable a field that now yields less than $10 worth poor grass a season to produce $35 worth of the best, and fit it for the growth of any crop that will yield profitable returns, it is economy to spend money, and so it is when a similar sum or a smaller one will so renovate an old pasture which now only feeds about one cow upon six acres, so that it will give more feed and better for six times that number.—American Cultivator.

Handy in Butchering Pigs.

Chester J. Brown, of Grinnell, Iowa, illustrates in The Stockman a simple and very easily made device for scalding and lifting hogs. With the lever as shown one man can handle a large porker with comparative ease.

THE DAIRY.

Losses from Poor Manufacturers.

In the dairy business, especially where cheese and butter are the staples, the farmer is a manufacturer and the salableness of his product depends largely on his skill. It does not all depend on this, however, for the proportion of butter and cheese that is wholly unfit for food is often so large that it detracts from the price the best would bring if it were not weighed down by this inferior stuff, which only competes because it goes under the same name as that of good quality. It is much gained to have the fraudulent compounds, oleomargarine and the like, branded for what they are; but the work will not be complete until the poorer qualities of butter are ruled out of the market as unfit for human use. Rancid butter is not even good for cooking, as, however it may be disguised, it flavors whatever it is cooked into, and thus lessens the demand which using good butter for cooking would increase. In many places poor butter is so generally used for making butter crackers that they are discarded for milk crackers by all having any regard for their stomachs. This is only one of many ways in which the use of poor butter lessens the demand.—American Cultivator.

Washing Butter.

Most butter makers wash their butter when in a granular state in the churn. They do this under conviction, born of long experience, that better results follow this method, than by using the old method of working out the buttermilk. It has long been demonstrated that water in no way injures the flavor, grain or keeping qualities of butter, but that it washes out all caseous matter and other impurities which might injure it. If the butter comes soft the water in going through it has a tendency to cool it and harden the granules so that it will pack better and be in better condition for salting and working. The superiority of this method, says Farm and Home, is shown in the fact that butter made in the counties of Orange, Courtland, Delaware, and Chemung, the great butter districts of the Empire State, commands a higher price in the New York market than that from any other section of the United States. Nine-tenths of the dairymen in these counties wash their butter.

THE POULTRY-YARD.

Here's for the Drinks.

Where it is not possible to have running water in the yards and hen-houses, says a poultry raiser in Farm and Home, a never-failing fountain the birds cannot foul is next best. It is easy to make one, using an old keg. Even a flour-barrel or half-barrel will serve for some months. Bore two holes in one head. In one place a pipe for filling. The other is for the escape of air as the water goes in. Cork both holes tightly after filling. A piece of half-inch pipe set in tightly when the tank is dry will let out water fast enough for a large flock. This pipe must be just a little lower than the edge of the drinking-trough. When water has filled the trough deep enough to cover the end of the pipe, no more will flow out until it has been drunk. By having the trough project into two yards one tank will supply both. If the water-barrel is shaded in summer the drink will be relished better. The trough should be raised from the ground high enough to prevent the scratching of dirt into it.

Breed for the Best.

Do not try to use more breeding stock than you need. It is often a great temptation to breed from inferior fowls when there is a good prospect or good demand for eggs. You may make sale of the eggs from those superior fowls you are keeping, at the same price as those from the prime breeding stock, but you are deceiving your customers first, and losing their custom last. The success of nearly all old breeders is in a great measure due to their observance of a rule never to breed from any but the best.

Poultry Notes.

NEVER allow the fowls to go thirsty.

ABOVE all things keep the hen house clean and well ventilated.

Don't forget that green food should be fed to fowls when confined.

SAVE the best birds for next year's breeding and send the others to market.

If your hens lay soft-shelled eggs they are probably too fat. Put them at work scratching.

Don't forget to keep your chicks away from the hog pen. Hogs have a weakness for young chicks.

REMEMBER that cockerels as well as pullets are "spring chickens." The next spring they will be "old roosters," worth about half as much in market as hens.

YOUNG poultry should not be fed with the older ones. It will always pay to keep a coop and provide a board or shallow trough in order to economize feed.

THE effect of damp ground and stagnant water on fowls—especially on young turkeys—is well known. Fatal diseases follow as inevitably in those cases as with human exposure to miasmatic exhalations. A dry gravelly spot is absolutely necessary to healthful conditions.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

A Trefolli Calendar.

The trefolli pieces, says the Farm and Home, are cut from thick Bristol board and painted the color of a clover-leaf, the markings being shaded with care. Then cut two clean, even slits in each leaf and insert a pale green ribbon of the same width, with the day of the week, the month and the day of the month painted at regular distances upon them, as shown in the sketch. The ribbon must be fitted so as to move easily in the spaces. This is a pretty desk ornament to be made for a fair or for a gift.

Make the Home Neat.

The surroundings about the farmer's home should be such as to make it attractive. There is a money value in neatness in fine lawns and plenty of ornamental as well as of fruit trees, especially in the localities where summer boarders from cities make their residence. The city visitor wants to be where all the surroundings are of a cheerful character. Doubtless the repellent aspect of many farm homes is one reason why they attract only those who earn money by farming, and in these days this class can only pay a low price for land. So far as he can do so without extravagant expenditures, the farmer should seek to attract wealthy purchasers, and selling to them fit up other farms in the same way.

Removing Stains.

To remove fresh fruit stains from table linen, cover quickly with powdered starch, or pour boiling water from the tea kettle upon them.

Finely sifted wood ashes will remove medicine stains from silver spoons. Egg stains on silver can be taken off with fine salt and damp cloth.

On fabrics that will not be injured by soft soap will take out paint stains much better than benzine, chloroform and similar cleaners.

A weak solution of oxalic acid will remove bad mildew stains and iron rust from white goods; ordinarily, mildew will come out if wet with sour milk and laid in the sun. Use oxalic acid with care, as it is poisonous. Diluted hartshorn takes mildew from woolen goods.

Grass stains are obstinate, but soft soap and baking soda will generally overcome them. Wet the stain, rub it freely with the soap and soda and let lie a short time before washing.

Wheel grease on wash dresses can be removed with soap and water. If the spot is pretty old, wet it first with kerosene oil.

Household Notes.

VINEGAR bottles may be cleaned with crushed egg shells in a little water.

TO BRIGHTEN carpets wipe them with warm water in which has been poured a few drops of ammonia.

A GOOD liniment for inflammation, rheumatism, swellings, etc., is olive oil well saturated with camphor.

A GOOD cement is melted alum, but it must never be used when water and heat are to come in contact with it.

FINE shavings from soft pine wood make a pleasant pillow. They have special curative virtues for coughs and lung troubles.

CLEAN collars on woolen jackets, men's coats, etc., by sponging with ammonia and water, then with alcohol, then rub dry with a flannel cloth.

COPPER kettles may be cleaned and polished by taking a lemon, cutting it in two; dip one of the pieces in salt and rub well over the copper.

HYPOSULPHITE of soda is recommended for cleansing tarnished silverware. It is applied simply with a cloth or brush dipped into a saturated solution of the salt, no powder of any kind being necessary. In two or three rubs all tarnishes are removed.

TRUE merit, like a river, the deeper it is the less noise it makes.—Hallifax.

ZULUS IN SHAM BATTLE.

It Looks More Like the Real Thing than a Counterfeit and Is Impressive.

A sham fight among the Zulus is an impressive spectacle. The dusky warriors are fine, muscular fellows, athletic and highly trained. The rank and file, untrammelled by ornaments and dress, move about with grace and freedom. The officers, chiefs and head men wear coronets of ostrich feathers, which rustle freely with every movement of the body; circling their brows are rolls of tiger skin from which descend fringes of coarse hair; from the neck and shoulders to the knees their bodies are covered with the tails of monkeys and tigers and stripes of various hides strung together in girdles; their waists are girt about with tufts of lion's mane and cow hair, says the Detroit Free Press. Forming into line, the variegated shields are so close and regular that they appear interlocked, while above they bristle rows of gleaming assegai heads. The foe is imaginary, as even among their own tribes they are roused to such a pitch of excitement, that had they any opponents, though only in mimic warfare, they would be so far carried away by their feelings that at close quarters bloodshed would inevitably result. At the word of command they advance in precise order, first slowly, then at a quick march, then double, and with a shout of "Chiala!" (imaginary enemies) the battle becomes fast and furious. Brandishing their assegais, stabbing and lunging with strength and dexterity, each stroke accompanied by a fierce grunt of satisfaction, stamping, gesticulating, and gnashing their teeth, they work themselves into a mad frenzy, in which their features are distorted, and their eyes glare with a fierce lust of blood.

Suddenly the command is given to retire, and, as victors shouting triumph, they march from the field. Then appears upon the scene a horde of wild-looking creatures, running and leaping from place to place, screaming demoniacally, and frantically beating the earth with thick, heavy clubs. These are the women and they are engaged in the horrible atrocity of killing the wounded. After a sham fight the night is spent in feasting and revelry.

JOHN W. KEELEY,

The Inventor of an Alleged Motor that Firmly Refuses to Budge.

It is seventeen years since John W. Keeley astonished and mystified the world by his incomprehensible motor, and yet the mist which envelops the invention and the inventor is as thick as ever. Meanwhile the author of this hidden agency lives in luxurious obscurity in a mansion in Philadelphia. A few years ago George W. Brown, of Brooklyn, N. Y., accompanied by a reporter, called upon Keeley for a demonstration of his powers, but Keeley had no time to give exhibitions, not even for a compensation. Then began a series of questions which plainly outlined the theories upon which the reduplication proceeded and the magician blandly wafted himself into a heaven of polar sympathy on a cloud of words. It is not a jest, but a matter of fact, that the professor of Indian archaeology of the University of Pennsylvania is the only man who has ever been able to translate a section of Keeley's into language intelligible to scientists and laymen. The visitors were therefore denied the privilege of seeing how the magician annihilated gravity.

Lincoln's Good Sense.

When Abraham Lincoln found an opponent too prejudiced to listen to solid argument he would often dismiss the subject with a bit of humor, thus gaining the good will if not the convictions of his adversary.

On one occasion, having been discussing the condition of the South with a large levee contractor from New Orleans, and having found the gentleman wholly unreasonable, Lincoln remarked that it would be useless to prolong the conversation.

"You are right," angrily responded the other; "there can never be a single point in common between us."

"Oh, yes, there can," answered the President, "for you know that I hold a levee to promote sociability while you build them to promote commerce."

While Lincoln was practicing law in Springfield, Ill., there came to him one day a young farmer who desired to study for the bar.

The applicant was not only totally unfit for the profession, but also sadly needed at home to take care of his widowed mother and her little family. After giving a long list of his qualifications the would-be lawyer said:

"And now, Mr. Lincoln, do you not think that the law is the vocation for which I am specially fitted?"

"Young man," said the attorney, "the vocation in which you are at present engaged, is searching for the pot of gold at the foot of the rainbow, but the one for which you should try to fit yourself is the care and maintenance of your aged mother."

The earnest manner in which Lincoln spoke made a deep impression on his hearer, who never again gave his mother reason to think that he was selfish or lacking in filial duty.—Youth's Companion.

A YOUTHFUL SPECULATOR.

He Corners the Shoestring Market and Makes $55,000 in Three Months.

A coterie of traveling salesmen in the lobby of the Palmer House, Chicago, were discussing the subject of fortunate investments and enterprises that have proved unusually profitable when one of the gentlemen remarked: "The queerest case that I ever knew of this kind was that of a boy at Andover, Mass. The youngster was the only son of an old cobbler who had mended shoes and boots all his life and had saved enough to buy a modest home and to lay up a small balance in the bank. The old man died awhile ago, leaving everything to his overgrown, gawky, shiftless son.

"The latter never did a day's work in his life, and as soon as he found himself the possessor of the little shoe shop he at once commenced casting about for a purchaser. He soon converted his property into cash. Then he went down to a suburb of Boston to talk with the manager of a large factory that turns out about half of the shoestrings made in this country. The youngster contracted for the entire output of that shoestring factory for one year! Then he went to another large manufactory at Newark, N. J., and secured a similar contract.

"These two institutions are the only shoestring factories in America. The shoestring business for the ensuing year had been cornered, excepting the goods that were already in the hands of wholesale shoe men in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. The young speculator invested his cash in buying up this stock, and within a few weeks had everything in his own hands. This was a corner which the trade had not foreseen. Shoe dealers throughout the country who had ordered their usual stock of goods were horror stricken to learn that there was a shortage in shoestrings. Well, now, shoestrings are very small things, but they are quite necessary to the shoe business. Within three months the Andover boy sold his contracts with the manufacturing concerns at a net profit of $55,000, and if he had had nerve enough to continue the fight he undoubtedly would have made double that amount."—Chicago Mail.

Heart on the Right Side.

At Detroit a man applied at the Central Station for lodging. He is George Burns, and he is, perhaps, without a parallel in the world. He is 60 years of age, and during the rebellion served as engineer on board the man-of-war Essex. He was captured and held prisoner at Libby Prison. After the war he became engineer on the steamship Savannah, and when that boat went upon the rocks at Gay Head in 1884 he stuck to his post and reversing the engine as she struck. He was thrown among the machinery and horribly injured. In the top of his skull he wears a six-ounce silver plate, three ribs on his left side are gone, his right knee cap has been removed and also a large portion of the right hip bone and other smaller bones of his right leg. In his right wrist there is no pulse and the right elbow has no joint. But the strangest of his complex injuries is his heart, which has been forced over to the right side of the body, where it can plainly be felt beating.

Ride and Tie.

"Ride and tie" is an old Salem saying. Two men would start out on a journey with one horse. One would ride a specified distance, then, dismounting and tying the horse, he would walk on to the next changing place, where he would find the horse tied and waiting for him, having been ridden there by the man who started out afoot. And so the whole distance would be traversed, each one riding and walking in turn. The item "Ride and tie and go to Boston" is found in an old account book, at a charge of "four and sixpence."

A Fair Financier.

Cobwigger—The material for this quilt must have cost a pretty figure.

Mrs. Cobwigger—How can you say such a thing? Anyone but a man would know that it is made of pieces that were left over. Why, ever since we were married, whenever I bought a new dress I got an extra yard or so for this very purpose.

Maria Lynch's Triumph

SHE was the strangest character in town. In fact, she came nearer being two characters than any woman I ever knew.

Maria Lynch in the morning was no more like Maria Lynch in the afternoon than Saturday night was like Sunday. In the morning hours she had no hesitancy about coming down-town in the most frowsy of gowns and with her hair in a mop that defied any man's ingenuity in solving the problem of how it was kept up at all.

But in the afternoon! Look at her then. She had good clothes, and if ever a woman in that town knew how to wear them it was Maria. Undoubtedly she was handsome. Her father was a good-for-nothing shoemaker, who got gloriously drunk at the end of one working week, and remained so till the beginning of the next. He was such a particularly disreputable old fellow that no one wondered his daughter should have gotten to be like him at least half the time. When she went to church she went alone, and when she tried to enjoy any social entertainment no one was there to help make things pleasant for her. And she always showed that she missed these things.

Finally Jim Miller, who was head salesman in Downey's big double store, just cut loose from all restraint and went to the fair with Maria. It cost Jim his best girl, but he must have counted on that and been willing to make the change. And Maria was happy.

But she didn't dress up in the morning any more than she used to do. She came down-town for the daily marketing just as she always had done, and if Jim or any one else had influence to prevail upon her to robe herself in anything more seemly no one ever used that power. She bought goods in Downey's store, and sometimes of Jim, sometimes of the other clerks. She wasn't a bit spoony, though he was inclined to be, even in public. He used to tell her he was madly in love with her and would do anything in the world for her. She believed enough of it at least to go with him wherever he wanted to go. But the office of the marriage license clerk did not seem to be one of these places.

They brought the whole thing to a test finally. It was at the Christmas holidays and all the town seemed in good humor. The Methodists had arranged to have an immense tree in their house of worship and all the Sunday school children were to have a treat. Grace was one of the teachers, and was chief of the committee to receive people as they arrived and take them to seats.

We had all been watching for this night for a long time. We didn't think Jim would dare to bring Maria right in here where all his folks were members and where Grace was just about supreme. But he did. The place was filling up very fast and all the ushers were as busy as bees, when Grace took a laughing couple to a choice place she had saved for them, and then turned back all pretty and happy and excited—and there, right in the door, stood Jim with Maria Lynch on his arm. Grace was surprised into looking first at one of them and then at the other without saying a word. Then she put up both hands to her face for about a second and turned partly around. When she took her hands down she seemed to be all right, and to know just what she wanted to do. But it wasn't to escort them to their seats. It was to walk straight down the aisle, without one sign to them, and to leave them standing there. But that wouldn't do. Others were coming all the time, and Jim knew if he stood there just a moment he had her con-

"IT WILL TAKE TWO SEATS FOR US."

quered. So he looked all around the room at the decorations, and said how handsome they were to Maria, for all the world as if he wanted to stop and stand there anyway. Grace knew she must go and get them, but she would not be beaten by that shoemaker's girl—that slouch. She came back smiling, and bowing just as sweet as you please, and said:

"There's just one seat for you here, Mr. Miller. Come along."

Maybe it wasn't a very Christian spirit, and that on Christmas Eve, but it was human nature. She could crush the girl who had taken her lover away, and no wonder she did it. But Jim was game, too. He was in for it, but he couldn't be driven away by anything like that. So he said, real gentle and kind:

"But it will take two seats for us, Miss Fallen."

"Oh," said Grace; "I didn't see anybody with you."

It cut Maria to the quick. But Jim, who knew what to expect if she did take it up, kept her still by moving forward without any usher at all, and Grace fell behind and took the next party to their seats.

Every one had heard it, and poor Maria sat there all through the evening, and knew that people were looking at her and chuckling. She knew lots of them were wishing she had said something to Grace, and maybe they would try to throw them together as the meeting broke up, just to see the fun when two tongues were loosened. That was the most mortifying thing in all the incident. People thought she didn't care.

It was over at last, and then Jim went out just as straight and as proud as if he had had rich Grace Fallen on his arm. And that one night and his treatment of the girl there, where he was strong and she was pitifully weak, did more for him in her eyes and her heart than all the rest of his attentions. It really looked as if Jim cared for her. He went on going with her and people kept on talking about it, as if it was any of their business, till nearly spring. And then one night the climax came.

It was Sunday evening, and all the people who were church-goers were there and were just about ready to sing the last hymn when there was an alarm of fire. The first man to run out of the church door bumped up square against Jim Miller, and the two fell over each other all the way down the steps. Each recognized the other, and both asked where the fire was. No one seemed to know, yet, but after a minute all the town could see that it was Downey's big store. The whole inside was full of flames long before Jim or any one else could get there, and no one dared to try and save anything. It burned as if there was oil and turpentine on every square yard of floor in the great building. Poor old man Downey cried like a child and begged them to get in and save the books and cash. For there was no bank in the town at the time and all the merchants kept their own money. But no one could go in, so it had to burn.

After it was all over, and when folks would go to old man Downey and ask him how much he had lost, he would say, "I don't know. Go ask Jim. He kept accounts of everything. I left it all to him. Even Grace, my niece, has lost all she had in the world, for I had most of it in money here in the store, having just sold her farms; and the rest of it was invested in goods, and my notes to her are all burned up in the fire."

He kept getting worse all the time, and finally he had to go to bed, and he was sick for a long time.

Jim Miller said he was going away. He couldn't get as good a situation in town as he had had, and he couldn't take a poorer one. Everybody in town was sorry to see him go, for he had lots of friends, but there didn't seem anything wrong in his going. Finally they began to wonder why he didn't go. He set the time over and over again, and every time he would say something came up that kept him from starting. All at once old man Lynch came up with a reason. Jim had asked Maria to go with him, and she wouldn't go.

But right on the heels of this story, Jim was arrested.

There was an awful storm one night. No such a hurricane had ever gone through that country. While it was clouding up, and before any one thought of its being much of a blow, Jim went down to the Lynch cottage. It was very early, but he wasn't working now, so he could go calling when he liked. Several people saw him go there and several others saw him go away. And right then, when the storm was coming up at its worst, we all saw Maria run from her house and go down the street toward Downey's house, where Grace Fallen lived. We crouched along the stone wall in front of Downey's house, and saw Maria try twice to go to the door, but both times the whirlwind threw her to the ground. We tried to get to her, but that seemed impossible for a while, and then the wind once in a while. There the two girls stood facing each other.

"Grace," said Maria, "I came to tell you that your money is not burned up at all."

"Oh! oh! Where is it?" said Grace. She was as angry as a person could well be, and she hated Maria; but a rich girl's money lies pretty close to her heart. "Where is it?" she said. And she almost put her hands on Maria's wet arms.

But before the answer could come Jim Miller burst open the door and leaped into the room. He was white as a sheet and all panting from a hard run. He stopped with his eyes fairly blazing, and looked from one of the girls to the other. At the start neither of them said a word, and then Maria was the first to break down. She put both of her drenched arms around his drenched neck, and laid her head down on his shoulder, and cried as if there was something terrible the matter. He stood it for a moment, and then he put her away and turned to Grace, and I'll be shot if she didn't fall right into his arms.

That settled Maria. She quit crying on the instant. She stood up straight and as handsome as any woman in that town ever stood—handsomer by far than she would have been if her clothes had not been so wet—and she told Grace to ask Jim where her money was. He would have hit her when she said that if it hadn't been for the rest of us. Old man Downey came into the room and he wanted to know what that was about Grace's money.

"Jim has it," said Maria.

Jim broke from Grace and ran from the room. "He set the store on fire himself and then ran to the church," said

"JIM HAS THE MONEY."

Maria to the old man. "He knew if he did that no one would ever suspicion him. He has all of your money and all of Grace's tied up in envelopes, just as you left them the night before the fire. He is going to Mexico, and he has been coaxing me to go with him all winter. But"—and here she blushed and began crying again—"but he didn't want to marry me. And when nothing else would move me, and knowing how I hated Grace for insulting me in the church that night, he told me to-day that he had all of Grace's money, and I could have the satisfaction of spending it on myself any way I wanted to, if I would only go with him. And that frightened me so that as soon as he left I came here to tell you about it so you can stop him. He is going on the nine o'clock train, and he has it all strapped on him in a belt."

"Why, it's past nine o'clock now," said the old man.

We all ran from the house and headed for the depot. There stood Jim, waiting for the train. The storm had washed out the track, and no regular time could be made for hours after that. When he saw us Jim jumped across the road and ran for the woods. But the whole town was after him and he had to give up. At last he tried to take the belt off and throw it away, but he couldn't even do that, and he was taken with evidence enough to send him to the penitentiary for ten years.

He is there now, and will be for more than a year yet. And do you know that in all that time Maria Lynch has dressed herself up in the morning just the same as in the afternoon, and has been the straightest woman in that town? She softened to Jim as soon as he was in trouble and has stood by him all the time he has been locked up. When he gets out they'll be married, for Jim don't feel any too good for her now, and she loves him so well that she will forgive anything he ever did in his life.

The only trouble was that Jim thought she would care more for her revenge than she would for her honor. He was mistaken. She was so rigid in what she thought the right thing to do that she would have sent him to prison or gone herself rather than see even the girl she hated robbed of a dollar.

And when she does get married there isn't a man nor a woman in that town but will wish her a Godspeed clear from the bottom of their hearts.

Sad Predicament.

Ten-year-old William is a chronic grumbler; nothing has ever been known to meet with his unqualified approval.

Not long ago a new suit came from the tailor's. The cutter, knowing how fastidious was his young customer, had exercised the utmost care.

William donned the new clothes, and walked up and down the room several times. He was strangely silent, but his face soon assumed a serious aspect.

"Why, Willie," finally asked his mother, "what's the matter?"

"Well," he replied, almost ready to cry from disappointment and vexation, "these clothes are either too loose or too tight, and I can't tell which."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

SERIOUS SUBJECTS CAREFULLY CONSIDERED.

A Scholarly Exposition of the Lesson—Thoughts Worthy of Calm Reflection—Half an Hour's Study of the Scriptures—Time Well Spent.

Christ Risen.

The lesson for Sunday, December 13, may be found in John 20: 1-18.

INTRODUCTION.

We have come at last to the resurrection, nay, we have never been away from this central and essential doctrine. Here is the platform for every gospel proclamation. Peter planting his foot on this rock made his first mighty appeal, mighty, indeed, to the pulling down of strongholds. Here may we stand, here alone for success. The demonstration of Christ's resurrection has been the fortress and bulwark of the gospel in all the years. "Nor," says Pentecost, "could it survive one day if these infallible proofs were broken down."

WHAT THE LESSON SAYS.

The first day of the week. Greek: Day one of the Sabbath, or, more accurately, One of the Sabbath. When it was yet dark. Better, while. Participial construction. —Unto the sepulchre. Literally, into the sepulchre, the terminus ad quem. Taken away. The word means to lift. It was doubtless set down into the sepulchre or tomb.

Then she runneth. Or, she runneth therefore. Whom Jesus loved. The word used of manifested affection (phileo).—Taken away. Or lifted. Same word as in v. 1. They took away (aorist tense) is more literal. See Variations.

Went forth. They were probably stopping together somewhere near by. —To the sepulchre. Greek: Into the sepulchre, with allusion again to the completion of the action. So they ran. Or, went to running. (Imperfect.)—Outrun. Two words in the Greek. Ran ahead quickly. —To the sepulchre again, into, i. e., into the entrance. Looking in. Not in the Greek. Simply: Stopping down he beheld.—Yet went he not in. Not inconsistent with the Greek of v. 4. He passed into the tomb entrance, the ante-room as it were, without pressing on into the interior.

Went into the sepulchre. All the way in to where the linen clothes were lying.—Saw. Beheld, i. e., scrutinized.

About the head. Rather, upon (epi).—Linen clothes. Better, cloths. See Variations. Bandages, or swaths for the body.—In a place by itself. Greek, into, i. e., wrapped together and put into a separate place. This orderliness indicated that there had been no rude theft or hasty leave-taking.

Went in, i. e., from the outer chamber into the inner.—Saw and believed. Probably catching a sudden glimpse of the real significance of the event, the resurrection of Christ.

For as yet they knew not. The "for" seems to give a reason for the lurking amazement that lies half hid in the preceding verses. Dr. Conant says, not even yet. See Variations.—That he must rise. This being the whole trend of scripture, its prophecies being otherwise hopeless and unmeaning.

Their own home. Greek: To theirs, or their own. Probably their friends or their lodgings. They lived in Galilee when at home.

Stood. Or, was standing. Kept standing. Pluperfect.—At the sepulchre, or near (pros).—Stooped down and looked into. Greek: Stooped down into. We can readily understand the posture, leaning forward and possibly kneeling down, so as to thrust her body into the opening of the tomb.

Sitting. Seated composedly and calmly, used of judges at 1 Cor. 6: 4.—Hail him. Greek, lay. See Bible Union.

They say. They are emphatic; these say.—Laid him. Or placed him. Thinking of him still as a dead body.

WHAT THE LESSON TEACHES.

The first day of the week. First, henceforth and forever, because of what occurred there in that garden. "This month shall be a beginning of months unto you," said Moses. A new and greater passover has come and a new beginning as it were, of days is to be set. First in reverent thought; first in Christ's remembrance. That risen tomb in Joseph's garden jostled and changed all things. The almanac, the sacred things of the temple, holy places, holy days, the veil was rent for all and a new adjustment was necessary. We have it in the Lord's day.

Then she runneth. It was a woman that set the new gait for the world. If the messengers of Zion had been walking before, now they go with all speed, for the King's business requireth haste. There at Bethlehem the shepherds go their earnest but unhalting way toward the manger. Wise men stalk resolutely and composedly out of the east. But now we have come to the risen tomb and the word is now, "Go quickly." And Mary has even anticipated it. Back and forth she runs in the apprehension of that empty tomb. It is the birth of a new alacrity for the gospel message, and it was a woman who inaugurated it. Aye, have not women's feet, beautiful upon the mountains of proclamation, been ever the swiftest for Jesus' sake?

They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre. She did not know who. But presently she knows; it was not men, but angels. God's son could not abide in such narrow quarters as the grave. God's son and his multitudinous cohorts. "No room for him in the inn?" Verily so. It was too straitened for the glory of his birth. He must be out in the open, out where he could be in touch with all nature and all life. And so there was no room for him in the tomb, ample as Joseph had made it. Significant those words of Peter concerning the bond of death: "It was not possible that he should be holden of it." True, for this was God.

So they ran both together. So go our different temperaments together to the tomb. The Petrine, impulsive yet lacking deepest spiritual discernment, comes and at the first goes away simply wondering. The Johannine comes and sees and believes. It was so also on the sea. Peter was tugging at the net; perhaps, too, he was glancing shoreward, wondering. It was then that disciple whom Jesus loved saith unto Peter, "It is the Lord." But if they lose step it is only for a moment. Peter is presently rejoicing in his Lord, his intercessor earnestness making large amends. There at the beautiful gate of the temple we see these two with equal pace going up together again.

Mary! It was this close personal address that opened her eyes. It was the Lord speaking to you and me individually, and in intimate friendliness that brought us to his feet in glad apprehension. He calls us by our names, his appeal to my soul was as though he and I were alone in the universe. Such near intercourse God ever approves. "The Lord is my Shepherd," as if David and God were there by themselves, and they were. So has it not been at times with your own soul? Let it be just now. "The Master is come and calleth for thee."

For the FARMER'S WIFE.

FARMER JOHN AND MARY.

BY J. H. MORRIS.

Farmer John was up with the times—a brusque old farmer, he; Though hardly worked from day to day to pay the usurer's fee. At morning and at evening, John found time to read a line, And chuckling o'er the page anon, he said: "Now, Mary, mine, It's grand, the news from 'old Kentuck! Ha! ha!" he roared again. The tired wife, from busy work, lifted her eyes, and then She said: "I have not heard it, dear," John stared. "Not heard it! Strange! All day the paper has laid here—why don't you read 'exchange'?" He spoke in injured tone, and soon was busy with his sheet. "I had not time to read," the wife replied. Upon her cheek A silent tear—John saw it there, as Mary left the room. "Another victory! Great scott! old 'Rep.' is goin' to doom! A time like this a fellow needs a friend to talk and laugh With him: a woman that don't read ain't no companion, half!" And Mary, by the kitchen fire, dried up her tears to say: "Dear John, God knows I do desire to be his help, always. If I had time to read—I will! No more shall he be tried By my ignorance. I will find some time to read," she cried. The morning dawn found her astir—with purpose new, she rose To toil the harder through the day, and read the news at its close. All day it rained; John could not work in field, nor in the wood. All day, with papers, books, he sat and read in pleasant mood— He might have brought the wood, and then the water from the well, And many other tasks performed, which to poor Mary fell. All day she struggled through the work, known to the farmer's wife; At night she took the paper up to read of outside life. "I'm going to read the paper, John," she said, and smiled her best; But, glancing toward her bed-room door, she sighed and wished for rest. Her aching brain mixed what she read with thoughts of household cares; The letters blurred before her eyes, and soon they filled with tears. "What our us critters women are," said John, with musing smile; "Now Mary's monstrous on the work, but cries just like a child."

* * * * *

A heart that loves a farmer's wife, and calls her mother, too, Beats in this breast. John understood you not, Mary—I do. I know the trials, cares and woes the farmer's wife endures; I know your sorrows, griefs and tears, and my tears fall with yours.

The Birth of New Ideas.

BY FRANCIS F. ALLEN.

What strange anomaly of human nature is it that causes men to combat new thoughts and new ideas? Why is it, that all along the known history of men the penalty paid for daring to think new thoughts, daring to advance new ideas or presuming to step outside of the old worn ruts of creed or tradition, has cost the daring soul, in many instances, most severe torture, loss of life, social ostracism or imprisonment? The many instruments of torture, still exhibited today in the old world as relics of the inquisition, do not owe their origin and design to the purpose of the punishment of crimes against humanity, but were designed and used principally for the suppression of thought—for the crushing out of the lives of those who presumed to advance a new idea—the best at variance with the prevailing dogma. Socrates paid the penalty for thinking new thoughts with his life. Galileo's reward for scientific discovery, was loss of liberty and recantation; while Servetus, for his researches, was burned at the stake, and so throughout the known history of man, persecution has ever rewarded the audacious mortal who dared take one step outside the beaten paths or the barrier set up by creed, custom or prejudice. The birth of new ideas, like all births, has ever been attended by throes of pain or suffering to some one, and one is led to believe that the presentation of a new thought to some peculiar mental organism, has caused as much anguish and suffering (judging from the resentment and indignation with which it is received), as the originator suffers from tortures inflicted. Has this strange law of metaphysics, this freak of human nature, ever been accounted for by scientists? Why is it that any break in the old routine of thought seems to cause absolute pain? Is it because the introduction of a new thought that is in any way at variance with prevailing creed or doctrine is like the introduction of a new element in a chemical compound—the temporary commotion caused by the raw combination brings pain, hence this resentful feeling?

Or can it be that the audacious proponent of new truths is unconsciously an iconoclast? For to many people a cherished theory or pet creed becomes, in time, an idol, and woe to him who dares crush an idol or pronounce it mere clay. While the opposition to new thought was more pronounced and violent in the so-called dark ages of the past, still the introduction of any thing that savors of novelty to the nineteenth century brain is in many instances received with spasms of pain and aversion, and the promulgator of new thought, either religious, social or political, has paid the penalty even in the present age, though the penalty is somewhat milder than that meted out to reformers in the past.

The abolition of slavery had its martyrs among those who first came to the front and dared support their unpopular doctrine. And many of the advocates of Labor reform have likewise paid the penalty for presuming to stir the turbid blood or quicken the torpid forces of the sluggish, slumbering throng, and awaken them to a sense of the danger of inaction.

To illustrate how difficult it is to introduce an idea, the least out of the old and orthodox train of thought to one of these peculiarly sensitive minds, we will just give an instance in the events of the present day.

In the columns of one of our old strictly partisan papers, (I would rather quote them because it is said that the labor reform tamperers with statistics and figures), is found the president's message in which it is officially announced that there is $24.38 per capita in circulation. In another paper devoted to the interest of the same party, is a list of ten millionaires who "command" (that's the word used) among the ten, eight hundred million dollars. These are apparently the "upper ten," for no one's name is mentioned who "commands" less than twenty-five million dollars. There is, of course, quite a number of millionaires who manage to live quite comfortably but whose names have not yet been entered on the "roll of honor."

This same journal mentions in an editorial the fearful increase of crime and poverty, and pathetically asks for some one to suggest a remedy, and hints at a systematic plan of charity whereby some of this vast accumulation of wealth may be applied to mitigate this growing evil. Yet the reform presses all over the country has for years suggested that judicious legislation would be the most feasible plan to pursue; that justice done to the masses in season would obviate the necessity for tardy charity. But the same spirit of resentment that actuated the rabble to cry "crucify him" in ages gone, because he had preached a new thought, the same spirit that maimed, tortured, burned and imprisoned the ones who dared stand in the foremost ranks to herald the advent to a new thought or a new era.

In our nineteenth century this same vindictive spirit gave the name of calamity howler, anarchist and alarmist to those who had the manhood to suggest that a change be made and that instead of legislating money into the hands of the few to be made a basis for speculation and gambling, that it be put to legitimate use—be the circulating medium, the life-giving element of the nation.

It looks like the climax of silliness to read in one column of a paper of the amount of money in circulation and in the next of the vast amount controlled by a few individuals, and then express surprise at the growing poverty and ask what's to be done with the hungry ones. The remedy was suggested before the disease had reached its climax, but the minds of the masses were not ready to receive it. The alert physicians saw years ago that the circulation was defective. They saw that the vast accumulation of the life-blood of the nation at one point threatened congestion in that place and consequently impeded circulation and paralysis in another, but the remedy suggested savored too much of novelty to be adopted readily. But when a strictly partisan press has been forced to acknowledge the presence of disease in the appalling increase of poverty, and has begun to ask for a remedy. There is certainly symptoms of a new idea finding lodgement in the public mind. That it may take deep root, blossom and bring forth good fruit, is the devout prayer of all lovers of humanity and friends of justice.

THE NATIONAL CHILDREN'S HOME KINDERGARTEN AND INDUSTRIAL ALLIANCE

To Become Auxiliary to the Woman's Alliance and Kindred Industrial Orders, with Lesson-leaf

Literature on the Economics of Life, by Mrs. E. F. Lathrop, and Mr. Jas. H. Lathrop, of Topeka, Reserved.

TOPEKA, KAN., Jan. 7, 1892.

For FARMER'S WIFE.

Introduction.—This department of Children's Home Kindergarten and Youths Economic Education, which has been opened in our first article in October number of the FARMER'S WIFE, and enlarged into a lesson form in December number, is designed to present in an objective manner the most active and advanced thought on the objects, aims, duties and rights of life, for the Home Nursery and Industrial School. These lessons will aim at presenting labor of mind and body as the chief means of development of true manhood and womanhood, when properly applied by economy of time and division of industry suited to each individual characteristic or bent. Such labor would receive its own just reward, if society were built upon such home education as we desire to map out.

It is evident from the study of the times by close thinkers, that the radical inequality among mankind in reference to the "burdens and benefits of life," are produced by too much ideal education on the hopes of the life to come, on the one hand, and on the other, too much stress placed on the material part of life, which is inexcusable as seen from the standpoint of the great natural resources which lay at the hand of intelligent toil, and was without doubt, intended for man's use here on earth. This has been the bane of man's life of ignorance, or the reward of false education. Our future correction of these inequalities must come from a higher moral estimate of labor, and the different uses made of it in the education of mind and body.

This can be best done at home. It belongs to the Mother and Home to build society.

The greatest work of the Woman's Auxiliary to the Alliance or other industrial orders, is to study the means of making and preserving the Home and Nursery as the basis of good society and a just Government.

On this account, we shall appeal to the education and rights of Womanhood in the superior domain of life to which their sex calls them; to claim this field of privilege and to occupy, and to conduct the race along the natural paths of life's primary development, after which she may preside as queen over social destiny.

As the builder of the race, woman stands thus preeminently above man in all that pertains to the functions of physical and social life. Her work begins at home and continues through the warp and woof of society and shapes government. Man should be her aid, support, counsellor and guard. He cannot shirk his responsibility of the same without equal loss to community. The attention of both should be given equally to the home and natural culture of those human beings in the Kindergarten of Life.

To all who are honestly devoted to social and spiritual reform we invite to assist in the making of the children and youths play hours the ground of reform.

The lessons herewith presented are intended to draw out thought and prepare the mind of reformers to consider the fundamental work, after we have received the assurances of welcome to the homes of reformers, we shall proceed to classify and present under weekly headings the different orders of work to be carried out in the education of our youths at home.

Let every reader of the FARMER'S WIFE and all who hear of this Children's Alliance and Home Kindergarten write a card at once to our address, Topeka, Kan., and say whether they would like to learn all about this plan and desire its adoption. The children from five years old to sixteen can be more interested and informed on the leading reforms of the day by the use of object lessons in such homes, or even in public classes than the older people are to day, and thus add the most potent factor of Juvenile education to the People's movement.

GENERAL SUBJECT.

"INHERENT RIGHTS OF MAN."

2ND LESSON.—RIGHTS OF HOME.

Q. How can the world develop Life in all its numerous forms?

A. By being a natural home for life, surrounded by all forms of life with their own kinds of food.

Q. Does nature offer a home to all living things or creatures on the earth?

A. It does, according to ability to use and occupy the same.

Q. Has mankind the same rights to a home that is given the oyster, and snail, the fox, or bird?

A. He has as much more right, as by labor wisely directed, he can secure of the numerous bounties of nature.

Q. Does he always have much more than the snail or bird?

A. Some have no more than the poor snail because they are as sluggish as he. Others are always poor because they change homes as often as the bird, and so have about as little.

Q. Are all poor people as unwise and unfaithful in this world of plenty?

A. No. The masses of the people are poor and unsettled about home, because the "wicked rule" and tax the willing workers on their occupancy of earth and natural rights, to support themselves in splendor and idleness.

Q. Is a home necessary to make people good and wise and happy?

A. The wisest and best people on earth have been those who were established in a home free from debt; while ignorance, suffering and crime come from being driven from place to place.

Q. What are some of the natural rights of home?

A. The rights to life, gives mankind a share to the earth according to their wants and ability to use the supply found therein.

Again, nature requires for growth and comfort that the recipient of her favors shall cluster them together about the workers to strengthen and protect the individual.

Q. This, then, does not argue that the people should live herded together like animals?

A. No! The God of nature gave every person of intelligence a desire for a home, and plenty of means awaiting his labor and skill to make one, and the crowding of men, women and children together in herds like animals, as is done in many poor quarters of our cities, is brutalizing.

Q. How is it that people do not have their allotments of earth and the privileges of gathering from its stores their own comfort?

A. Because, the greed of the wealthy have caused them to either own slaves for their labor, or own the land, or natural resources on which their labor is placed; and tax their toil and product, until all personal liberty and hope is drowned.

Q. How can these rights be restored to all God's children from the least to the greatest?

A. By the whole people joining together and voting to make laws—to take interest from money invested in bonds and mortgages on land and natural resources—to tax the land of large holders, and remove it from the homestead of the family entirely—to establish government, or people's public warehouses, transportation, and exchange with a money that will unite all families together into one National Co-operative Union.

Q. This is a long answer, and hard to understand by children. Is it not?

A. No, the relation of one family to another, and the commerce in a neighborhood; the storehouses of corn and wheat, and the other products to draw from; and the taxes and interest paid from the farm products, are, living lessons to every boy and girl who has a calf to feed or a cake to make.

Q. If the people all had as good a home as earth affords, and their labor demands, would it not break up the rich and destroy the business of to-day?

A. No, it would not take a dollar, nor a comfort from them as now possessed; but would depend upon natural wealth laid away in this earth which was conveyed to man with his title to life on condition of occupancy and use of the same.

Q. To encourage occupancy and use of earth as a home, would it not hinder the success of the gospel of the home in heaven?

A. No, it is a false idea that was obtained through ages of teaching by some men, that to gain heaven you must forgo the blessings of this life, whereas a good life and home here where nature can bestow her best gifts upon our whole being, ought to give us a better preparation for the home in heaven.

Q. Cannot a model of our future home above or beyond, be seen in the things of this life?

A. Yes; Nature is but the reflection in material mould of plant, or fruit, home or hill, in earth's landscape of the more real things beyond this life.

Q. How may we better understand our relation to the life to come?

A. By making the use of all the benefits of this life to build as our desires and hopes direct a character and home here.

Q. How can the Kindergarten for children aid us to do this?

A. By exercising all the various powers of mind and body of each particular individual in their own natural bent—by use of hands and eyes and mind in creating or remodeling those forms of life out of such materials as are convenient, as best expresses our thoughts and desires until we have grown by natural right and labor into a perfect manhood or womanhood in possession of a good home and true worth.

Big Head. Big Scheme.

There is a man by the name of Harrison who was elected president of the United States on his grand-father's record. He hasn't done anything since but he is going to. Yes, he is going to whip poor little Chili and he don't know what for. He wants to be re-elected, poor man, and by declaring war his party will excite sympathy and we will be told not to swap horses in the middle of the stream but to vote for the g. o. p. Who is doing so much (whipping little Chili, you know) it is a big scheme, but it won't work. The people are awake, and it will take more than a little war to excite them.

Suppose a member of the church would consort with sinners, and at every opportunity proclaim the fact that religion is on the down grade, and that the day is not far distant when every tabernacle of God in the country will be closed. That the church, as first organized, was right; but the preachers are all hypocrites and since they have got to meddling with the affairs of sinners and saying that a man must believe and be baptized before he can be saved, it is high time that it went to pieces! Now, would you not denounce that so-called church man as a wolf in sheep's clothing, and decide that the sooner he is dismissed the better? Would you not say that if he can not believe in the creed of the church, and have proper respect for its officers, he has no business to claim membership? This is just the way with those Alliancemen who are consorting with politicians and enemies to our order, who delight to abuse and slander our leaders, and ridicule the Ocala platform. They have no more business in the Alliance than has a scuffer at religion or an infidel in a Christian church. You can always tell a man by the company he keeps, and when you find an Allianceman cheek-by-jowl with the old town politicians, you may just set him down as an enemy to the Alliance at heart.

FACTS AND FICTION FOR FAIR FEMALES.

One Husband Who Doesn't Stay Out So Late Now—A Young English Girl Relieves a Testimonial from the Royal Humane Society—Femininities.

When the Clock Ticks Loudest.

AFTER she had kissed him on her return from a visit to relatives in another city she asked:

"Well, John, how did you get along without me and the children?"

"Not very well," he replied. "The next time you go away I'll shut up the house and go to a hotel."

"Oh, you don't like to be alone here?" she asked.

"No, I don't," he returned. "The house is overrun with rats."

"Rats!" she exclaimed. "Why, there isn't a rat in the place."

"Hang it!" he said, "didn't I hear 'em? Didn't I hear 'em nibbling and scratching away all night? Didn't they keep me awake half the time? I hadn't more than got to bed the first night when they started in with their scratch, scratch, scratch."

"They are mice, John," she explained. "I've occasionally had a little trouble with mice."

"Well, it's mighty strange I've never heard 'em before," he said. "And that clock—"

"Where is it, John?" she asked, looking about the room.

"It's in the pantry," he replied. "The blamed thing nearly drove me crazy. Why, the first night when I settled down for a quiet smoke it acted like a fire alarm. There wasn't a sound in the house, but the first thing I knew the old thing was ticking with a distinctness that nearly had me insane. After it had forced itself on my attention fifty or sixty times and made me so nervous that I could hear noises in all parts of the house I put it in the pantry and shut the door."

"Did that do any good, John?" she asked with a slight smile.

"A little, but not much," he returned. "I could still hear it. I wonder what in thunder is the matter with it. I never heard it make as much noise before."

"Perhaps, John," she suggested quietly, "it is because you were never alone in the house at night before. I've known it to do the same thing when I was alone here at night. It never ticks so loud as then, there are never so many unusual noises at then."

He looked at her pretty sharply as she busied herself putting things to rights again, and then—well, he doesn't stay out so late nights now. He tries to get home, as he puts it, "before the clock begins to tick."

Spanish Creoles.

They present a restful contrast to their American sisters. While the American woman labors to push herself socially beyond whatever position she may be placed in, chafes over domestic occurrences, has spasms of despair over her failure to find a mission, bemoans her small value as a factor of the world, the Spanish woman knows, or at least recognizes, no social scale.

Whether her friend sells cigars or is in the commission business, he is her friend, and is endowed with ideal rank. He is, like herself, an exile from the kingdom of "the what-might-have-been."

A laugh greets the daily mistakes in domestic service which form the burden of the American woman's complaint; she has her mission from her birth—to be a true friend, wife and mother.

She floats down the stream of time; the American swims. She dances through life to the accomplishment of jets and compliments; the American marches through it to martial music.

She has no end in view. All thought is for the present moment. The American lives to leave an impress on her time. The Spaniard reaches an end, the American a destination. Death comes after ease no less than after struggle.

George Eliot said that God made woman to match the men, so that it rarely happens that even in the South the Spanish woman marries the American man.

The Spanish man cannot be taken too seriously, the American woman cannot be taken lightly. A balance of power is struck, and the nationalities live side by side in harmony, separated by a stream of deep individuality.

She Saved Her Friend's Life.

A young English girl, Miss Blanchette

Hays, has been awarded by the Royal Humane Society an honorary testimonial on vellum for saving the life of Miss Saunders at Oddicombe. Oddicombe is a small unfrequented bay between Dawlish and Torquay, where, the morning in question, Miss Hays was bathing, in company with Miss Saunders and another friend. The shore shelves down several feet, and it thus happened that Miss Saunders, after taking a few steps unexpectedly found herself out of her depth. Miss Saunders, who was quite unable to swim, exclaimed "I am drowning!" whereupon Miss Hays, without a moment's hesitation, swam out to rescue her. It was only with much difficulty that Miss Hays brought her companion ashore, for Miss Saunders made the common mistake of seizing her rescuer by the throat instead of around the waist, and, being a much bigger person, Miss Hays nearly sank beneath the weight. There were only a few persons on the beach at the time, and Miss Hays believed that the event had passed unnoticed, when the next day, to her great surprise, she was accosted by one of the fishermen of the place, who complimented her upon the bravery she had displayed. The testimonial which the society has bestowed takes the form of an album, in which is inclosed a parchment document bearing a record of the heroic deed. Miss Hays is naturally very much pleased at an act of recognition which she was much too modest to expect. It is an interesting fact that she has since succeeded in teaching Miss Saunders to swim, an act of which she herself has been a master ever since she can remember.

Fashions Thirty Years Ago.

Ah! who that remembers woman's dress of thirty years ago would be willing to return to it? Skirts full-gathered or plaited over great, clumsy, swinging wire cages, and very long, trailing not only over drawing-room carpets, but over the inexpressibly filthy streets; thin-soled shoes, mostly of cloth or thin kid; big bonnets with hideous little sheds called capes hanging over the backs of the wearers' necks, insecurely held in a position where they could neither protect nor ornament the head by broad ribbons tied in immense bows beneath the chin; long and wide circular cloaks fastened at the neck by two or three buttons, giving no protection to the arms, floating out behind as one walked, and holding the wind like the mainsail of a ship, while the distressed wearer vainly struggled to prevent her bonnet from falling off the back of her head with one hand and to lift her voluminous skirts from the muddy pavement with the other.

Ugh! How ugly all these fashions were! But youth was just as beautiful then as now and many are the blooming faces I can recall as they looked sweetly forth from their disfigurements. Yes, my dear, bright girls of from 16 to 20, your mothers and aunts were once just as beautiful as you are now. You don't believe me, I see, but it is true. And they were quite as happy and content with themselves and just as modest and "proper," too, though they saw no harm in accepting help from strangers and in going to balls and theaters without other attendance than that of "Brother Tom" or even "Cousin Fred." Circumstances alter cases.

The simple way of thirty years ago, when New York was more like a big overgrown village than a city, cannot be compared with the customs that have become necessary in one of the largest and certainly the most cosmopolitan of cities in the world.—Helen Evartson Smith, in New York Independent.

The poetic element lying hidden in most women is the source of their magnetic attraction.

It is a singular fact that most women play their cards best when they allow their partners to hold their hands.

THE RUSSIAN LOAN.

It Sharply Reveals the Attitude of Several European Powers.

During the month of October, says the Youth's Companion, the Russian Government offered in Paris a new loan of about $100,000,000. There are very few transactions among men that are usually governed more by hard-headed business principles, and less by sentiment, than the borrowing and lending of money; but in this case, for once, sentiment seemed almost to have gained the upper hand.

The French people and Parisian bankers subscribed for seven and one-half times as much money as the Russian Finance Minister proposed to borrow. Yet he had offered the loan at a lower rate of interest than his country had ever before obtained.

The success in Paris had been preceded by a refusal of the bankers of Berlin to assist in putting the bonds on the German market. Some of them were disposed to do so, but the German press, during the latter part of September, had been almost a unit in declaring that no patriotic German should lend Russia money, or help her in any way to get it.

Though the Russian Government sought the loan on the strength of allegations that the money would be devoted to railways and permanent improvements, the German papers professed to believe that it would really be expended on improving Russian preparations for war. They alleged that Russia is allied with France, and that German money lent to the Czar's Minister would therefore go to strengthen Germany's enemies.

Not long before that time two occurrences had specially excited German feeling against Russia. The Russian Government had prohibited the export of rye, and thus raised greatly the price of that grain in Germany, where it is largely consumed in making bread for the poorer classes and the army. Though the Russians founded this prohibition on the fact that a severe famine threatened her own people, the Germans seemed to regard it as an act of hostility to themselves.

They also were vexed at the enthusiastically friendly reception given to the French fleet, not long before, at the Russian port of Cronstadt.

Hence the Berlin bankers would have nothing to do with the new loan, though they had strongly supported Russian credit so long as Bismarck's policy kept the Emperors of Germany and Russia on friendly terms.

The Cronstadt incident of course pleased the French as much as it annoyed the Germans, and Paris was all the more disposed to take the loan because Berlin scouted it.

English and Dutch capitalists profess a suspicion that Russia devotes more money to military purposes than she pretends to use in that way; and they also suspect that she pays interest on old loans out of new ones, and not out of revenue. For these reasons Russian loans have not been popular in London and Amsterdam for some years past.

Nevertheless, the credit of Russia has risen rapidly of late years. She is a frequent borrower, and owes about one thousand million dollars to foreign lenders besides, it is supposed, about five times as much to creditors within her borders.

French investors are said to hold something like half of all the bonds that Russia has given for her foreign borrowings. Hence the French are materially interested in supporting Russian credit.

But there can be no doubt that their subscription to the new loan would have been of less surprising magnitude had they not desired to signify good will to Russia, and opposition to her neighbor and their own. And on the other hand German bankers would have been by no means so suspicious as they professed to be of Russian credit, if the old friendliness between the two powers had not been somewhat weakened.

Is a Cold Winter Coming?

"This is going to be a very hard winter," said an old resident a day or two ago, "and I'll tell you why I say so. In the first place look at the hornets' nests. That's a sure sign of a hard winter. If it was going to be a mild winter you would find them near the ground. Two years ago and three years ago the winters were mild and the hornets' nests were low down. Then take the angle worms for another sign. Dig in the ground now and you will find them crawling two feet or more below the surface. They know what kind of weather is coming and they go down to avoid the frost. Two years ago I found them not three inches under the surface and they stayed there all winter."

Fuzz on hogs is another sure sign of a hard severe winter. Butcher a hog now and you will find a thick fuzz at the roots of the bristles. The fuzz wouldn't be there if the next winter wasn't going to be a tough one. Two or three years ago this fall there wasn't any fuzz at all on hogs, and you know how open the winters were. I predicted a hard winter in 1853 from these signs and my neighbors ridiculed me, or tried to, but we got in just as I said. I have so much faith in the signs that I got a lot of boys to trap all the quail for me that they could. I wintered over 200 quail, and in the spring of 1856 there wasn't a live quail in the Lackawanna Valley except the ones I had. I turned them all loose at various points, and in the fall we had some good shooting, which we wouldn't have had if I hadn't paid attention to the signs."—Allentown Chronicle.

Ten Anxious Minutes.

While Captain Anderson, author of "A Cruise in an Opium Clipper," was trading in Formosa, he had beef to the shore with some of his men, on a wild and almost unknown part of the island, to rescue the crew of a Dutch schooner. On their way they had fallen in with a band of native wreckers, and had been compelled to fire upon them. The Dutch crew was rescued, and Captain Anderson and his men started on their return to their own ship.

Our way took us in single file through a narrow pass, and as I entered it at the head of my men, for a second my heart almost ceased to beat at the startling sight that met my gaze.

The pass was lined on both sides with ferocious looking natives, armed with pole axes, spears, huge knives, and many other death-dealing instruments.

Although I was taken flat aback by the sight, some instinct carried me forward sword in hand, looking to the right and left with a cool, staring eye, which seemed to curb the revengeful spirit of the natives.

On arriving at the other end of the defile, I stopped, turned round, saw all the men safely through, and then told them in unmistakable English to make a clean pair of heels for the ship, while I brought up the rear at a sharp pace as soon as I had got a little way from the entrance of the pass, so that the natives might not see us in too great a hurry.

How they let us through without touching a hair of our heads, or once making a motion toward us, passes my comprehension. A kind Providence had certainly watched over us for that time, and, shame to say, not one of us returned thanks to God for our preservation.

Their Reasons.

A prominent singer who began his career in giving concerts about the country had some extraordinary experience in towns where such entertainments were of rare occurrence. One night, when he was persistently applauded, he returned to sing a second song, but was surprised by a stentorian voice from the audience.

"Oh, we don't want nothin' new! Sing the fust piece right over agin!"

At another time, the audience was so wildly appreciative that it refused to consider the concert at an end, and clamored loudly for just "one more." It was given, and then another demanded. Patience failed the singer at this point, and he begged his manager to go before the curtain, and state that he really was unable to sing any more. And thus was the statement worded:

"Ladies' and gentlemen: Mr. Martin can't sing no more to-night. He can't, honest. His wind's give out!"

A similar story comes from another singer who could not refrain from telling it although her 7-year-old niece, fastidious little lady, pronounced it "not a very pretty story, auntie!"

The lady had been taken ill after eating some decoction of ancient lobster at the hotel, and sent her manager word that she really could not sing. He accordingly appeared before the disappointed audience, and announced:

"Ladies and gentlemen: Miss Merriam aint here to-night. She couldn't come. She aint in fit circumstances to sing. Her stomach's troubling her!"—Youth's Companion.

"I Don't Care a Rap."

Sometimes these words are wafted past my pulpit from the lips of some defiant boy or girl—who, by the way, may care a great deal in spite of this off-hand assertion to the contrary. I never quite knew what the impression meant, but I suspected it alluded to a rap on the hand or head until I one day heard the dear Little School-marm explaining to the deacon that a rap was a counterfeit coin formerly used in Ireland as small change. It was the smallest coin and one of the very least worth, and so folk came to express their utter indifference to a thing or a circumstance by exclaiming: "I don't care a rap!"—"Jack-in-the-Pulpit," in St. Nicholas.

A Voodoo Charm.

A negro was thrashed in Galveston by another negro on the ground that he had attempted to separate the latter from his wife through voodooism. While he was on his way to a hospital in a patrol-wagon he gave to a detective what is known among the negroes as a "jack," which is thus described: "It is composed of several items, among others a certain bone of a graveyard rabbit, a finger-nail taken from off the finger of a dead man, some hair, a earstone, a bone of a jet-black cat, all sewed up in a red flannel bag about the size of a very large strawberry, and having something of the same shape and appearance."

Though manufactured abroad, a home spun article—a top.

The Intelligence Girl.

She ambled into the office looking like the champion lady performer in a skating rink, and the little man behind the counter hustled forward to wait on her.

"Yer get places for girls?" she inquired, setting the furry trimmings of her cloak all a-flutter.

"Yes, mum! Do you want a second girl or one for general housework, mum? I've some girls coming in this morning. I expect one from the country every minute."

"That's me," said the girl at the counter, giving her furs another flutter.

"Land, mum—miss. I thought you was a missus lookin' for a girl," said the surprised man.

"I'm a girl lookin' for a place—not much missus in mine, though. Now you send me to a good place and here's your dollar."

"An' here's your place," said the man, giving her a number. "You'll find them O. K. Their girl got married, so they want a new one."

"What kind of a house is it?" asked the girl.

"Go 'an' see for yourself, miss," was the curt answer.

And she went. At noon she rung the bell of a house on Alexandria avenue and when the mistress opened the door she announced herself.

"I'm the new girl."

"Oh, come right in. I'm so glad you've come. We haven't a loaf of bread in the house."

"I'm not expected to do the baking, am I?" asked the girl.

"Didn't you do that in your last place?"

"I never lived out before."

"Oh, you'll soon learn," said the lady encouragingly. "I'll show you myself. You can wash, I suppose?"

"You don't expect me to do the washing, do you?" asked the girl, setting her furs in violent motion.

"Well, I suppose I can do that myself," answered the lady ironically; "perhaps you wouldn't object to washing the dishes?"

"Why, I kin away from home to get rid of washing dishes, 'cause the hot water chaps my hands."

"May I ask what you can do?"

"Oh, I don't mind sweepin' and helpin' to make the beds and settin' the table. But I don't think I'll suit. There ain't no electric lights in the house, is there?"

"No."

"The doctor says gas isn't good for me eyes. How many times a week can I go out?"

"Just once. There is the door. I won't detain you another minute," answered the lady, indignantly.

The little man at the intelligence office had just buried his nose in a newspaper, when a flutter of fur announced the return of the girl from the country.

"The idea!" she exclaimed, "they expected me to wash and bake like a bound slave. Aint' you got a place where the girl won't have to do such things? If ye aint, you can give me back my dollar."

She got the dollar.—Free Press.

The "Siberian Bloodhounds."

In view of the discussion regarding the Massachusetts law, it may be interesting to know the origin of the so-called "Siberian bloodhound."

Some twenty years ago George E. Stevens first introduced to the general public a number of great Danes, which he imported for use in an "Uncle Tom's Cabin" company. He pictured them on his bills as great ferocious monster, with red mouths and blood-dripping lips, in pursuit of Eliza Harris. To further thrill the public he called them "Siberian bloodhounds."

The name originated in his own fertile brain and was purely the inspiration of a theatrical manager who was seeking something sensational for advertising purposes. These animals, heavily chained and muzzled, he paraded up and down the streets in the different cities he visited. Other enterprising managers soon followed his example, and within a few years every place of any importance had been introduced to the great "Siberian bloodhounds."

It is not to be wondered at that an ordinary legislature made the mistake of believing that these dogs lived on raw human blood. Mr. Stevens now lives at St. Joseph, Mich., and while he has discarded the "Siberian bloodhounds" and "Uncle Tom's Cabin" he maintains a kennel of sporting dogs and manages a theatrical company of a different kind.—Forest and Stream.

Hot Water Relieves Thirst.

It is a mistake to suppose that cold drinks are necessary to relieve thirst. Very cold drinks, as a rule, increase the feverish condition of the mouth and stomach, and so create thirst. Experience shows it to be a fact that hot drinks relieve thirst and "cool off" the body when it is in an abnormally heated condition better than ice-cold drinks. It is far better and safer to avoid the free use of drinks below, in fact a higher temperature is to be preferred, and those who are much troubled with thirst will do well to try the advantages to be derived from hot drinks, instead of cold fluids to which they have been accustomed. Hot drinks also have the advantage of aiding digestion, instead of causing debility of the stomach and bowels.

THE SWEETNESS OF LIFE.

It fell on a day I was happy,
And the winds, and the convex sky,
The flowers and the buds in the meadow Seemed happy even as I,
And I stretched my hands to the meadow,
To the bird, the beast, the tree;
"Why are ye all so happy?"
I cried, and they answered me.

What sayest thou, oh meadow,
That stretchest so wide, so far,
That none can say how many Thy misty marguerites are?
And what say ye, ye roses,
That o'er the sun-blinded wall
From your high black-shadowed trellis
Like flame or blood-drops fall?
"We are born, we are reared, and we linger
A various space, and die,
We dream, and are bright and happy,
But we cannot answer why."

What sayest thou, oh shadow,
That from the dreaming hill
All down the broadening valley
Lies so sharp and still?
And thou, oh murmuring brooklet,
Whereby in the noonday gleam
The loose strife burns like ruby,
And the braided asters dream?
"We are born, we are reared, and we linger
A various space, and die,
We dream, and are very happy,
But cannot answer why."

And then of myself I questioned,
That like a ghost the while Stood from me and calmly answered
With a slow and curious smile:
"Thou art born as the flowers and wilt linger
Thine own short space and die;
Thou dreamst and art strangely happy,
But thou canst not answer why,
—Thou'st Companion."

ENRICHED BY A PANTHER

Among the residents of a large mining town in the far West there lives George Randolph, a mining king, who by nature is as stern and arbitrary as men are apt to be when they acquire sudden riches. In addition to his gold he possessed a rare treasure in person of his daughter Bessie, as sweet a 17-year-old maiden as ever lived.

Pretty Bessie did not lack for lovers, and quite as naturally the favored one was the very one that her father objected to.

Clyde Brown was frank spoken, with an honest, manly face, a true, loving heart, and little else.

"Why, Elizabeth,"—her father always called her that when displeased—"how can you forget that we are descended from the Randolphs of Virginia? Just a little longer, daughter—a year or two at the most—and we will go East and live as other people do. Then my jewel may find a worthy setting."

"I want no one but Clyde, papa," protested Bessie tearfully.

But tears made no impression upon the hard heart of George Randolph.

"However, he condescended to give a conditional consent to their union—such an absurd condition that people laughed and shook their heads and Bessie's merry face grew grave.

"When you can show the possession of $100,000 you can have her," he said grimly, in answer to Clyde Brown's manly petition. "Until then I'll hear no more about it."

"You can never do it," sobbed Bessie when they stood alone in the moonlight by the road a few moments later, while her father watched angrily from the window. "Fortunes are wonderfully made in these mines sometimes, but none will fall to us."

"Don't be discouraged, my precious Queen Bess," Clyde returned, with all a lover's unreasoning fondness. "Only trust in me through all and wait for me, no matter what may happen. Will you promise me that?"

"Indeed I will dearest! You know that I would before you asked," she murmured. "But do not try me too much, for father is as hard as a rock."

"I must go away for awhile, my darling. Somewhere in yonder endless chain of mountains a fortune is waiting for me. I feel it—I know it as well as if it were already in my grasp," he answered, in solemn earnestness.

"God grant that it may be so," she added.

And then she walked slowly to the house, to her father's great relief.

The next morning Clyde left the town, fully equipped for a prospecting tour, and quite alone excepting the three large dogs which followed sedately at his heels.

For some time the prize which he sought eluded him, but it came to him at last in a strange manner.

One day, after following the course of a noisy, shallow stream into a narrow valley hemmed in by lofty mountains, he camped at the foot of a gigantic tree near the water.

The dogs whined uneasily and sniffed at a hole among the roots of the tree, but he called them away and went on building a fire to cook supper from the loose wood and branches around.

"Now that the fire is ready," he mused aloud, "I wonder if I'll find any game hereabout."

As if in answer, a half-grown deer came down to the stream on the opposite bank not many rods away.

It stopped, with one foot upraised, and looked at the dogs with startled eyes; but the next instant the report of Clyde's rifle rang out, the deer leaped into the air, sprang forward and fell into the stream, from which it was soon dragged by the dogs.

But the echoes made by the report had not died out among the hills before another sound arrested them.

It was the sound of an angry panther from the mountains behind him, and it was instantly answered by another far down the valley on the left.

Clyde heaped the dead limbs upon the fire, and the dogs, usually as brave as lions, whined piteously as they skulked close to his feet.

He waited in breathless anxiety for several minutes, but could hear nothing except the crackling of the fire, which now threw a wide circle of light, and the night wind among the trees.

Soon, following a magnetism he could not account for, he fixed his gaze upon a tall tree near the base of the mountain and encountered the glare of two fierce, yellow eyes.

A panther was crouching there upon a long limb, every nerve of his fire in motion as he prepared for the fatal spring.

To aim and fire was the impulse of a second, and the tawny brute sprang outward with a snarl of rage and pain, and fell squarely into the fire.

There was an unearthly shriek, a smell of burning hair, a shower of coals and lighted wood, then the brute stood wounded and blinded near the tree.

"At him, boys; at him!" cried Clyde.

And the dogs closed on him, but, wounded as he was, he was more than a match for them.

He killed one and sent the others howling to a safe distance before their master could surely aim the second bullet, which quieted him.

He was not an instant too soon, however, for there came another terrific scream, this time from the tree directly over his head.

"I'm ready for you now!" he cried, coolly sighting another panther directly between the scintillating eyes.

He fired and sprang aside, while the animal fell, struck the ground with a heavy thud, clawed the earth and air convulsively, for a few seconds, and then lay quite still.

"This is getting interesting," muttered Clyde grimly eyeing the two huge, tawny bodies, the dead dog and the skulking living ones, while he threw fresh wood on the scattered fire and peered in every direction.

"Meow! Meow! Set-t-t!"

He turned sharply to see the heads of two panther cubs thrust out of the hole near the tree, their ears laid close to their round heads and their eyes sweeping the scene in fierce inquiry.

"Ha, ha! A regular family party I've stumbled on," laughed Clyde. "S-s-s! Seek 'em, boys!"

And the dogs pulled one kitten out to his death, while the others scrambled back in the hole.

Suddenly there was a slight noise in the edge of the forest, and two half-grown panthers came cautiously into the circle of the light, sniffing the air uneasily and evidently afraid of a trap.

The smell of the scorched hair and the blinding glare of the fire puzzled them.

But Clyde did not wait for them to become satisfied of the safety of an attack. He fired two shots in quick succession, killing one animal and badly wounding the other, which the dogs attacked at once.

When the sharp, short flight was over, one dog limped back to receive the praise of his master, while the other lay dead beside its dead foe.

"You and I are alone now, Brave," my boy," said his master, patting the dog's head. "Well, when daylight comes we'll see after that little varmint in the hole."

The night passed without further molestation, but Clyde kept the fire burning brightly while he busied himself in skinning three of the panthers—the one which had sprung into the fire being worthless.

Two were monstrous brutes, male and female, evidently the parents of the smaller pair as well as the kittens.

After a generous breakfast of roasted venison he enlarged the hole with his pick and shovel, and after examining his revolvers, crept cautiously with a lighted torch, while the dog remained outside protesting against such foolhardy conduct by dismal yelps and whines.

The cavity under the spreading roots was deserted, but a larger opening led into the rocky mountain side, and through this the astonished young man crept, to find himself in a natural cavern.

He soon discovered and killed the kitten, but could find no signs of any more.

The floor of the cave was covered with bones, and a neatly made nest of sticks and leaves was in one corner. But Clyde did not notice these: he was examining the rocky sides, which were of a peculiar veined grayish stone.

There was a smile of satisfaction on his face when he had finished this examination, and when he crept forth into daylight again he muttered, tweaking Brave's ears until the dog yelped in pain and wonder:

"Queen Bess is mine. Brave! There's gold enough there to satisfy even George Randolph. I should say, and I claim it as the panther's bequest."

George Randolph could say no more, although he insisted on visiting the panther's den to see for himself.

"Some folks are lucky," he admitted, reluctantly. "If that mine is worth $100,000 you can have her, for a Randolph never goes back on his word."

That was only a year ago, and the mine has already netted its owner over $500,000.

But he regards as a dearer prize the loving wife who rules his heart and home—his Queen Bess.—Saturday Night.

Beating Time.

Recent investigations into the origin of the baton, or stick for beating time, which is used nowadays by the conductor of every large orchestra, have brought out the interesting fact that the first conductor's baton was a formidable staff, about six feet long, which the old-time French musician, Lully by name, who invented it, may have used as much to intimidate the members of his orchestra as to mark the time. In the very oldest orchestras, as in Chinese orchestras of the present day, there was no conductor in the modern sense. Every performer played as well as he could, and the man who played upon the loudest instrument—the kettledrum, for instance—marked the time for the rest.

When music became more systematic and refined, the chief command of the orchestra was given to the member who was regarded as the most accomplished and skillful. He assigned the other members to their parts, drilled them at rehearsals, and supervised the final performance.

To produce a good effect, it was necessary of course, that the musicians should play in time, and the chief of the orchestra, who himself played one instrument, was accustomed to mark the beat by stamping on the floor with one foot. For this reason the conductor of an orchestra was at that period called the peditarius.

Afterward it became customary for him to give the time by clapping the fingers of his right hand against the hollow of his left. The beater of time after this fashion was called the manuductor.

Meantime experiments were made in marking the time by striking shells and bones. The bones were soon given up as instruments to be used by the conductor of an orchestra; but they survived as an independent instrument. Boys and negro minstrels "play on the bones" with great gusto to this day.

In the early part of the seventeenth century the musician already alluded to, Lully by name, arose. He found all these instruments of leadership ineffective, and in order to reduce his performers to complete subjection, he procured a stout staff six feet long, with which he pounded vigorously on the floor to mark the time.

One day, becoming particularly impatient, and pounding with especial vigor, Lully struck his foot instead of the floor with his baton. The wound gangrened, and Lully died from its effect in 1687.

The baton continued in use throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, but though it gradually decreased in size, there is no evidence that conductors marked the time in any other way than by pounding upon their music-stands or some other hard object.

All this pounding must have had an unpleasant effect upon the music, and critics and musicians began to ridicule the practice. In course of time, therefore, we find musical conductors no longer thumping upon the floor or their music-stands, but beating the time entirely in the air. It seems to have taken players a very long time to learn that they could get the time as easily by means of the eye as by means of the ear.

A Snowball for Rent.

The tenant of a large farm at Broadhouse, near Lunset, County of York, England, holds the right to the property as long as he shall pay a yearly rental of "a snowball at midsummer and a red rose at Christmas" to the owner, Godfrey Bosville, Esq.

One of the Dukes of Scotland relinquishes his rights to his lands if it should ever get warm enough to melt the snow from the highest peak of the highest mountain in Scotland.

William de Albemarle holds the manor of Leaston, "by the service of finding for our lord, the King, two arrows and one loaf of oat bread when the sovereign should hunt in the forest of Eastmoor." Although the forest is no longer a hunting ground, and arrows have long since given place to rifles and shotguns of the best make, still the heirs of Albemarle keep the arrows and the oat bread ready for any stray king that may happen that way, thus holding good the good title to their estates.

Solomon Attefield and heirs hold land both at Repland and attertop, upon condition "that as often as our lord, the King, shall cross the sea, Solomon or his heirs shall accompany him to hold the royal head in case of seasickness."

John Compes had the manor of Finchfield given him for the service of "turning the spirit" at the coronation of Edward III.

Geoffrey Frumbrand and heirs hold sixty acres of land in Suffolk, England, on condition that they pay the King a yearly rental of two white doves.

OUR DADDIES' STYLES.

High Boots Will Be Worn by Men With Follow the Fashions.

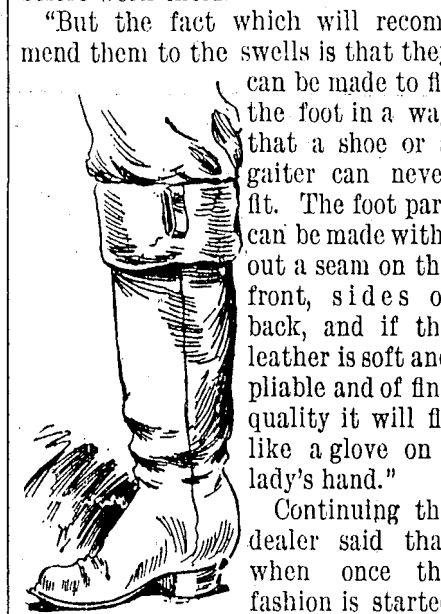

The young man who aspires to the fashionable in the way of wearing apparel had better be on the lookout for a big surprise within the next six months. On undisputed authority a New York Morning Journal man obtained the knowledge that before long shoes would be discarded for street wear by the men who lead the fashions, and that long-legged boots would take their place. This is an astonishing statement to make, but the man who made it was willing to pledge his professional reputation that it would come true. He is a boot and shoe dealer on Broadway, and he has made the footwear of more than one President of the nation, dozens of Congressmen, United States Senators, and municipal leaders during the last twenty years.

"It is the big men of the country who really help to set the style," he said. "They don't do it intentionally, but they are accountable in a great measure for the radical changes. It is a common trait in human nature for men of obscurity to ape the dress and manners of men who have achieved prominence and fame."

"Dozens of well-known men wear boots to-day who are not suspected of it," he continued. "Long-legged boots in cold weather are really the most comfortable kind of footwear. They are warm and are almost certain to keep the feet of the wearer dry. Then they support the legs and ankles and brace a man up generally in a way surprising to persons who have never before worn them."

"But the fact which will recommend them to the swells is that they can be made to fit the foot in a way that a shoe or a gaiter can never fit. The foot part can be made without a seam on the front, sides or back, and if the leather is soft and pliable and of fine quality it will fit like a glove on a lady's hand."

Continuing the dealer said that when once the fashion is started it will spread like wildfire. Of course for evening dress, he said, the low patent-leather shoes would prevail as at present. The boots, however, leg and all, could be made of patent-leather. They might cost as much as $55, but a pair of good boots could be got for $6 or $8.

The dealer gave the Journal man some of the names of men who wear boots and the different kinds. In the fall and winter season ex-President Cleveland wears a Wellington boot. It is made of Russian leather and the front part comes to the knee. It is cut down on either side and in the back so that, when he is sitting, it will not cut into the leg.

James G. Blaine wears a boot of the Wellington pattern, like Mr. Cleveland. The Secretary of State is very proud of his foot, and his boots fit like a lady's glove.

Russell Sage wears boots, but they are of no particular kind, except that they are greatly in vogue among Long Island farmers. They have numerous wrinkles of all sorts and sizes. Mr. Sage doesn't wear boots for style, but for comfort and convenience. Not infrequently in stormy weather he tucks his trousers into his boots, and then his foot-SENATOR BRICE'S gear can be seen at its best.

President Harrison wears a boot the style of which he created himself. It is a combination of the Wellington and that worn by the life-guardsmen of London. The genuine life-guard boot reaches far above the knee, and has an enormous flap for the protection of the soldier's legs from a sabre-cut. The president's boot does not reach quite to the knee, but the flap is on the order of the life-guard's. This gives the upper part of his leg free motion, especially when he is in a sitting posture.

Senator Calvin S. Brice wears boots almost constantly. He wears two kinds, the Blucher and the Wellington, and likes one as much as the other.

The boot dealer says that when the fashion is at its height he has no doubt that it will be greatly exaggerated by dudes who will wear long patent-leather boots on the life-guard style on the outside of their trousers.

Malign Passions.

The most prominent of the malign passions are anger, hatred, envy, jealousy, moroseness, selfishness and avarice. All of them tend to social disorder and individual demoralization. The seat of the affections is in the brain, and the harm done by evil passions is first upon the brain itself. It is not confined there, however, since the brain controls the other organs.

Outbursts of anger disturb the action of the heart. Many an angry person has fallen dead in his rage, as did one of the greatest medical experts of England. The character of the secretions may be changed under its influence so that the mother's milk may become poisonous; or the process of secretion may be arrested, causing the stomach to lose its digestive power.

Envy and jealousy often give rise to anger with all its bad physical results. They kill out the healthful influence of the benign affections, and permanently disfigure the "human face divine."

Avarice, long indulged, destroys the normal balance of the brain, and at length shrivels it up by concentrating nourishment on the part which is concerned with getting and holding. Its final result is that wretched being, a miser.

Moroseness is often worse in the home than an occasional outburst of violent anger. The one expends itself in the act; the other tends to perpetuate its evil influence indefinitely. Its effect on others reacts on itself.

A home with a morose mother is worse than one with a morose father. The father may get rid of his ill-humor in the outdoor sunshine, or in the excitement of business, or under the influence of his associates. At all events, he takes it away with him. A morose mother, on the other hand, enshrouds the whole house in gloom from morning till night.

Such moroseness is often the effect of disease, but when it is not it tends directly to produce disease, especially by its action upon the liver and digestive tract.

All the passions are strengthened by indulgence, and at a late stage are exceedingly hard to overcome. Hence it is very important to begin gaining mastery over them early. A strong will, backed by a strong moral purpose, is equal to the task. Mothers should seek to cultivate in their children the opposite of the malign emotions—patience, cheerfulness, charity and benevolence.—Youth's Companion.

She Mustn't Show It.

Put yourself in your teacher's place. There you are, behind the big desk with a pointer, doing your level best to make forty boys understand why, if a locomotive with a driving wheel 12 feet in circumference goes 20 miles an hour the first third of the distance between stations, 35 the second third, and 40 the third third and stops 20 minutes for refreshments every 243 miles, and there are 337 stations, 15 miles apart, between here and there, the curvature of the earth doesn't affect the peach crop. You are trying to clear up this problem in the minds of those forty boys, and just as you are explaining the essential point in the thing, one of them takes advantage of your back and throws a wet paper wad into the middle of the example and it slides down the black-board, leaving a wet track right through your argument. You know then that at least one of those boys hasn't understood your explanations at all, and the other thirty-nine have missed the main point. But you mustn't get angry. Oh, no. That's what the boys want. They want to make you miserable. But you must not let them know how well they succeed. You must merely be stern. Things like this happen all day, and every day in the week. How do you like it?—Drake's Magazine.

A Sun Clock.

A Brussels clockmaker has invented a clock which is wound up by the sun, and requires no other attention than being placed near a window into which the sun shines. A shaft exposed to the solar rays causes an up-draft of air which sets the fan in motion. The fan actuates mechanism which raises the weight of the clock until it reaches the top, and then puts a brake on the fan till the weight has gone down a little, when the fan is again liberated and proceeds to act as before. As long as the sun shines frequently enough, and the machinery does not wear out, the clock will keep going. In London, at any rate, a time-keeper which only worked when the sun shone would be generally idle.—Great Divide.

A map showing the whole State at a glance is to be a feature of the Illinois world's fair exhibit. Weights will have to be arranged at the Cairo end to prevent Chicago from tipping the affair up.

Mrs. Emma D. Paok, Editor.

Oh! for a tongue of Fire,
Oh! for a pen of Flame
To rouse the Nation
To its glory and its shame.

This is woman's year (leap year).
We will not only ask but receive.

It is the farmer and the working man that believe the women their equal.

Labor troubles will continue until justice is done to those who toil.

No honest thinking man will oppose reform no matter by what political party it may come.

Give us the man or woman who is willing to battle for the oppressed.

If you would think well of men don't watch them, only listen to them.

Don't measure a man by what he promises, measure him by what he does.

Hideous want stalks abroad in Free (!) America and those who ask for justice are calamity howlers.

Women that want their rights must first strike the blow.

Study the Economic Questions of the day and prepare yourselves for future good.

Twenty years of our present condition would make abject slaves of the masses.

Every man who loves his wife and children should commence to think of their future. Let the mothers vote.

All people regardless of color or sex would be benefitted by the reforms demanded by the Farmers' Alliance.

The opportunity to achieve Freedom of the Ballot regardless of sex was never so apparent as it now is.

"For men only" the woman's column in our Sunday morning exchanges.

It is those whose whole lives have been spent in public office that are calling the working men anarchists.

When the so-called bosses are moving silently around with but little fuss or feather, watch them; they are incubating some scheme.

We take pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to the advertisement of the Alliance Seed House, Gove City, Kansas, in another column.

By a vote of 3 to 2 the Senate committee agreed to report on the Female Suffrage Bill favorably. Mrs. Laura A. Johns of Kansas will present the argument.

The People's party in convention at Jackson, Michigan, unanimously adopted a plank in their platform for equal suffrage.

Another addition to the Farmers' Alliance is reported from Washington D. C. It is Baby Otis and still some funny fellows insist the Alliance is dying out.

The Bond and Mortgage crop never fail in this country. Once planted they are sure to mature. Wet weather, dry weather, chinch bugs, gophers and cutworms do not effect them. All they need is fools enough to perpetuate the system that produces them.

"What are you women going to do at the St. Louis conference?" asks a prominent Alliance man. Why bless you, brother, don't you know this is leap year. We are going to ask for equal suffrage. Will you hearken unto us or will you reject our suit?

Brother M. W. Wilkins, formerly of the Non-Conformist is now publishing the Cincinnati Herald. It was hinted at one time that Brother Wilkins was the "Aunt Laura" of the Non-Conformist; be this true or not we were always deeply interested in "Aunt Laura's" writings. They were so real that thousands supposed it to be woman's work. The Herald now comes to us with nearly a page of this interesting matter and we would advise our lady friends to send for a sample copy. Address the Herald, Cincinnati, Ohio.

The world no longer permits the strong to kill the weak but it allows the wealthy to oppose the poor. Money is holier than man. Human life is less sacred than property. To save a dollar is regarded as a more necessary virtue than to save a human heart. Society cares more for fortune than for truth. It is easier to win your way with hypocrisy than honesty. The world does not ask what are you worth morally but what are you worth financially. Self interest has made it the object of life to injure our fellows. To get an advantage over another is a victory men seek. One must fall that another may rise. Will this ever be changed?

Now in the midst of a winter of discontent when our appetite is poor what is more palatable than a nice dish of canned fruit, jelly or preserves? It makes one think of the coming spring when our trees, plants and vines need transplanting, worthless ones removed and new and better sorts put in their places. We naturally inquire where we can obtain better varieties. We know of no better plan than to send to Mrs. J. C. Bare, Baldwin, Kansas, for her catalogue and prices. Mrs. Bare has been in the fruit growing business for a number of years and knows the varieties best adapted to our climate. We cannot recommend her too highly.

The South Leads.

The first State Convention of the People's Party for 1892, has been called by the executive committee of Louisiana to meet at Alexandria, February 17th, for the purpose of nominating a full state ticket. The old party papers that have so persistently claimed that the South would not favor the People's movement, will please make a note of the above or forever hereafter hold their peace.

Our Fire.

As announced by the Press dispatches, the burning of the Reed Publishing House, January 13, with a partial loss to the FARMER'S WIFE, destroying the forms, copy and proofs, delayed this, our January issue, a few days. We desire to inform our readers that our subscription books, advertising contracts, etc., are all saved, and the FARMER'S WIFE will be published on time. As heretofore we hope all of our subscribers will send us at least one new subscriber and in this way help us atone for the loss and damage we have sustained and let us here urge all whose time has expired to renew at once. We need all the help, be it ever so small. We have concluded to extend our club offer in another column until Feb. 15, in order that those who are at work getting up clubs may have a fair chance after receiving this issue. Kindly put your shoulder to the wheel now and send in your clubs. Send in all the names you have by the above date, be they more or less.

For the FARMER'S WIFE.

CROWNS.

BY AUNT LOUISA.

"Crowns?" I've always worn them.
In the beautiful "Long-ago,"
When life was a sunny day-dream,
With never a cloud of woe;

My own, true soldier lover,
Placed on my girlish brow
The royal crown of Wifedom,
Which I wear untarnished now.

And then, one blessed morning,
There knocked at my chamber door
A messenger, straight from the Father,
And—Motherhood's crown I wore.

Now, Time with tireless fingers,
Is wearing a crown of white;
As a silent, yet sure reminder,
I'm wearing the "Mansions of Light."

Strange I should be thought worthy,
These crowns, so fair and sweet,
Will each jewel they hold be in the crown,
I shall cast at the Savior's feet?

THE INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE.

To be Held at St. Louis, Feb. 22, Washington's Birthday—The Marthas Will be There.

The industrial organization known as the National Woman's Alliance have decided to take part in the conference, and have selected the following partial list of delegates:

Mrs. M. B. Cloud, Alabama; Mrs. Emma Ghent Curtis, Colorado; Mrs. Annetta Nye, California; Mrs. Marian Todd, Mrs. L. E. Roberts, Illinois; Mrs. Helen Gougar, Indiana; Mrs. Annabella McCoun, Kentucky; Mrs. Mary H. Ford, Mrs. Sue Snyder, Missouri; Mrs. Eva McDonald Valesh, Minnesota; Mrs. S. E. V. Emery, Michigan; Mrs. Elizabeth Rodgers, New Jersey; Mrs. Anna D. Weaver, New York; Mrs. L. D. Stillson, Arkansas; Mrs. E. M. Wardall, South Dakota; Mrs. Alice J. Taylor, Mississippi; Mrs. F. J. Blanchard, New Hampshire; Mrs. C. Estella Bachman, Pennsylvania; Mrs. Mary M. Clardy, Mrs. Bettie Gay, Texas; Mrs. Elizabeth Osborn, Virginia; Mrs. Anna L. Diggs, Mrs. Bina A. Otis, District of Columbia; Mrs. Helen Lockhart, Wisconsin; Mrs. D. F. Pierce, Washington; Mrs. Mary E. Lease, Mrs. Fannie McCormick and Mrs. Emma Paok, Kansas; Mrs. Mary A. Shafer, Nebraska; Mrs. M. L. Geffs, Ohio; Mrs. E. M. King, Florida.

Organized Working Women.

A London, England, paper in speaking of organized working women, says that the organization of women workers in trade unions is much more advanced in England than in America. At the labor congress nine women's societies sent delegates representing 5,116 members. The Matchmakers' Union numbers over a thousand members; the Nottingham Cigar-makers' Union has 800 members. On the other hand, some men's unions receive women members, and the Association of Weavers contain 26,000 women. The women laborer and her friends appear to become more and more convinced that their help lies not in the worn out expedients of charity, loans of blankets and Dorcas meetings or the opening of reading rooms, but rather in organization and legal interference with existing wrongs.

The following from the Cincinnati Herald shows conclusively how much the two old parties care for the rights of the people. For we still insist that the women are a part of the people. Ah! Well we will wait for the People's party and we will not have long to wait either and when they get in power we trust to them to decide the matter.

ELIGIBILITY TO THE BALLOT.

It may be interesting to some of our friends to know the result of a few minutes' examination of some of the laws governing the ballot in some of the western states. Take a glance, young men, and see where the law grades your mothers and sisters:

Kansas—Idiots, insane, convicts, criminals and women are excluded.

Minnesota—Idiots, insane, women and convicts.

Nebraska—Idiots, women and convicts.

Iowa—Idiots, insane, criminals and women.

Wisconsin—Insane, idiots, women, convicts, bribers, bootleggers and duellists.

Michigan—Duellists and women.

Illinois—Women and convicts.

Indiana—Boodlers, women and bribers.

Missouri—Insane, paupers, women and criminals.

It will be seen that the women of Michigan are not as good as convicts, and in Indiana they are crucified between two thieves.

There came to our table a marked copy from Silver Creek, Nebraska, and at the first glance we took it for a reform paper. But as we perused its columns we discovered our mistake and saw it was a wolf in sheep's clothing. It goes on to say that they had supposed that christianity had a patent and that people must join the church to be christians. Now here we will repeat their own words: That the word reform, and we will add to this the word christianity, are the two most abused words in the English language; for by their use many a vile person will provide themselves with a robe to hide their true motives and while clothed in garments that only belong to the pure in heart they go about seeking a chance to pull down the work of good people whose sole aims and purposes in life are to uplift the fallen." This most biggoted sheet takes the liberty of criticising the policy of the Woman's Alliance and says that it composed of a few ambitious women to get in office and cut a figure. It might be interesting for the worthy gentleman to know that the few he so gallantly refers to number about twenty thousand or more and that they are of the very best wives and mothers of the land and quite capable of filling any office (the president included) down to street commissioners and also that they are firm, earnest women who have suffered wrongs and injustice patiently as long as they will, and women who will never be satisfied until they can stand by the side of their husbands and with their ballots say who shall make the laws that they must obey. For shame on any husband who will speak of women with such disrespect. We take it for granted that he is married for we see the name of Mrs. Lillie M. Wooster as an Associate Editor; but perhaps he has his gray haired mother setting type and doing the office work while he rests in a nice luxurious chair smoking his cigar. Surely it is his wife or mother for such men as he are too shiftless to support themselves and if they have no mother they marry not because they love, for no man knows the first rudiments of love who will speak with such disrespect of true noble women.

"There is great excitement in the American Medical College at St. Louis," says the Woman's Journal. What is the excitement do you say? Why simply because some young ladies proposed to educate themselves as physicians and the bright young men of the college did not want them there (possibly they were afraid of their ability to surpass them in their studies) and after all indirect means to get rid of them and failing, of course (as women can not be so easily disposed of at the present day as in times past) they drew up a petition and presented it to the Dean Dr. E. Younklin, asking that women be excluded from the college, thinking, of course that the Dean would acquiesce in their little scheme when he boldly declared he should not think of turning out the women students but all those who would withdraw their names from the petition would be allowed to remain and those who refused might consider themselves expelled. Think of it, mothers, when your daughters seek to fit themselves for something better than a mere drudge and ask nothing but their rights that they must thus be subjected to insults by a class who claim they were made protectors for the weaker sex. Who ever saw woman so weak that she would condescend to stoop like that. The idea of young men having the audacity to get up a petition against the women students. What if the women should get up a petition to have them excluded from the college. Why it would be terrible. Fathers would rush to the rescue of their noble, manly, much-abused sons. The papers would be full of sympathy for the bereaved parents and it would be just and right that the world at large should pity them; but as it is women, well they ask no sympathy, they can fight their own battles with the help of a very few such noble men as the Dean and they will prove to the world in the future as in the past that woman can stand side by side with man in all and any vocation in life and petitions will never stop woman's rising. She was never intended to be content to dwell in the slums of the earth. The advantages of life belong to women as well as men and it is not her fault if man abuses his opportunities to rise while she grasps the least straw and climbs upwards and when on the topmost round of the Ladder of Fame she stands it is only woman who will reach down and help up the fallen brother. And who knows but what some of the students who took such an active part to have the doors of knowledge closed against their sisters will be the first to need their help. And will they be refused? Ah! No. It is woman's mission to help the weak.

Jottings From the National Capital.

MRS. BINA A. OTIS.

When we are within the four walls of our present abode in Washington, located near the rest of the people's delegation and their families, we can scarcely realize that we are at the Nation's Capital. One caller has given us just two months to fall into the "fashionable swim," but as that class is located in the northwest and we in the northeast part of the city, we do not think that their influence upon us will be preceptible. Thus far, the only fashionable extravagance to which we have indulged ourselves has been a ten days' siege of "la grippe."

There is a pleasure in visiting the scenes in and about Washington that that have a historic interest.

A little less than three hundred years ago, Captain John Smith sailed up the Potomac, and found the present site of Washington occupied by fierce and warlike tribes of Indians. Near the close of the seventeenth century a company of Scotch and Irish people from the Mother country made a settlement in what is now known as the District of Columbia, and the now valuable city lots of Washington were once cultivated by these wealthy farmers, some of whom became very wealthy from the sale of lots, and others lost all in speculation.

It was a pet project with Gen. Washington that the National Capital should be located on the banks of the Potomac and the members of Congress were ready to locate it in accord with his wish, but could not get enough members from the Eastern and Middle states to vote with them until a trade was made on Hamilton's Funding Bill.

It was in 1800, during John Adams' Presidency that the seat of government was moved to Washington. Mrs. Adams then called it the "wilderness city."

The White House was ready for occupancy but the east room was at that time unfurnished and was used for drying clothes on wash day, there being no suitable place in the yard.

"The Working Woman," published at Washington, D. C., asserts that mistresses of cabinet officers are on the rolls under assumed names, and have never done a day's work in office, yet draw their salaries regularly. Taxpayers, do you fancy paying your money for such purposes?

When we read the above we were led to ask the question, can this be true of men in high official position in a government of the people in a Christian land and in a city where one hundred and ninety churches point their spires heavenward—a city in which every American citizen ought to feel an interest as the political center of our grand Republic—a government that is supported by direct or indirect taxation, paid mostly by the hard earned money of the laboring people? It sometimes seems that we have a herculean task before us when we enlist as reformers; but we believe that it is a righteous cause and God will crown our efforts with success as he did those who battled for justice and right in the times of chattel slavery.

The time has arrived in our nation's history when, if the mothers of our country wish to preserve the homes of the nation and have their influence extend into public life, they must come bravely forward and grapple, not only with the political reforms, but aid in producing such a condition of society that every woman can earn an honest and honorable living. And that the fact of her following some of the avocations of life should in no wise cause slur upon her character.

Both halls of Congress to day would be vastly improved if both sexes were represented upon the floor of each house. Woman will never be able to protect herself until she is clothed with power of the ballot and made the political equal of man.

One of the peculiarities of Washington life is the fault, of turning night into day and having grand dinners at an hour when honest people should be in bed. No wonder that our public men are stricken down in prime of life.

Now, Mrs. Editor, will you pardon a little personal allusion? A mother's pride and love will not permit me to omit the mention of the arrival of our holiday present. A People's party baby girl come to gladden our home and to take part in future years in the living issues of the times. Our only trouble now is to find a name for her; we want something indicative of the reform movement of the present time. Her first present was an Alliance pair of socks with the accompanying note:

FOR BABY OTIS:

Our dear little People's baby,
Has numberless nighties and frocks;
Santa only asks to contribute
The Alliance pair of socks.

Your loving Santa Claus, KRS. JOHN DAVIS.

Now since her wardrobe is complete
From chin down to toe,
We'll give no more to the little Miss
But pray that she may live and grow.

And when to a woman she has grown,
(Now of this please make a note.)
Her name and friends will have a law
That for the People's party she can vote.

For the FARMER'S WIFE. THE PLUTOCRAT'S NATIONAL AIR.

[YANKEE DOODLE.]

Yankee doodle is the tune
The plutocrats delight in;
'Tis what they whistle, sing and play,
But it's never good for fightin'.
Yankee doodle is the stuff
To buy the voting cattle,
And 'bout election time you know,
We gold bugs make it rattle.

CHORUS:
Yankee doodle whoop 'er up,
And Yankee doodle dandy;
About election time you'll find
Our Yankee doodle handy.

Jim Blaine went down to Washington,
He wore his brain new trousers;
Said he, I've got my eye on one
Of Washington's big houses.
Then Harrison rose from his seat,
Dressed in the latest fashion;
Says he, now Jim you must retreat,
You put me in a passion.

CHORUS:
Yankee doodle whoop 'er up,
And Yankee doodle dandy;
About election time I'll have
Some Yankee doodle handy.
Then Wall street cried, see here my friends,
We'll fix the thing up dandy;
When nominating time comes round,
We'll have the right man handy.
But then I pray, don't be too fast,
Just pause and think a minute;
The South will never "eat our pie"
With a finger in it.

CHORUS:
Yankee doodle whoop 'er up,
And Yankee doodle dandy;
About election time you'll find
Our Yankee doodle handy.

So give Cleveland to the Democrats,
The "solid South" to rally;
Whichever way they count the votes,
You see we'll make it tally.
And Stanford is the man we've picked
To catch the Alliance people;
But wh ch they send to Washington,
We do not care a steeple.

CHORUS:
Yankee doodle whoop 'er up,
And Yankee doodle dandy;
About election time we'll have
Our Yankee doodle handy.

And so whatever way they vote,
You see we've got 'ur man, sir;
Whichever goes to Washington,
Good bye sub-treasury plan, sir.
Then let us meet and fix it up,
And always have our choice, sir;
Then fool the people till they think
They really had a voice, sir.

CHORUS:
Yankee doodle whoop 'er up,
And Yankee doodle dandy;
About election time we'll have
Our Yankee doodle handy.

PEPPER AN IMAGE-BREAKER.

From the Alliance Tribune.

If Senator Pepper never accomplishes anything more, the pace he set that body of old bald-headed seniors commonly known as the United States Senate in a two hours speech last Thursday, before he had held a seat down thirty days and in defiance of the old-time unwritten law that compels a new member to sit through the first session without opening his mouth, he will have distinguished himself and at the same time did the country a great service by over-riding and eliminating from that body a rule that had neither reason nor common sense back of it.

Hearing that Senator Pepper was to speak he was complimented—as only few men are, with full galleries.

His address was in support of Senator Stanford's land loan bill. He spoke clearly and without the least embarrassment, reading from manuscript.

It is said his speech was one of his best efforts, and when he began, two-thirds of the senators were in their seats, and for a short time—"fifteen or twenty minutes," the dispatches say, the senators listened attentively, and then they began to drop out and at one time they had nearly all vanished to the cloak rooms. When we consider that the most of the members of the senate rarely sit out a set speech on any question, and that much of Senator Pepper's speech was statistical and historical, the attention on their part was to be expected.

When we consider that Ingalls was in the senate two years before he made a speech, and Plumb a longer time before he ventured to address that body, it might be considered that Mr. Pepper was presuming a great deal in breaking the record, but sensible people will not view it in that light.

In this practical age of progress and advancements many images are being broken. Men and women with new ideas are coming to the front. Innovations in science, art and political economy are claiming attention, and the old world is getting too wise for the worship of images that have nothing but ignorance and superstition to sustain them.

Mr. Pepper is fresh from the people. He is from the people—one of the common people. He was sent to Washington to be heard—not to sit as an automaton and vote like a Pull parrot.

There is not a true Alliance man or People's party man in this state—in the United States we may say, but what commends Mr. Pepper's lifting the senate out of that old rut by bidding defiance to that old senseless rule.

W. H. UTLEY DEAD.

From the Alliance Tribune.

Wells H. Utley died Sunday at two o'clock p. m. at his home at Parsons, Kansas, of heart disease.

The deceased was one of the ablest men in the reform movement in the state.

He was the Union Labor candidate for Congress in the Third Congressional district in 1888, and the splendid campaign he made in that contest gave him prominence in the state, and in 1890 he took an active part in rendering signal service to the Alliance cause.

A few weeks ago he was selected as one of the delegates to the St. Louis conference February 22d, and he had been mentioned as a probable candidate for both Governor and United States Senator.

Mr. Utley's fine abilities, fluency as a talker and zeal for the cause of reform marked him as a most efficient worker, and his death a great loss.

Mr. Otis' Bill to Change our Monetary System, Reduce Interest, and Provide for Loans upon Land.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

That henceforth the money of the United States shall consist of the following kinds, to wit: First, all gold and silver coins of different denominations, now in use, or that may hereafter be coined, in weight and form as now provided by law, giving free and unlimited coinage alike to both gold and silver at the mints of the United States, in the ratio of one to sixteen; second, one and two cent copper pennies and nickel five-cent pieces in form and weight as now provided, under existing laws, in such quantity as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, to suit the demands of business; third, a paper money printed, engraved, numbered, signed, and stamped upon the best quality of paper, in manner and form, as the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall provide, and in denominations from one dollar to one thousand dollars, as the ordinary demands of business may require, each bill being made absolute money, and not in the form of a promise. The volume of such paper money to be determined as hereinafter provided.

Each and every kind of money mentioned in this section shall be interchangeable with each other, at par, and be a full legal tender for all debts, both public and private: Provided, That one and two cent copper pennies and nickel five-cent pieces shall be a legal tender only to the extent of five dollars in any one transaction.

SEC. 2. That there shall be created in the Treasury of the United States two distinct and separate funds, to be known, respectively, as, first, the general revenue fund; second, the land and loan fund. The general revenue fund shall be kept constantly in circulation, as far as possible, by being paid out for current expenses of Government, public improvements, and such other purposes as may be provided by law. And all money collected from duties on imports, internal revenue, sale of public lands, or any other source, and paid into the Treasury of the United States as a part of the general fund, shall be paid out and kept in circulation among the people as speedily and completely as possible. And the volume of money in permanent circulation in the United States shall consist as follows, to wit: First of all, the one and two cent copper pennies and nickel five-cent pieces, now or hereafter to be coined; and all the silver and gold coins of different denominations, now or hereafter to be coined, as provided in section one of this act. Second, an amount equal to forty dollars per capita of our population of paper money, as specified in section one of this act.

SEC. 3. That immediately upon the passage of this act the Secretary shall be required to have coined all the gold and silver bullion in the hands of the Government for any purpose; and to have prepared at as early date as possible two billion dollars of paper money in full accordance with section one of this act. And said Secretary shall give notice to all holders of gold or silver certificates, Treasury or national bank notes, United States bonds of every kind, or any form of paper indebtedness, whether the same is intended to circulate as money or otherwise, to present the same for payment on or before a certain date named: Provided, That the holders of gold or silver certificates may receive paper money therefor, if they so elect at any time of presentation: And Provided, That said notice shall specify that in case said gold and silver certificates are not duly presented by a certain date they shall be payable in any kind of money specified in section one of this act at the option of the Government: And provided further, That if any of the holders of obligations specified in this section shall fail to present the same for exchange or payment within reasonable specified time, the same shall become nonnegotiable and cease to draw interest.

SEC. 4. That from and after the passage of this act any person, corporation, or company who shall loan money in any part of the United States in excess of two per centum per annum, or who shall discriminate in their business contracts between the different kinds of money of the United States, or quote one kind of money, as specified in section one of this act, as below par with another kind, as therein specified, shall be liable to fine and imprisonment, the same as for counterfeiting.

SEC. 5. That from and after the passage of this act there shall be no more national banks chartered, or charters extended, or furnished with national bank currency, and all the national banks now in existence shall be closed up at the very earliest date possible. And no gold or silver certificates for bullion deposited shall ever be issued to be placed in circulation as money, or bonds of the United States issued for any purpose.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and empowered, immediately upon the passage of this act, to have prepared paper money, as specified in section one of this act, to the amount of three billion dollars, to be known as the land and loan fund, and to be held subject to the call of the governors of the different States of the Union, as hereinafter specified in section seven of this act.

SEC. 7. That any State in the United States desiring to avail itself of the benefit of the land and loan fund of the General Government shall so declare by joint resolution of the legislature thereof, and file the application therefor with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, under the signature of the governor and secretary of state, with the great seal of the State attached, setting forth, first, the joint act of the legislature; second, the name and number of counties in the State, giving their area and population; third, the valuation of the real estate in each county as shown by the last census; fourth, the total valuation of all property in the State, and asking that an account be opened in the name of the State with the land and loan fund in the Treasury Department of the United States, and asking that the governor of the State henceforth be permitted to draw upon said fund, from time to time, to an amount not to exceed fifty per centum of the assessed value of the real estate within such State; and also agreeing to pay to the General Government, on the first day of January in each year, an annual tax of one-half per centum upon all sums so drawn and retained during the preceding year out of the land and loan fund in the Treasury Department. And from and after the time of filing such application with the Secretary of the Treasury it shall be lawful for the governor and secretary of any State, under the official seal of the State, to issue a draft upon the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for any portion of said land and loan fund: Provided, That at no time shall any State be allowed to draw out from the Treasury a sum that in the aggregate is more than equal to fifty per centum of the assessed valuation of the real estate of said State, as shown by the last official census; nor to draw any money from said fund when said State is in arrears in the payment of the annual tax upon any money obtained during the preceding year.

SEC. 8. That in any organized county in the United States, having a population of not less than one thousand persons, it shall be lawful for the qualified electors at any general election, by a majority vote, to create what shall be known as a public land and loan commission, to be composed of seven persons. The county treasurer, county clerk, and register of deeds shall constitute three of such commissioners, and the other four shall be elected once in two years. And the members of such land and loan commission shall be considered officers of the county in which they have been elected, and shall have power in their official capacity to act for and in behalf of the county in all matters pertaining to their office, and shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations for the government of its officers and employees.

SEC. 9. That immediately after their first election, and upon the first Tuesday in January biennially thereafter, the persons elected as a land and loan commission in each county shall meet at the county seat of their respective counties, and shall proceed to organize by electing from their own number the following officers, namely, president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer, and shall at once notify the governor of the State of their action and organization, who shall cause a record of the same to be made in the secretary of the states's office.

SEC. 10. That after said commission has been duly organized they shall open an office at the county seat and through their proper officers make a draft upon the governor of the State for such amount of the land and loan fund in his hands and under his control as they may desire, not to exceed fifty per centum of the assessed value of the real estate within the county, paying an annual tax of one per centum thereof on the first day of January in each year, in the same manner as the State pays the General Government: And provided, That no call for money shall be honored by the governor of the State where any tax of the previous year is in arrears, or where the governor of the State has any reason to believe the loan commission is not properly organized or is not acting in good faith.

SEC. 11. That any citizen of any county in the United States where a public loan and land commission has been established can make an application for any sum of money, not to exceed five thousand dollars, furnishing real estate security therefor, whose assessed value, as shown by the books of the assessor, is double the sum sought to be borrowed. And when such application is filed in the office of the land and loan commission it shall be duly considered by the proper officer or officers, and, if granted, the applicant shall pay two per centum per annum as a tax therefor, to be collected and paid in the same manner as other taxes are collected and paid in the county. And the applicant may return the money thus borrowed at pleasure, and stop the tax from time of payment: Provided, That no application shall be considered or loan taken upon any real estate located outside of any incorporated town in excess of twenty-five dollars per acre, or upon real estate located inside of and incorporated town in excess of twenty-five dollars per front foot; and all applications for loans must be considered by the commission in the order of time in which such application is filed.

SEC. 12. UNCLE SAM'S FARMS.

It will soon be too late to obtain one of Uncle Sam's free farms. Oklahoma offers almost the last chance for the farmer invader to get a home cheap. Land that is located in a pleasant climate, and that will profitably produce corn, cotton, wheat and fruit, is worth looking at and working for.

IT looks a little as though the Czar's persecution of the Christian sect known as the Stundists were intended to take the edge from his persecution of the Jews. It was hardly necessary, however, for him to show that he is not particularly discriminating in his tyranny.

A MAN has too much sense, as a rule, to build a ten-thousand-dollar house on a thousand-dollar income, but church people do it in the matter of churches. They think in their early enthusiasm that the Lord will provide, but the Lord never provides for anything that is lacking in good business judgment.

THE postoffice department is not always rapid, but it is sure. A citizen of a neighboring state has just had returned to him a letter mailed a year ago with a notice from the department that the person to whom it

THE New York correspondents are trying to make it appear that the opening of the opera season was more brilliant and fashionable in that city than in Chicago. This is simply incredible. No one will believe that people of wealth and refinement in the boxes in New York could have talked any louder during the pianissimo passages than they did in Chicago.

THE proper place for the Bancroft library is in this city, the commercial, literary, artistic and political metropolis of the United States.—New York Press. Outside people have seen the crying need for a few good books in the "political metropolis" for some time past. If "the commercial, literary, and artistic" center will agree to read, no doubt the Sunday-schools all over the country would chip in with funds enough to make the purchase.

THE Rev. Lyman Abbott disposes of the charge that he has uttered grossly heretical doctrine by declaring that the heresy was in the reporter's ears, not in his sermon. It may be allowed to pass at that this time, but who listens to almost any clergyman of Dr. Abbott's ability, breath, and courage has always to strain his ears to catch the very microscopic thread of precautionary qualification which holds the orator to his theological moorings.

THE New York Sun thinks there is "a job" in the proposition to have Congress appropriate $5,000,000 for the World's Fair. The Sun is mistaken. It's only an opportunity to let Uncle Sam do his share, or let the rest of the country contribute about one-third as much as Chicago has for the fair, which, even New Yorkers have become convinced, is not to be a Chicago fair, but a world's fair, to celebrate the discovery of, not Lake Michigan, but of all America.

"SIR EDWIN ARNOLD has been tendered a reception by the Unsquibbaughs." "Miss Frances E. Willard has been tendered a reception by the Daughters of Josh." "Rev. Dr. Noah Absalom has been tendered a reception by the Church of the Holy Slipper." And so it goes on. If Sir Edwin has been tendered, to whom has he been tendered and for what purpose? If Miss Willard has been tendered, to what is she offered and what will come of it? If Rev. Dr. Noah Absalom has been tendered, where shall we look for him hereafter? There is no more general ungrammatical or vulgar pest of bad English than tendering people and not explaining the aim, motive or object of the tender.

A CRANK is liable to be generally rational though he may be weak-minded on a hobby. As a rule he fully appreciates the results of violence. Men of this character should be severely punished for acts of violence. Fear of severe punishment is a great element in the prevention of crime, especially with men of hobbies. It is the man whose sanity is totally wrecked who knows no fear, simply because he cannot appreciate the results of crime or of violence. The only practical preventive against cranks is to punish those who resort to violence with the full extent of the law that fits the crime for the influence it has on the brotherhood of cranks, and to confine insane people in asylums as long as there is the slightest possibility of their doing any injury to society.

THOUGH Mid-Armagh, where the Tory candidate for Parliament, Mr. Barton, was allowed to have a walk-over, is undoubtedly Tory by a good majority, the Home-Rulers would have measured their strength there but for the unfortunate division in their ranks. The seat was carried by the Tories in 1885 by 1,500 majority. At a subsequent election the Home-Rulers put forward their leader in Ulster, Mr. Thomas Dickson, and he cut down the majority to 1,200, running against a most popular Tory of liberal ideas. Were the Home-Rulers united now they might be able to still further reduce the Tory majority, but as they are divided a contest would only result in an increase of the Tory majority. Mid-Armagh is one of the thirteen seats which the Tories can hold in Ulster for many years to come. They hold sixteen all told, but three by majorities not exceeding 100. The Home-Rulers hold seventeen seats—four of them by narrow margins.

WHAT IS PRESENT DUTY.

By L. L. Polk.

Now what is our duty as alliance men? Plainly, it is to stand loyally and manfully by our principles, vote for no man nor party who opposes our principles, extend the hand of friendship and fellowship to any man or party who favors our principles. Place principles above parties. Place measures above men. Place country above section. Place love of home, of family, above the illusive and treacherous rewards of party service. Place right above wrong.

Let duty—the grandest word ever uttered in the dialect of mortal tongue—duty to God, duty to country, duty to home and family, be the sublime standard of our action in all things devolving upon us as citizens. Let us be diligent and faithful in all our duties as alliance men. Keep up and strengthen the organization. Encourage the wavering, strengthen the weak and confirm the strong. Continue to educate the people in the great principles of justice, equity and truth. The crucial test of our manhood and our loyalty to principle is upon us. Stupendous effort will be made by our enemies to so direct the campaign of 1892, as to disrupt and destroy our organization. Appeals to sectional pride or prejudice will be made. Let us answer that our order knows no north, no south, no east, no west. The disaffection or disloyalty of an occasional traitor in our ranks will be urged as evidence of decay. Let us answer that no human organization that ever had an existence was exempt from these. Party fealty and party spirit will be invoked to force an abandonment of our principles. Let us answer that we will stand by that party that will stand by us, and that we are not so blind as to expect relief at the hand of any political party that opposes our principles and seeks to destroy our organization. Weakness in numbers; and our disorganized condition as a political factor, will be paraded to prove our helplessness. Let us answer that the old Saxon spirit and courage which met this same base argument in two of the mightiest revolutions of modern times, and gave to the world this great country, has not yet died out in the hearts of the American people. Corporate power, centralized capital, and all their allied political forces, will be held up in formidable array to intimidate us. Relying on the justice of our cause, the invincible power of right and the favor of God, let us meet them with the only weapons left us—manhood and ballots.

"Equal rights to all and special privileges to none" is all we ask. A just and honorable people would be content with nothing less. Be not deceived by plausible devices involving a compromise of principles, or a betrayal of the high purposes of our order. Beware of gift-bearing Greeks.

PARTY SUCCESS FIRST.

From the Fort Dodge, Ia., True Democrat.

If there was any one thing more than another that gave the democrats their great majority in congress, it was their assumed attitude on the silver question. The tariff and force bills contributed something in that direction, but the greatest majorities came from districts where the alliance feeling was strongest, and it is well known that with them free coinage was a paramount issue. But now that they have got into power on this issue, we are informed that the subject will be relegated to the rear, and the voters who supported them under silver legislation, will be left in the woods holding the sack. We are told that "a majority of the members of the coinage committee undoubtedly favor free coinage, but a very large number of those on that side of the question believe that to agitate the question at this time would distract attention from the tariff question, upon which they think the presidential contest should be fought." That explains it all. No matter what the people may need, or how they may be distressed, party success must be looked after. The good of the country is of secondary importance, and incidental to the good of the party. Party first, patriotism afterwards is a rule with either of the old parties.

A ROTTEN SYSTEM OF FINANCE.

From the Erie Rivers, Mich., News Reporter.

The national bank association gives out as a fact that only 8 per cent of the business of this country is transacted with actual cash and the balance is credit. This admission is a give away of a rotten system of finance, which has made 31,000 millionaires and more than 2,000,000 of tramps. Credit is usury. It is the Jew Shylock system of banking which absorbs the wealth created by labor. It is the sweat board, chartered gambling, where heads I win and tails you lose. The credit system, which is utterly indefensible in a republic, a government of, by and for the people. The government (not banks) should issue money for the people in volume sufficient to do all legitimate business on a cash basis. When the chartered rob shops of this nation openly boast of having prostituted the business of this country to 92 per cent credit and only 8 per cent of actual cash in circulation, it is time to kick.

THEIR WORRY OUR SECURITY.

From the Colorado Workman and Farmer.

The old party papers find another premonition or a split in the alliance in the fact that Senator Peffer has spoken kindly of Senator Perkins, who was recently appointed by Governor Humphrey of Kansas. Probably with as much accuracy as they generally relate matters connected with the alliance, these papers report that Congressman Simpson antagonizes some of the sentiments of Mr. Peffer, and straightway construe this difference of opinion to mean a serious division in the alliance. One of the best evidences that the reform party is solidified and in no danger of rupture from trivial causes, is the anxiety the other parties manifest to see it divided. Scarcely a move is made by the people's party that is not sifted for something that can be tortured or magnified into a sign of disintegration. We are not concerned for the reform party's unity so long as this uneasiness is apparent in the ranks of others. If the old party organs were as sure of disruption in the reform element as they pretend to believe they would pass the whole subject with that contempt they so aptly affect and not waste time and space in predicting and asserting breaks which they so much desire.

CONFERENCE OF FEBRUARY 22.

From the Farmer Tribune, Des Moines, Ia.

It is understood that the great industrial conference of February 22, 1892, will be held at St. Louis. It will be one of the most important gatherings of the year which is destined to be crowded full of notable political gatherings. The meeting is called in order to give the representatives of the various industrial organizations in this country an opportunity to consult and agree upon the proper course to pursue in the great political struggle of 1892—to lay down a platform and pledge fidelity to it in the impending conflict.

The conference will doubtless declare for independent action. They have openly challenged the monopolies and organized greed to battle, and there will be no disposition to shun the conflict. If they enter the struggle thoroughly united, as now seems to be assured, their force will be irresistible. Thousands of business men throughout the country stand ready to join the ranks in support of a genuine people's movement and the incoming year may be looked forward to with intense interest.

THINKING AMONG THE MASSES.

The lethargy of a large majority of the masses in regard to public affairs is dying out. The people are awakening to the fact that their indifference to great public questions, their willingness to leave the discussion and settlement of these questions to a few favored and trusted individuals, has brought them to the deplorable and well-nigh hopeless state in which they now are. They are now arising everywhere, well aware of the fact that they have been deluded and robbed, and covered with shame for their past indifference and quietude under abuse and wrongs. They will sleep no more. The fact that the idle rich are all the time growing richer, while the toiling poor are constantly growing poorer, has stung them to the heart and they are everywhere thinking and talking on public questions as they have not done before in years. Masks are falling from the faces of sleek and wily politicians, and everywhere men—earnest, thoughtful, truthful men—are in demand.

THE BANKERS TAKE TOLL.

From the St. Louis Republic.

In response to the demand of the people of this country for a greater supply of circulating money, they are pointed to the fact that there is already a circulation of some $25 per capita. It is a great mistake, however, to compare this with the per capita circulation in other countries. What the people want is money for the people, not thousand dollar certificates nor twenty-dollar gold pieces. In England and France practically the entire gold coinage is in denominations of $5 or less. In this country the bulk of it is in twenty-dollar pieces, which effectually prevents gold from coming into general circulation. The American policy has been to provide a system of circulation that would enable the banks to take some kind of toll on all the business of the country.

WILL STOCK MEN YIELD?

From the Kansas Farmer.

The American Live Stock Commission company has concluded to wind up its affairs and retire from business. The company was organized in 1888 with a capital of $200,000. Its promoters, who were all cattlemen, believed that the regular commission men were charging too high rates, and they thought that they could handle their cattle much cheaper. The fact was soon demonstrated that they could. Only 25 per cent of the stock was ever paid in, but dividends to the amount of 37½ per cent were paid. At first the regular commission men paid but little attention to the new concern; but its competition soon spoiled their profits, and the American company was excluded from the exchanges of Chicago, St. Louis and Kansas City. Will stock men continue to yield to all opposition, or will they quit business?

TOWN VOTERS HELPED.

From the Kansas City, Mo., Journal.

Senator Perkins' county, Labette, is one of the few counties in the Third congressional district which gave an alliance majority at the last election. It was also one of the few counties in that district in which there were three tickets in the field; each of these gave alliance victories, proving that with alliance-democratic fusion it is easier to overcome the enemy than when the forces are united. Labette county is one of the few counties in the entire state where the alliance people own the court house. In 1890 and in 1891 the alliance elected everything from janitor to sheriff. The number of farmers in proportion to the population is not nearly so large in Labette county as in a great majority of Kansas counties.

BEST IN THE WORLD.

From the Kanopolis Kansan.

We are informed that the alliance neighbors of Gustus Showman turned out and attended him, took charge of his live stock, shed repairing, corn gathering, etc., and told him not to worry his mind about anything; that they are doing everything in their power for his comfort and his well being. Informant said: "If that is not fraternity, I do not know what is. Those alliance people are as fraternal as any organization I know of." Of course they are; the alliance is a child of necessity, organized to alleviate suffering, better the conditions of people, especially its members, and is one of the best organizations in the world to-day.

READ UP.

When a farmer declines to take a reform newspaper by saying, "I haven't got time to read," just tell him that the politician has time to read; that the banker has time to read; that the railroad king has time to read; that all the schemers, plunderers and Shylocks of the money power have time to read. And if the farmer doesn't want his cause kicked out of the political field he must take time to "read up" his side of the question. Facts are as essential to the voter as ammunition to a hunter. Remember that there is big game to be brought down, and it must be done by intelligent work at the ballot-box.

STAND BY THE FARMERS.

By T. V. Powderly.

The farmers have resolved to stand by us. Let us resolve to stand by them, making their cause our cause everywhere and in everything. When they are assailed we are assailed, and should resent it. When they are in danger so are we. Let us act together in getting out of it. They are assisting us in our struggle for the rights of our brothers of N. T. A. 23. Let us assist them in their struggle against the evils that make it possible to boycott Knights of Labor. Let our resolve be to act with them, study with them, think with them and vote with them.

THE GIRL WITH THE SEALSKIN CAP.

BY WILLIAM B. CHISHOLM.

Don't talk to me of summer girls,
Of maidens splashing in the river;
Here at December's frosty gates
The more allusion makes one shiver:
But rather let me scan the face
Half hid in scarf and sealskin hood;
She now doth fill my dream of all
The True, the Beautiful, the Good.

Meseems each dove-eyed soul that moan
In mortal anguish heath the stroke
Of murderous Anglo-Saxon spear:
Tells of a human heart that's broke.
But human hearts 'neath girlish wraps Break faster far to think that they Must weather weary wintry months
Devoid of this beloved array.

Were I a seal I'd sacrifice
My life itself that I might live
Upon that banded and radiant brow
And such delight that dear one give:
Pale ghosts of sensuous merriment,
Back to the shades of Lethe go!
Come on, dear girl, with sealskin cap,
Thy bonny queen of frost and snow!

BILLY BRAG.

His name was Phineas Ellsworth, but we boys at the "HX Ranch" called him "Billy Brag," for reasons which ten minutes' conversation with him would make obvious, even to a total stranger. To say that he was opinionated is drawing it very mild, and to state that the chiefest of his opinions was the particularly excellent one he held of himself, is superfluous.

Those were humdrum, monotonous days at the "HX," and there was scant opportunity for Billy to exhibit the courage, prowess, skill, ability, and so forth, which we had his own oft-repeated statements for it—he possessed to a remarkable degree.

Once in a while, something would happen to relieve the monotony; but Billy, somehow or other, was never on deck to show what he was worth. He always turned up afterward with: "Huh! you galoots jes make me ache all over! W'y, any bloomin' tenderfoot c'd a tol' ye better'n that!" or, "That wuz a fool trick! Now, ef I'd be'n thar, I'd a did so and so—" or, "Huh! d'ye call that anythin' ter menshun? W'y, back thar, on th' Keya Paha, we used t' let th' kids an' winmen do that kin' o' work!"

And so it went on for nearly a year, and, though we invented many a plan to give Billy an opportunity to show his worth, he managed, on one pretext and another to keep out of our snares.

One day, Cale Snelling, who was out looking up some strays, fell in with a Maverick steer feeding in a coulee, and, thinking at first that it was an "HX" critter, rode toward it. But the beast was what is known as a "bad un," and, horns down and bellowing with rage, he turned and charged on the startled cowboy. Cale tried to turn his pony and run, but the animal was green, and only reared and snorted. Cale thought he was about to take a place herding clouds; but he yanked his gun and let go, catching the steer right between the eyes, and dropping it not more than ten feet away.

Cale was a bit new in the business, and he was rather pale when he rode up to the ranch and related his experience, but there was a triumphant tone in his voice as he told of his successful shot from the back of a bucking pony.

Billy listened with a superior air. "Huh!" he remarked, disdainfully, "whadjie wanten kill 'im fer? Ye c'd jes 'z well 'creased' an' roped 'im. Some folks never hev no r'gard fer prop'ty. Waste not, want nothin'."

We all groaned and proceeded to congratulate Cale on his luck, but Billy did not seem to care. He was getting used to our irreverence. It may be noted, however, that when we tried next morning to get Billy to take a shot at a blanket nailed on a shed-door, to see how near he could have come to "creasing" a mad steer from the back of a fool pony, our proposition met with scorn. "There ye go agin," said Billy. "What's th' blame use o' wastin' er whole lot o' cartridges jes t' convince er mess o' gabblin' egriots thet er thing kin be did? Aw, go off an' try poundin' 'em in rat-hole fer yer wits. But ye can't even do that." And he rode off much offended.

When Joe Fleming, brother of the boss, and Hank Barr had a brush with half a dozen Indians, and just escaped with their lives, leaving a bunch of fat cattle to be run off by Uncle Sam's dear sweet proteges, Billy's opinion was at once forthcoming. "Huh! Ye mout jes 'z scared mos' o' th' critters an' got them thievin' red cusses, too. W'y didn't ye, w'en ye seed 'em ridin' down on ye, jes kill three 'r four critters, pile 'em up fer a barricade, an' give th' ben devils reglar h—? That'd be'n better'n losin' th' hull bunch."

When Bob Hall, cowboy from the "3-Bar," the next ranch—one of the meanest, ugliest, most quarrelsome bullies who ever flourished a gun—got killed at the hotel in town by an unoffending tenderfoot, whom he had tried to compel to take a drink, Billy, as usual had something to say. "Huh! That's them tenderfeet all over. They think if er man tries t' hev fun with 'em out hyar, thet they've got t' shoot, an' shoot quick. Th' galoot oughter've jes took Bob Hall b' th' scruff o' th' pants an' kicked 'r throwed 'im out, an' Bob d'v'e pollygized too quick. Bob Hall never had no sand."

All the same, there was an old story to the effect that once, when Billy had been unaccountably absent from the ranch for three or four days, he had been in town, devoting considerable attention to keeping out of the billigrent Mr. Hall's way.

But Billy's opportunity came one day. He had been laid up a week and was still lame as the result of being on the side next the ground when his pony stumbled and fell one day, and was sitting at the door one morning about 11:30, when the stage came along. Several of us were in the ranch-house, and were somewhat surprised to hear the wheels outside, for the stage-road was two miles from the ranch. As we crowded to the door, we saw "something was up," for Dyer, the driver, looked excited.

"Mornin', gentlemen," he said. And then, to Boss Fleming: "Fleming, I expect t' be held up over b' Five-Mile Creek. Kin one o' th' boys go with me? I'll get 'nother man at Parker's, an' I reckon three'll be 'nough."

"Why, yes; of course," was the reply; "you can have more, if you want 'em. I'll go myself. But why didn't you bring guards, if you're carrying any valuables?"

Dyer explained. The night before he had noticed three suspicious-looking characters in town, and observed that they eyed him considerably. This morning he had started early, hoping to pass all the places favorable to a "hold-up" before the three tough-looking gentlemen had time to get located. He had felt a bit backward about bringing guards, as he did not like to appear cowardly, and, besides, his suspicions might be groundless, and the laugh would be on him. There were no valuables except the mail-bags.

But the three strangers had passed him a mile back, evidently in a hurry to get somewhere; hence his visit to the "HX."

Fleming turned to get ready to go—he was not the man to send somebody else into danger—but was met at the door by Billy, "cheeled" with two revolvers and a Winchester.

"Hullo, man!" ejaculated Fleming. "Didn't you hear me say I was going?"

"Don't care ef ye did," answered Billy, curtly. "Th' plenty wuz t' do, an' my laigs is too stiff t' straddle any blame bronco." And he climbed painfully up on to the driver's seat, and the stage rolled away, leaving us staring at each other, unable to believe our eyes.

The stage did not reach the Five-Mile, nor did it reach Parker's. At a place two miles west of the "HX," where the road traversed the edge of a bluff overhanging a deep ravine, there were three shots fired, and brave Walt Dyer and his two team-leaders fell into the road. Then there were more shots—a rattling fusillade for two or three minutes—then silence.

When we got to the scene, we saw Billy Brag lying across the body of the driver, supporting himself on one elbow, and keeping "the drop" on a man who stood holding up one arm—the other was shattered, and hung limp. Two dead men, besides Dyer, lay in the road. The wheelers were quiet now, but their hoofs had cruelly mangled the bodies of their prostrate comrades in front.

"I knowed ye'd come, boys," said Billy, "else I'd a hed t' kill this 'un, 'stead o' savin' 'im fer a leetle necktie-party. They got Dyer, fust lick, but w'en they run up agin Phin Ellsworth, they ketched er h—l ov er feller. Guess I kin die off, real peaceful, now."

But he did not die. With a ball in his leg, another traveling around somewhere on his inside, and a wound in his throat which causes his voice to bread in a ludicrous way, he still lives and brags of this very exploit.

Teach the Boys.

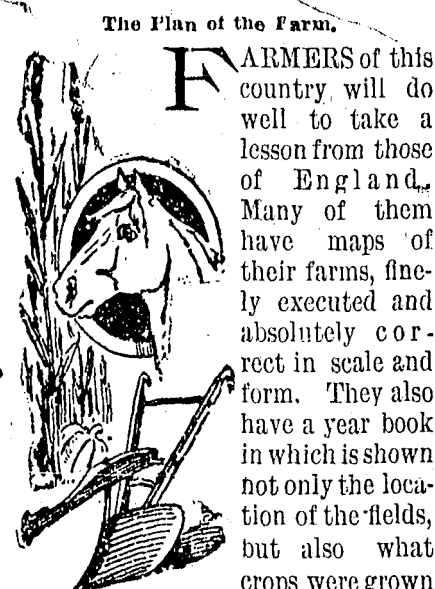

A well-known man, the monument of whose exceptional ability as a financier is the great dry goods establishment of which he is the head, contented that a discussion of the subject from his standpoint would serve no good end, since every merchant was an individual, and for every individual there would have to be a different prescription, adapted to personal temperament, mental capacity and the material circumstances. What would be good for one might be poison for another.

He suggested that the way to make good business men, who would know how to acquire a surplus to dispose of, whether or not to invest in stocks, how much money to keep on hand and how to guard against stringency in the money market, was to give more attention to the morals of the boys who were starting in business. He wished it could be shown to them how they were wasting their opportunities, how they were stultifying their manly spirit, how they were wrecking their chances for future prosperity when they indulge in games of chance, pool playing, gambling, and other vicious practices that rob them of their night's rest and fill their minds in the day time to the exclusion of the business with which they are intrusted. Successful business men, he insisted, could, in the majority of instances take care of their finances fairly well but it is the next generation of business men that needs to be cultivated with greater care.

on any particular field at any given time. Their system of rotation of crops greatly facilitates the keeping of such a record.

In the East, says the American Farmer, the situation of affairs is probably worse than here. The farms there are small and badly divided up into small "two acre pieces," "half acre fields," etc. Here in the Northwest we too often go to the other extreme and have our farms unfenced. We have seen a single farm in the East which had several miles of fences and walls, while we have also traveled several miles in the West without observing a single fence. A fence should be placed around the farm. It is oftentimes the means of saving its cost in keeping away stray cattle from the growing crops, and is a benefit at all times. A State may fortify itself with herd laws forever but a fence well made is better than all the statutes on this subject. The pasture must be divided from the tilled land by a good fence, for obvious reasons; but as it is unwise to continuously keep a certain part of the farm for pasture, it is well to plan for this before fencing. A plan can easily be formed by which the changing of the pasture will necessitate the changing of only two sides of the fence. In laying out the prairie farm, the buildings must be placed in some convenient position. Many farmers put their buildings near one corner of the farm; a few moments' reflection will convince any one that this is a most unwise thing to do. A good plan is to lay out the quarter section into lots of twenty acres each. By doing this you can easily compute how much land you have to any crop, and the total field being given it is then easy to estimate the yield per acre. This division of the land into plats of equal size, cannot easily be done unless it is very nearly level. In the majority of farms more attention is paid to the natural surface contour. A little forethought in locating roads on the farm will prevent much unnecessary labor. The distance around the hemisphere is no greater than the distance over it, and the former course is much the easier for the team.

Of course, many circumstances must be considered in laying out the farm. It will probably be impossible to have the artificial divisions always suit the farmer and yet conform to the surface contour. The great thing is to make a beginning, to get to thinking, and then apply that thought in practice.

LIVE STOCK.

Cost of Feeding Pigs.

The Wisconsin Experiment Station conducted a series of experiments to ascertain whether or not pigs can be fed as profitably through the dam as after weaning. Four sows were placed in separate pens just before farrowing. The pigs were weighed on the day they were born, and weekly thereafter until ten weeks old, when they were weaned. An account was kept of all the food consumed by the sow and pigs for seven weeks after weaning. The feed consumed is charged at the following rates:

Cornmeal, 70 cents per hundred weight, or 40 cents per bushel.
Skim milk, 75 cents per hundred weight.
Shorts, 70 cents per hundred weight.
Ground oats, 90 cents per hundred weight, or 29 cents per bushel.
Sifted oats, $1.25 per hundred weight.

Only summaries of the second and third lots are here given as the feeding was not uniform for the other lots. The following table shows the food consumed to produce 100-pounds of gain:

LOT II.—SOW AND PIGS BEFORE WEANING.
Cornmeal, 181 lbs. at $.70 per cwt.	$ 12.67
Skim milk, 482 lbs. at .25 per cwt.	1.21
Total	$ 13.88
PIGS AFTER WEANING.
Cornmeal, 157 lbs. at $.70 per cwt.	$ 11.00
Skim milk, 562 lbs. at .25 per cwt.	1.41
Total	$ 12.41
LOT III.—SOWS AND PIGS BEFORE WEANING.
Cornmeal, 116 lbs. at $.70 per cwt.	$ 8.12
Shorts, 232 lbs. at $.70 per cwt.	1.62
Total	$ 9.74
PIGS AFTER WEANING.
Cornmeal, 115 lbs. at $.70 per cwt.	$ 8.05
Shorts, 239 lbs. at $.70 per cwt.	1.67
Total	$ 9.72

The combination of cornmeal and

skimmilk gave excellent results, and cornmeal with shorts did equally well. Where the sow was fed ground oats poor returns followed, this feed not being very satisfactory when cost is considered. It will be seen that there was little difference in the amount of feed required for a pound of growth with the pigs of Lots II and III before and after weaning, and we may conclude that there is no cheaper way of feeding pigs than through the dam. This being true, it is a shortsighted policy to starve a sow with the idea that her pigs will pay better for their feed after they are weaned. Experiments teach that the sow should be fed as heavily as possible without endangering her young, and that at the same time the pigs should be early taught to eat in a trough by themselves, and should also be fed all they will consume.

Sheep Hints.

START in to winter right and feed the flock so it will be a credit to you. There is a difference between feeding a maintenance ration and one enough larger to net the feeder a profit.

The wool and manure will pay for the keep of the sheep, and what the lambs bring is all profit. What will show a larger per cent of profit than this?

When a man expects early spring lambs it won't do for him to be mean with the ewes, either in board of treatment. There is a charm about wheat bran, oats and linseed meal which no sheep can resist; and the resulting products, whether lambs, wool or mutton, are bound to be first-class. Oil meal must not be fed to ewes in lamb later than four weeks after they are served because of danger from miscarriage.

TURNIPS are well worth feeding notwithstanding the chemists rank them so low among foods. The beginner in sheep raising will do well to study the cheap production of roots, for nothing, not even ensilage, can take their place in the economies of winter sheep feeding.

EVERY lamb that can be put on the market before April will pay the owner well. He should make special preparations for warm and comfortable places in cold weather for sheep expected to year early.

DON'T allow the sheep to fall off in flesh as the feed fails. If they come to the barn poor in the fall, they are likely to remain so through the winter. Turn them into the aftermath, or give them a daily feed of grain or rowen.

GATHER forest leaves and fill one of the box stalls by pouring them through the floor above. Sheep enjoy them for bedding and will eat many of the bright ones. They like to vary their own diet and it is a hint to the shepherd.

THE DAIRY.

Look Out for a Creamery Fraud.

The lightning rod and Bohemian oat swindle have had their day and now the hedge fence and creamery racket are being worked. A creamery supply house is sending out agents to small towns and villages to convince them that a creamery is essential to their future success. These agents have all the facts and figures and give talk and plans free. While a first-class equipped creamery can be put up for $2,000 to $4,000, these shrewd fellows get the towns to put in from $6,000 to $10,000. A cold storage may be attached and the concern may take some stock in the creamery to help further the scheme. The company makes two profits; one by the high price of the building and the other by the equipments furnished. They can afford to lose a few hundred dollars in the stock after they have made twice that in the profits. The creameries are generally started in places where there are few dairy cows or the people have not enough dairy education to make them a success. After running a few months they generally close up. The sharpers have been working in Wisconsin for the past few weeks, but they should be looked for everywhere and their schemes thwarted.—Practical Farmer.

A Deal of Nonsense.

A great deal of the so-called agricultural pabulum found in weekly newspapers is the veriest nonsense. As an instance of this we read the other day in a weekly paper that milk in Paris was called pure when it contained one pound of butter and four ounces of solids, not fat, in a quart. Normal milk contains from three to four pounds of butter and nine to eleven pounds of other solids in each 100 pounds, or fifty quarts.

Must Study the Business.

One thing should be chalked down and remembered by every farmer who is engaged in dairying or thinks of engaging in it. He will never make a profitable success unless he is a close student of the business. Unless he is willing to read, think, and study, and that, too, right hard, but few dollars will get into his pocket through the dairy work. Look about in every dairy community and you will see that the most money per cow is made by the men who put the most brains into their dairy work. A man may make some money out of a poor cow, even, by starving his mind and the minds of his family. We suppose rag-pickers make some money, but how do they live? The American dairymen ought to live like an American citizen.

THE POULTRY-YARD.

Hay Seeds for Chickens.

When you have a brood of chicks, try giving them the sweepings of the hayloft in which to scratch, and you will be surprised to notice how busy the little fellows will be, and how industriously, writes a poultry raiser, they will work to secure the seeds. There is nothing that will tempt little chicks like small seeds, and they will scratch from morning until night if they can find them. This scratching will do more to keep them in health than anything that can be done for them. It makes them keep warm, compels them to feed without filling their crops too rapidly, prevents leg weakness, and assists them to endure cold. Their appetites will also be greater and they will eat anything else provided, with avidity. If chicks are fed four times a day when young, and given hay chaff and leaves to work in, they should grow rapidly. They must be kept in a warm place, having plenty of light, and carefully fastened up at night.

A Dreaded Disease.

Among the diseases described that come to us from readers, says Farm and Fireside, is one which is very common. The heads of the hens swell, and lumps appear, both on the heads and sometimes in the throats, and the eyes are also swollen and closed. The trouble is roup, and the symptoms described are due to exposure to draughts of cold or damp air at night. There are different kinds of roup, but the form of roup mentioned is always the result of exposure. It is difficult to cure, but the sick birds should be kept in a warm place, and a few drops of a mixture of one part spirits of turpentine and three parts sweet-oil used as an ointment on the face and head.

Feed Must Be Regulated.

When green things disappear the feeding of poultry must be regulated accordingly. If it has been fed entirely on corn up to that time and has done well, it is not to be wondered at, because there has been an abundance of grass and insects to balance the ration. To counteract the heating effect of the carbonaceous corn food until the new growth of green things, poultrymen who expect the best returns from their fowls will see to it that food rich in nitrogen is supplied in connection with the corn. This should include meat scraps, clover hay cut and steamed, chopped vegetables, bran, barley, oats, and cottonseed and linseed meal.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Washing Blankets Made Easy.

If one has a suitable place for the purpose, the washing of blankets may become an easy task, says the January Ladies' Home Journal. In an open space, have a line tightly stretched out of doors. To this fasten the upper edge of the blanket. Have straps of cotton sewed to the bottom at intervals; tie these to pegs, which drive well into the ground. Now turn on the hose. Cold water, of course, and plenty of it. Drench the blankets well, on both sides. If much soiled, rub spots with soap and drench again. The force of the stream will do more than wringing. After the article is quite clean, leave it to dry; never mind if it does rain: if the work has been thorough it will not streak, but be all the better for it. When the sun has completed its task, you will possess blankets as white, soft and unshrunk as new, and the nap will not be destroyed.

Hints to Housekeepers.

CAMP chairs are now covered with plush and bordered with tiny tassels of silk.

CEILINGS that have been smoked by a kerosene lamp should be washed off with soda water.

THE surest test of a frozen orange is its weight. If it is heavy in the hand it has not been frozen.

USE good soap in the kitchen, as it saves the hands.

WHEN a felon first begins to make its appearance, take a lemon, cut off one end, put the finger in, and the longer it is kept there the better.

Flour should be kept in a barrel, with a flour scoop to dip it and a sieve to sift it.

DRAIN pipes and all places that are sour or impure may be cleansed with lime water or carbolic acid.

For a cold on the chest, a flannel rag rung out in boiling water and sprinkled with turpentine, laid on the chest, gives the greatest relief.

COLD sliced potatoes fry and taste better by sprinkling a teaspoonful of flour over them while frying.

Rub the tea-kettle with kerosene and polish with a dry flannel cloth.

BENT whalebone can be restored and used again by soaking in water a few hours, then drying them.

TO CLEAN CARPETS—Go over them once a week with a broom dipped in hot water, to which a little turpentine has been added. Wring a cloth in the hot water and wipe under pieces of furniture too heavy to be moved.

Money in Cabbage and Celery.

"Blood will tell." Good crops cannot be grown with poor strains of seed.

The most extensive growers all over the Union now consider them the best in the world. A catalogue giving full particulars regarding them will be sent free to any one interested. When writing for it enclose 20 cents in silver, or postage stamps, and we will also send "How to Grow Cabbage and Celery," a book worth its weight in gold to any grower who has never read it.

A Golden Nugget.

A strange novelty in this golden tale corn, with its beautiful rich cream color. It is claimed by those who know it that it is very sweet, early and tender, and a superior corn. We notice Vick recommends it very highly. The Floral Guide, which comes to us bringing a bouquet of Carnations on the front cover, with a splendid bunch of Brilliant Poppies on the back, gives full description of this new corn, which is only 15 cents a pack- et. Vick's Floral Guide is worthy a place in the home of anyone who expects to make a garden the coming spring. By all means send ten cents to JAMES VICK'S SONS, Rochester, N. Y., for the Guide, and you can deduct this amount from your first order. It will pay you well.

SOMETHING NEW AND VALUABLE.

The new book, entitled "PROFIT AND PASTIME, OR THE INDUSTRIAL CLUB DECLAMER," recently published by the Vincent Bros. Publishing Co., of Indianapolis, Ind., surely is a beauty, and at the same time a most timely publication. Our industrial clubs all suffer for a want of social and literary entertainment; so much so that they often lose their attraction for those most wanted. This new book is beautifully illustrated, and is chockful of poems, readings, plays, dialogues, declamations, and, in fact, everything calculated to amuse and instruct both young and old, while through its 320 pages it never loses sight of the underlying principles of social and moral reform. Prices: Paper cover, 50 cents; library cloth, gilt-edge and stamp, $1.25.

GOOD ADVICE, NEVERTHELESS. From the Alliance Tribune.

"No party ever amounted to anything in this country that began its career by fusing with another party. Parties are built up by a dignified adherence to principle. A fusion with the democrats in Kansas this year, would bring the Alliance into such contempt throughout the country that it could never hope to become stronger. It would be suicidal to enter into such a bargain as the wily democrats are proposing."—Leavenworth Times.

Of course Col. Anthony and his party are quite anxious that there shall be no fusion between the People's party and the democrats, but after all the advice given above is good and is the gospel truth.

Fusion, more than anything else, killed the Greenback party, and will kill any new party.

We do not have to fuse in Kansas. We are the only growing, live party in the state, and with the progress we are making we are certain of success in the coming campaign.

Let us keep in the middle of the road and stand firmly and uncompromisingly for principle. Success upon any other line would be no victory for principle. Let us go forward, brethren, in the strength of our cause, determined to win on principle if it takes one, two, four or a dozen years to attain success.

The people who don't like us don't know us. Those who don't like our neighbors know them too well.

THE FARMER'S WIFE.

EQUAL RIGHTS TO ALL, SPECIAL PRIVILEGE TO NONE.

FORMERLY CITY & FARM RECORD.

TOPEKA, KANSAS, FEBRUARY, 1892.

NINTY YEAR. VOL. X. NO. 8.

Written for the FARMER'S WIFE. THE FALLEN SOLDIERS.

They are falling, nobly falling,
In the battle field of life;
In a world of grief and sorrow,
Of contention, wrong and strife.

One by one, our ranks are broken
As they fall from day to day;
One by one the loved ones taken
As we march along the way.

Many days of weary striv'ing
They have toiled in fear and woe,
For the true and honest soldier
Bravely meets a wicked foe.

They have fallen for their country
In the cause of peace and right;
They have gone to meet the ransomed
On the blissful shores of light.

In the union of the blessed
Where oppression is not known;
Where the seed of greed for money
Was never, even sown.

Where the curse of whiskey license
Never causes grief or pain;
Where saloon and deadly dramshop
Never leave their guilty stain;

Where no murderers can enter
And no thieves can ever go,
And they need no banking system
Where they neither reap nor sow.

There, no mortgages and taxes
Ever blight the name of home;
There, the slaves of earthly masters
In a land of freedom roam.

There, no battle ground of terror
With the cannons awful roar;
And no flag of declaration
Waving on that peaceful shore.

And no battle of the ballot
To reform a world of strife;
And no need of gospel workers
To sustain the christian life;

But the ruler of the kingdom
Reigns in love eternally,
And his subjects are the angels
And the spirits of the free.

Educate the Mothers.

BY NETTIE S. NUTT.

Napoleon once asked Mme. de Staël what he could do to best promote the happiness of the French people, to which she with true statesman-like wisdom replied, "Educate the Mothers."

Men are not generally morally better than their mothers, and herein lies the success or downfall of a nation.

Enslave and degrade the mothers of a nation and you degenerate the race and corrupt the nation. Educate and ennoble the mother and the result will be a nation of powerful intellects, wise, just and human laws and a prosperous, contented people, dwelling in the light of knowledge and liberty. The present is governed by the influence of wives, the future is moulded by the teachings and influence of mothers. How essential it becomes then, that the women of a nation be educated, not in book lore alone, but in all that pertains to man's happiness and upliftment; in all things which go to make up the great upward march of human civilization. In a republic can we hope for unselfish patriotism, wisdom and justice in statesmen chosen from among the people, if reared by mothers held in bondage within the prescribed circle of home? Forbidden to intrude upon the study of political economy, can we expect in their sons the wisdom of eternal vigilance, which is the only safeguard of liberty? With social conditions governed by the effect of the laws enacted, can we look for pure, social and moral conditions, while mothers remain in ignorance of the science of good government?

To-day no grander utterance can be made to women than to recite the wisdom-laden words of Mme. de Staël, "Educate the Mothers!"

In a republic like ours, it is no credit to a woman to boast of her ignorance of the laws whose penalty she must suffer for breaking them. It is no honor to a woman to admit her ignorance of the character of men who frame the laws under which she must live and rear her children, or of the method of educating them.

Teach them not only the laws and the methods of enacting them, but also the results of those laws through their effect upon the masses. Teach them the principles of equality and justice, and they will transmit them to their sons, and though they may be forbidden to approach the ballot box, equality and justice will find their way into the laws enacted by those sons, while civilization will take a step upward and the warm sunlight of liberty will cheer the hearts of a busy people, dwelling contentedly in a steadily increasing prosperity.

Mothers, this matter rests much with you. The prescribed limits of woman's sphere is but a matter of public sentiment. Public opinion is the lever which uplifts woman, or holds her down, but is not as some appear to think of spontaneous growth, but is manufactured to order by the moulding of public sentiment. Then let women stand united in the struggle for recognition and equality, moulding public sentiment through education until the lever of public opinion shall turn to the uplifting of women, and ennobling of the American people.

In the dark ages, during the persecution by the Romish power, the tyrants understood well that the degradation, ignorance and superstition of women meant a slavish race to the controlling power, consequently they thought the inferiority of women moulding public sentiment in that channel through their teachings.

St. Augustine taught that "women were inferior to men and more prone to evil," and that sentiment has followed mankind down the corridors of centuries to the present time, holding woman in bondage by public opinion. But the increase of knowledge is lifting the veil of superstition, and the sunset glory of the closing nineteenth century is shedding its halo around woman, causing her to look upward and to march with a firmer tread in the trend of the ages, as she nears her original position beside man, in equality as his helpmeet and companion rather than as a necessary appendage to his self-gratification.

Women of this closing era, as wives and mothers, the work is largely ours, to mould public sentiment to the equality of the sexes, and the restoration of a woman to her God-ordained position. Let every woman join the ranks of educators, and in the glow of the closing era mould the minds that shall govern the future, to the recognition of women as the equal of man, and the mothers of the nation.

Then, and not till then, shall the human race know perfect freedom. Then, and not till then, shall justice reign and nations rejoice in the reign of righteousness.

Opportunity stands at the gate of this closing century and proffers us the cup of equality. Shall we, in unity, march boldly, grandly up and sip its nectar, uplifting humanity by our own progression, broadening our range of usefulness as we increase in knowledge; developing the intellectual talents interested to our keeping by a wise Creator? or shall we, refusing opportunity's offering, glide backward to the plane of the domestic animal as the slavish property of man, subject alike with the brute to his caprice, dragging down with ourselves both sexes of future generations, while we return to the Creator our undeveloped talents?

O, woman of this closing era, know ye not that ye are living in the grandest day of earth's history? The day rich with promises in Holy Writ and laden with opportunities never before offered to the human race. The day when knowledge is running to and fro and man is reaching out his hand to man in acknowledgement of a common brotherhood; while progress, civilization, Christianity, wisdom and true manhood beckon humanity to a higher plane, nearer the Divine, in the light of equality and justice.

The opening gates of a new era beckon us onward and upward; shall we buckle on the armor and take up the march, nor rest until woman glory-crowned and triumphant, takes the rightful place to which God created her? To accomplish this we have but to "Educate the Mothers" who mould the destinies of succeeding generations by their teachings. Shall it be bondage, or liberty and equality, when the new era dawns?

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

History Repeating Itself.

BY MRS. BINA A. OTIS.

As we review the part enacted by Hale, Chase and Sumner in the anti-slavery cause nearly fifty years ago, it seems that to-day history is repeating itself. The bold and independent stand that John P. Hale took alone in congress was one of the first steps in defiance of the lash of the old parties and was the beginning that resulted in the formation of the republican party. Six years later he was re-inforced by Salmon P. Chase who did not identify himself with either of the great parties of that time (whigs and democrats) because of his opposition to slavery. In 1837 the stand he took in defending a fugitive slave woman caused one of the oldest lawyers in the court room to remark "that there was a promising young man who had just ruined himself." A few years afterward Charles Sumner completed the trio in congress, although a man who at one time said that "he loathed politics," yet he was destined to take an active part in moulding public sentiment on the slavery question; he was the most feared and hated opponent of slavery in congress and while he disliked war he opposed compromise, because that would sacrifice principle. Some of his views in regard to slavery were considered by other republicans to be unwise and impracticable. During his warfare with slavery his life was in so much danger that unbeknown to himself he was under the protection of armed friends for some time while in Washington.

At the opening of the Fifty-second congress we find but two Independents in the Senate and nine in the House of Representatives; the eleven men now hold the same relation to financial freedom as the trio did to personal freedom years ago.

To future generations the 27th of January, 1892, will be memorable, as on that day for the first time the People's party as an independent political organization was recognized in the House of Representatives by the speakers and both old parties and given an hour in the debate on the rules, and thus secured an opportunity to defend the principle of popular rights. It was a pleasure to see one of Georgia's noble sons clasp hands with the representatives of Kansas and pledge anew their loyalty to the interest of the masses.

The war against chattel slavery and for the Union is over, but the conflict is upon us for the laboring people against the money power, the masses are aroused, the old party whip is losing its snap, there has been some skirmishing but the soldiers for the decisive battle are being nerved on by the encroachments of the money power.

The cold corpse of the child in Georgia referred to by Mr. Watson in his speech, January 27th, that was uncoffined because there was no money, or credit, is but a sacrifice in this battle for justice.

The mother element is in this movement with her influence and support, and we trust that she may lend enough assistance that the battle may be with ballots and not with bullets.

The February conference is near. There are three things that are necessary to the success of the meeting, principle, unity of action, and policy; the relative importance of each seems to us in the order mentioned above. Our movement is based upon the high and noble principle of equality to all and it should not be sacrificed, but success can be secured only by the utmost harmony, and expediency should not be entirely ignored.

We are in the midst of this struggle and there is no retreating. The invisible force that is moving us forward is beyond human power to control.

From this meeting should go up the battle cry for the emancipation from monopoly, courageous and decisive action must be taken and the enthusiasm should reach to every state in the Union.

A new Declaration of Independence should be issued that will be for the preservation and protection of our homes; when there is less suffering from hard times there will be more happy homes and fewer divorces. On our table we find accounts of idle men, women selling their womanhood and children dying for the want of food. No wonder there are accounts of riots and by the side of these reports we find that the baby daughter of the Astors of New York, is heir to $150,000,000 and has a yearly income equal to the combined earnings of eighty thousand working girls. Also at the President's last reception the reporter tells us that the brilliancy of the scene was marred by the inappropriate and shabby dress of some of the guests. The beauty of many a home scene is marred by the absence of even plain food and raiment brought about through the instrumentality of unjust legislation of the past twenty-five years.

It is a disgrace under our form of government to have the wealth of the country concentrated into the hands of a few, while the masses are in hopeless poverty and rags. Why should the chief magistrate of a free people be holding brilliant receptions whilst upon the very streets in front of the National Capitol a half clothed woman is begging for food? It is not impossible that the wants of this poor woman was relieved by one of the men whom the reporter criticized as being "shabbily dressed" at the President's reception. Is it not about time in freedom loving America to recognize the Fatherhood of God and the fraternal relations of our race?

National Women's Alliance.

WHEREAS, The members of this organization and the women of the industrial classes throughout the country are expressing intense interest in the conference of labor organizations to be held in St. Louis February 22d, 1892, and at the request of many of our members I recommend that Tuesday, February 22d, be observed as a day of prayer for God's blessing upon this important assembling. We most cordially invite all women who are in sympathy with this reform to remember this cause in family worship, and to assemble on this day with others to pray for heavenly guidance in this important council.

FANNIE McCORMICK,

President N. W. A.

MRS. HELEN M. GUGAR IN BOSTON.

She Pays a Compliment to Kansas—And Assailed the Republican Party—Kansas Women Did It.

From the Woman's Voice.

The past week has been one of unusual interest in this city, to the men and women who have the deepest interests of the nation at heart. It has had two remarkable meetings, the first a gathering of ministers on Monday noon, which was addressed by Mrs. Helen M. Gougar, of Indiana. A large audience besides the clergy assembled to hear the renowned speaker. She made an earnest plea for the further enfranchisement of women, as the women of Kansas had clearly proven how quickly the political leaders who are unprincipled and their followers can be out voted, if true women are allowed a voice in politics.

The argument that the colored women and the Irish would be influenced to vote for bad men was clearly proven to be false, by the fact the colored women of Kansas were found to be true as steel, and in scarcely one instance were they to be bought. Since women had been made mayors the city governments had greatly improved. Mrs. Gougar then went on to show that the hope of many that prohibition would ultimately be gained through the Republican party was groundless, as the party was steadily retrograding and thoroughly in league with the saloon. Is there a man here, she asked, who has any hope of closing the saloon through the republican party? Cries of No! No! and one voice "yes." "Who said yes," asked Mrs. Gougar, and up rose T. C. Evans of Jamaica Plain, and began to question the lady, whereupon she produced unanswerable facts to prove that even Mr. Fassett of New York, whom Mr. Evans declared to be defeated by the Third party men, owed his nomination to the liquor dealers who upheld him. In reply to Mr. Dudley's arraignment of the Young Men's Prohibition Club for allowing men who were not strictly temperate to vote, she said if the republicans drew the line thus strictly, they would be without a president, vice president and secretary of state.

It has been a matter of much comment that Mr. Dudley, of all others, should oppose receiving votes of men who have been cursed by the saloon. Mrs. Gougar proved herself amply able to answer every question that was put to her, and won the admiration of her womanly dignity and perfect self possession under the most trying circumstances. We regret that any reporter should have maligned her, as did some of the reporters of daily papers, from whom we expect truthful, fair treatment of speakers.

The woman suffrage fair recently held in Boston cleared about $1,800.

In Austria women are employed as hod carriers and are paid at the rate of 25 cents a day.

This office has been favored with a complete catalogue and price list of the Evergreen Nurseries, of Evergreen, Wis. This nursery is well known throughout the West, having been many years established. The proprietor, Mr. Geo. Pinney, has probably distributed more evergreens and forest trees through this state than any other man in the country. Although he raises and sells millions of forest trees annually, his specialty is evergreens. He plants hundreds of pounds of the seeds every year, and now has nearly three hundred varieties on his lists, fully equaling the largest nurseries in Europe, which supply the nurseries and parks of royalty. Of course, having such a large trade and growing them in such large quantities, he is able to give better prices for the same quality of trees than any other nurseryman in the country. It is well worth the while of any person to send for his lists.

Forming and Conducting a Girls' Literary Club—How a Bright Girl Snubbed an Officious Youth—The Husband's Title—The Servant Problem Solved.

A Girls' Literary Club.

A LITERARY club for girls may be organized in some such manner as this, writes Leigh North in the Ladies' Home Journal. The girls need not necessarily be of equal capacity or identical tastes. In fact, some diversity in these respects would be for the general advantage. But all who take part should be interested in reading and study, and have in some measure the desire and capacity to produce. The meetings may be held weekly or at longer intervals. The time occupied in reading, studying, and discussing the various questions that will naturally arise. Once a month each member should hand in a story, sketch or poem (without signature,) which should be read aloud, in turn, by the presiding officer, or an appointed reader. No name being appended, the party should feel free to discuss the merits of each manuscript submitted, criticize and suggest improvements, while at the conclusion a vote should be taken as to which of those offered should be entitled, in the general opinion, to the highest place. Each girl should endeavor, not so much to copy the style and manner of any particular friend, or admired writer, but to improve, prune, and embellish her own natural production. At stated intervals, some older and experienced literary friend should be invited to be present, and give the benefit of his or her opinion and criticism. One subject might be agreed upon as the theme for all pens, or each individual could be left to her own inclinations, and the intermediate readings or study would, of course, bear upon the articles written. Patience, perseverance, and good nature are most essential to the success of any such undertaking. Nothing would be accomplished were it pursued intermittently, or taken up and presently dropped again. Nor unless all agreed to a free expression of opinion, without offense, would the general criticism be of service. To this object, the absence of signatures would greatly conduce; though, doubtless, in time, some, if not all of the writers, would come to be recognized by their style.

The Husband's Title.

One of the questions that a married woman often finds herself uncertain upon is just how she should speak of her husband by name to others—when to speak of him as Mr. Jones, when to use his first name and when to give him his title. Instinct will usually guide aright any woman of gentle breeding, writes Helen Waterson in the New York Recorder. Most women may be trusted, for example, never to use their husband's Christian name in speaking of him to any one except a near relative or a very dear friend of both. But sometimes women who should know better address their husbands in company or before servants by their given names. That incomparable work of humor, "Good Form in England," says that to drop the letter "h" in London is not bad form but social ruin. The misuse of a husband's Christian name should be quite as gravely regarded here as the omission of the "h" there.

In speaking of her husband a woman never makes a mistake if she calls him "Mr." or "my husband." It is sometimes difficult to decide when the husband has a title just what the wife should do with it. This is the severest rule. In speaking of her husband she should never say "Gen. A—" or "Dr. B—," but "Mr. A—," "Mr. B—." No matter what he is—judge, governor, captain—to her he is and should be plain "Mr. A—." Mrs. Grant never, even when her husband was President, spoke of him as other than Mr. Grant, though it is the custom of the President's wife to speak of him as "the President."

The one exception to this rule of ignoring her husband's official or professional titles is when the wife presents him to any one else. "Then" she says, "My husband, Senator Smith," or simply "Dr. Jones." The reason for this is evident. It gives the proper clue to the stranger, who would wish, of course, to address the new acquaintance with the proper title.

Last of all, let any wife take heed how she wears her husband's title and allows herself to be spoken of as "Mrs. Gov. Jones" or "Mrs. Secretary Smith." No matter what title her husband has, she has no more right to wear it than she has to wear his shoes.

A Ten-Cent Limit.

A pretty young lady boarded a morning horse car which was otherwise occupied by business men and clerks on their way downtown the other day. She had left home in haste, as it seemed, and was engaged in pulling on a pair of long gloves, which she presently proceeded to button by means of that indispensable adjunct of the feminine toilet, a hairpin.

She had already begun operations when it slipped from her fingers and fell to the floor.

It landed at the feet of the young man beside her. He picked it up, but instead of returning it to its owner, he gently took her wrist in his left hand and calmly continued the buttoning process.

All the men in the car had been watching the pretty girl, some openly, others from behind their newspapers. Now all the papers dropped; every one looked and wondered what the girl would do.

She did nothing. Not a muscle moved, and she showed no consciousness of what was going on. The young man, with a look of triumph, finished his pleasing task, and the girl, with a preoccupied air and without a glance in his direction, opened her pocketbook, took out a nickel, and placed it into his hand, says the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

His expression changed. The color came into his face, and he murmured what was evidently an apology. She listened with a perfect simulation of innocence, and handed him another nickel.

By this time his face was scarlet, and he began another low-toned but earnest protestation.

The young lady signalled the conductor, and rose to leave the car, saying at the same time in a voice audible to all the passengers: "No, I cannot. I never give more than a dime for having my gloves buttoned or my boots blacked."

A Woman Student's Peculiar Experiences.

A woman lawyer has been writing some of the peculiar experiences of the woman student of law in an office or school. The most amusing of the awkward situations is the dilemma of the lecturers as to a fitting mode of address. Usually they gaze around anxiously and, fixing their eyes upon the one or two women students, stammer out: "Gentlemen." One courteous professor, however, prepared his remarks with: "Lady and gentlemen." The lady's presence in the lecture hall is invariably refining. If the upraised masculine feet do not come down immediately and voluntarily from the window-sill or table-top they are summarily assisted to the floor by the hands of some fellow-student. Some men objecting to the presence of women in the school manifest their disapproval in rude discourtesy, but the majority are courteous and respectful, and the woman is treated as an equal, except that the men assist her in the placing of her chair or the recovery of anything she loses or lets fall more than they do their male colleagues.

Unique Solution of a Serious Problem.

The servant problem is being uniquely solved by the wife of Sir George Humphrey at Cambridge. All the work of her large establishment is carried on by six or eight little maids from 12 to 15 years of age, who learn in turn the duties of housemaid, parlormaid, cook, etc. The girls remain little more than a year in Lady Humphrey's house, and are then sent out to other situations, as it is the kind woman's plan to train as many girls as possible for domestic service. She takes these girls from the poorest homes one at a time, and subjects them to the influence of an orderly and systematic household. The trained maids, assisted by the mistress, teach the new girl one kind of work at a time, and when she is proficient in each branch she goes out to make room for another. No branch of philanthropy is at once so practical or beneficial as this, which demands close personal attention and involves no public honor or fame.

Origin of Long Measure.

Our measures of length originated in the dawn of civilization, and came to us through the Anglo-Saxons. The yard was originally the length of a king's arm; the foot, the length of his pedal extremities. The word inch is derived from the Latin uncia, a twelfth part; but why the foot was divided into twelfths instead of tenths or elevenths, no one claims to be wise enough to tell. It has been suggested that probably the inch was originally the length of the second joint of the forefinger, and that twelve of these equal the length of the forearm, which averages about one foot in length.

The inch used to be divided into three barley-corns, which were simply the length of the grain or "corn" of the barley. The mile was reckoned at 1,000 paces, as its name shows, for it is derived from the first word of the Latin phrase, millia passuum, "a thousand paces." The origin of the rod is doubtful.

Names of Countries and Places.

The following countries were thus named by the Phœnicians, the greatest commercial people of the ancient world. These names, in the Phœnician language, signify something characteristic of the places they designate.

Europe, signifies a country of white complexions; so named, because the inhabitants there were of a fairer complexion than those of Asia and Africa.

Asia, signifies between, or in the middle; from the fact that geographers placed it between Europe and Africa.

Africa, signifies the land of corn and ears; it was celebrated for its abundance of corn, and all sorts of grain.

Spain, a country of rabbits and conies; this country was so infested with these animals, that Augustus was petitioned to destroy them.

Italy, a country of pitch.

Gaul, modern France, signified yellow haired, as yellow hair characterized its first inhabitants.

Caledonia, is a woody region.

Hibernia, is utmost, or far habitation, for beyond this, westward, the Phœnicians never extended their voyages.

Britain, the country of tin, as there were great quantities of lead and tin found on the adjacent islands. The Greeks called it Albion, from the whiteness of its shores, or the high rocks on the western coast.

Corsica, signifies a woody place.

Rhodes, serpents or dragons, which it produced in abundance.

Sicily, the country of grapes.

Seylla, the whirlpool, is destruction.

Syracuse, signifies bad savor, from the unwholesome marsh on which it stood.

Etna, signifies a furnace, or dark and smoky.

Shetland Ponies.

I have been in this country for twenty years, and the only bona-fide Shetland pony farm I have seen yet is in North St. Louis. There are thousands of ponies imported every year from Ireland, which are small and graceful, being a cross between the Shetland and the Irish pony, which is proverbially able to live on next door to nothing and thrive upon it. But the genuine Shetland comes here but seldom on account of the cost. It can be bought for twenty-five to sixty dollars on its native heather, but the expense of getting it to the coast and then across the Atlantic makes it high priced here. The true Shetland is often only about thirty-six inches high when full grown, and is never above forty, and another peculiarity is the shagginess of its coat and the rawness of its bones.

In these respects it resembles the Texas pony, and to groom it is to waste valuable time, as the moment the man's back is turned the groomed animal proceeds to roll in rubbish and dirt. There are some diminutive steeds on the streets of St. Louis, not exceeding forty-five inches in height, with arched necks and very sleek coats, and they are often described as Shetlands. The error, however, is not one into which the owners fall, as these little fellows are imported from the far East, some even from Arabia. They are costly and much handsomer than Shetlands, though they require more care and are not so aggressively hardy. The Shetland thrives well here, and money must be made by keeping it, considering the fact that in the coldest weather it will scrape away the snow and find at least a good lunch.

He Omitted a Comma.

A young society man recently made the acquaintance of a young lady, who rejoiced in the name of Mary Fortune. After a short courtship he proposed marriage and was accepted. Before giving her the engagement ring he handed her a few of his own verses and requested her to read them in his presence. The young lady, after finishing the first line, became very indignant and threw the effusion at her lover's head. Much surprised at such conduct, the young man demanded an explanation. He was shown a line which ran as follows:—"Mary Fortune is but a painted sprite."

The unfortunate omission of the comma, after the first word caused the outbreak. The lady would not hear the poor fellow's explanations, and told him that she would only "be a sister to him."

Strength of Men and Women.

A French experimenter has tested the strength of fifty robust men and fifty healthy women, all of the middle class of society and between 25 and 45 years of age. The strongest man was able to give with his right hand a pressure equivalent to 187 pounds, and the weakest one of 88 pounds. The short men were nearly as strong as the tall, the average difference being less than seven pounds. The force exerted by the strongest woman was only 97 pounds, and that by the weakest was but 35 pounds, while the average was 72 pounds.

MEX need moral courage more than they do higher foreheads.

EMPEROR AND JOURNALIST.

Frederick the Great Was a Newspaper Man.

The fact that Frederick the Great of Prussia was an active journalist and a firm believer in the mission and the power of the press has been brought to general attention curiously enough just in these days when Emperor William II. is speaking of the newspaper men of his empire as "candidates for starvation" and "demoralized high school graduates."

Frederick the Great was the first Hohenzollern who made energetic use of the rather weak German press to strengthen him and justify his measures in the eyes of his own and other people. He chose two ways of creating the public opinion he thought he deserved. Sometimes he sent the outlines of articles or directions as to how they should be drawn to his diplomatic agents abroad, with instructions that they should see to their publication in English, Dutch and Hamburg papers. In this case he always read what was published, and if he found a bit of slipshod condensing or careless elaboration, corrected the poor work with his own hand and forwarded the marked sheet to the unskilled diplomat who was at fault. At other times, and especially when military matters were in question, the great sovereign wrote with his own hand the copy that went to the printer in the office of the daily selected for his correspondence. Many such autograph articles in time of peace were sent abroad for anonymous publication, under the supervision of discreet representatives of the King. Other articles appeared in Germany, as, for instance, the "Letters of an Eye-witness," which were written by Frederick during the first two Silesian wars and were published in the Spener Zeitung. So also in Frederick's private papers were found numerous directions in his handwriting to the effect that this or that essay, sketch, or report should be sent to the press. There is still in existence this letter from the Cabinet Secretary Eichel to Count Finckenstein in Berlin:

"At the command of the King I send you the last of the journal of the last campaign, in order that you may communicate the same to the foreign Ministers and make it generally known through the medium of the press. See also that the Cyprian trader [probably an agent for Constantinople] gets two or three copies of a paper containing the matter."

The close of the journal was, in fact, given out for publication from Dresden four days after the writing of this letter, and appeared in the Berliner Nachrichten. Similar instances abound in Frederick's record during the seven-years war. Then, too, he wrote on his own and his country's behalf, and watched carefully all phases of public opinion at home and abroad, with a view to meeting as much as possible the opposition through the columns of the papers at his service.

In Colonial Times.

A curious postscript was once added to a letter by General Israel Putnam. A spy named Palmer, sent by Sir Henry Clinton, the British commander, had been detected furtively collecting information of the force and condition of the post at Peekskill, and had undergone a military trial. A vessel of war came up the Hudson in all haste, and landed a flag of truce at Verplanck's Point, by which a message was transmitted to Putnam from Clinton, claiming the said Palmer as a lieutenant in the British service. Putnam replied: "HEAD-QUARTERS, 7th August, 1777. Edward Palmer, an officer in the enemy's service, was taken as a spy lurking within our lines; he has been tried as a spy, and shall be executed as a spy; and the flag is ordered to depart immediately. The Productive Power of Weeds—How to Fatten Farrow Cows—Handling the Apple Crop—Agricultural Notes—Household and Kitchen Hints.

Productive Power of Weeds.

TO ascertain the productive power of weeds, the seeds upon a single plant of different species have been counted with the following results: Wild carrot, 1,200; dandelion, $1-500; chickweed, 2,000; cockle, 3,200; campion, 3,425; chess, 3,500; dock, 3,700; ragweed, 4,372; groundsel, 6,500; ox-eye daisy, 9,600; mallow, 16,500; motherwort, 18,000; foxtail, 19,500; sow thistle, 19,000; mustard, 31,000; Canadian thistle, 42,000; red poppy, 50,000; burdock, 400,328; purslane, 500,000; lambs' quarters 825,000.

A Model Rat Trap.
I give below, says a correspondent of Farm and Home, a design for a rat trap. Let the boys try it. The parts are a box about 9x14 inches, a drop, similar to a churn dasher, a frame over the box and a piece of shingle which is inserted in the slot in front of the box. There is also the contrivance to set it with, as shown in the illustration. Every part should be planed smoothly. The drop should be made small enough not to touch any other part when falling. A broom handle may be used for the perpendicular part of the drop, and a heavy piece of plank on the bottom of it to make a heavy fall. A little notch is cut in the shingle a little past the middle, and another notch on inside of front of box, half way between the slot and top. The thin piece of wood on the string is put into these notches when the trap is set. The end of the shingle in the trap, on which the bait is put, should be raised clear from the bottom about a quarter of an inch when the trap is set correctly.

LIVE STOCK AND DAIRY.

Fattening Farrow Cows.

It is a difficult question to solve—how to fatten farrow cows economically. Wheat straw serves merely to furnish a coarse fodder to mix with the grain foods without yielding much nutriment. But if the straw is well cut and the other foods are of good quality we think the following combination will effect his purpose: Fourteen pounds cut wheat straw, 2 pounds wheat bran, 4 pounds ground damaged beans, 4 pounds cornmeal and 3 pounds O. P. linseed meal, the digestible nutriment of which are shown in the following formula, in pounds:

	Albumi- noids.	Carbo- noids.	Hydrates.	Fat
14 pounds cut wheat straw.....	0.11	5.01	0.05	0.05
2 pounds wheat bran.....	0.23	0.92	0.15	0.15
4 pounds ground beans.....	0.81	2.90	0.05	0.05
4 pounds cornmeal.....	0.33	2.52	0.19	0.19
3 pounds O. P. linseed meal.....	0.81	0.81	0.18	0.18
Totals.....	2.31	11.12	0.53	0.53

Nutritive ratio 1 to 5.4. This is a well-balanced milk ration, and if these cows are in good, fair condition should make good progress in laying on fat, as well as yielding rich milk.

The average yield of butter for a lot of good farrow cows on this ration should be between four and five pounds per head per week; but C. has not given any description of his cows by which any closer approximation can be made. He will not find all his cattle to fatten alike, some may require a longer time to get in condition for the butcher.—Country Gentleman.

Cattle Raising in Me.

Cattle raising has become one of the most important Mexican industries. In the Northern States of Mexico there roamed in 1855 over an area of 300,000 square miles 1,590,000 horned cattle, 2,500,000 goats, 1,000,000 sheep, 1,000,000 horses and 500,000 mules. There were then 2,514 cattle ranches valued at $315,000,000 which number of value has greatly increased during the last seven years. The stock-raisers of the United States lose thousands of cattle every year owing to rigorous winters and severe summers, while in Mexico perennial spring smiles on man and beast. In Bulletin No. 9, from the Bureau of American Republics at Washington, figures are given of the profits of a cattle ranch of 617 acres, situated 249 miles from a large city and fifty miles from the nearest railway station. The land cost $4.86 per acre and at the end of two years the business had entirely reimbursed the outlay and given a profit of $8,327 besides, while the profits of future years were estimated at 70 per cent. on the capital invested. Many of these cattle are exported to the United States.

Waste of Food.

Thousands of farmers still feed good fodder from the ground without racks in all weather, says a writer, and let their colts and other young stock run over the farm and pick their living from fence corners and stalk fields. An equal number waste quantities of coarse fodder every winter, which, if properly economized, might do much toward supporting stock well sheltered. Why don't more of us apply some of the good advice given us and work systematically on this feeding problem, buy less hay and more cotton-seed meal and lay up money? Many of us are too lazy to even try a balanced ration. We act as if afraid to adopt something a little out of our usual rut. There is nothing very fearful about four quarts of bran and a pint of oil meal, nothing complicated, but it will make a cow do better when put on cut, wet stalks and poor hay than the finest timothy. It doesn't cost much either—3c., and besides lining the purse it fattens the farm.

The Cowy Smell in Milk.

There is no powder or anything else of that nature that can be put in milk to prevent it having that strong smell from the cows and stable. You could be prosecuted for adulteration if you used anything of this kind. Take your milk out of the stable as soon as it is drawn from the cow. Aerate by pouring it slowly from one pail to the other or by using an aerator, which is better. This will take out all such smells and will help to keep the milk sweet longer. Carding the cow, and even washing the bag may be necessary to keep the milk clear of the fine particles of manure that are almost certain to fall into the milk pail.

Notes.

THE best blooded stock in the world is in the United States.

SHEEP husbandry will unquestionably increase during a few years to come.

THE high price of grain and feed requires good stock to feed it to, to pay a profit as it should on the feed and on the stock. Scrub stock will not do that.

ORCHARD AND GARDEN.

Handling Apples.

Less is really known about the apple crop, and how to grow and handle the fruit, than almost any other product on the farm. Potatoes, wheat, corn and other crops have been studied and experimented with so persistently that most farmers can give good reasons for everything they do concerning them. But apples have been allowed to take care of themselves, and it is only recently that thorough efforts to cultivate and improve them have been generally adopted. Good crops of apples are as much dependent upon good cultivation and handling as a crop of corn. Our trees will produce more and better fruit when they are treated as cultivated fruits, and not as wild trees, transplanted to the orchard. Trees need choice location, they need good soil, mulches, pruning, scrubbing and similar work. If a good variety of an apple is obtained it can be made to produce excellent fruit, with scarcely a poor specimen on it. But this means that the trees must be protected in winter, and be adapted to the soil and climate. It means that we must study apple disease and fungus more than heretofore, and to give good thorough cultivation. The different varieties of apples need studying, so that we can select intelligently those specially marketable, and likely to be adapted to our farms. On many old homesteads dozens of apple trees may be found where poor specimens of fruits are grown. The apples are bitter, small, knotty and almost worthless, except as hog feed. It is not alone due to the poor cultivation, but because the variety is not worth cultivating.

Half the apple crop in this country is not fit to send to the market because of poor growth and poor variety, and half of the other half is not fit to send because of poor handling. Yet many claim that there is no profit in apple growing. The market is overstocked, and those sent to the city rot before they can be sold. When we handle our apples as we now do our eggs the profit will be much larger, and when we study the needs of the trees as we study stock raising, we will be blessed with fine trees and good crops.

Apples that are well grown and matured can be kept finely all winter without decay. But bruised or injured apples will not keep until the holidays. The choicer the varieties the more care there is demanded to keep them through winter. Many of our fruit cellars smell with mold and decay, and apples can not preserve their naturalness in such places. Cellars where furnaces are kept are, on the other hand, generally too dry. It is not so much a dry cellar needed as a cool, clear place. This part of the question needs studying, too, for many good apples are spoiled by lack of proper knowledge in storing and keeping them over winter.

Horticultural Items.

THE willow, elm, poplar or locust should never be planted close to wells or drains.

BEFORE setting out trees of any kind, mark off the ground carefully and set a stake where each tree is to be planted.

HOUSEHOLD AND KITCHEN.

The Family Doctor.

WHOOPING COUGH.—The following is regarded as an excellent remedy: Pure carbonate of potassa, one scruple; cochineal, one grain. Dissolve in six ounces of water sweetened with sugar. Dose for a child 4 or 5 year old, one teaspoonful three times a day, to be taken before meals.

The inhalation of air charged with ammonia vapors, as a remedy for whooping cough, has been tried in France with success. One of the methods of application employed is boiling strong ammonia in the room where the patient is.

Pound best black resin very fine, and give as much as will lie on a cent in a little moist sugar three times a day, commencing before breakfast in the morning. I have known it to cure the most obstinate cases of whooping cough in three weeks.

BURNS AND SCALDS.—Mix common kitchen whitening with sweet oil, or, if sweet oil is not at hand, with water. Plaster the whole of the burn and some inches beyond it, all round, with the above, after mixing it to the consistency of common paste, and lay it on an eighth, or rather more, of an inch in thickness. It acts like a charm; the most agonizing pain is in a few moments stilled. Take care to keep the mixture moist by the application, from time to time, of fresh oil or fresh water, and at night wrap the whole part affected in gutta-percha or flannel, to keep the moisture from evaporating. The patient will, in all probability, unless the flesh be much injured and the burn a very bad one, sleep soundly.

Common baking soda—the bicarbonate—has been found to cure burns or scalds, affording immediate relief when it is promptly applied. For a dry burn, the soda should be made into paste with water. For a scald or wet burned surface, the powered soda (or borax will do as well) should be dusted on.

Hints for the Household.

SALT fish of any kind is quickest and best freshened by soaking in sour milk.

BOILED starch is much improved by the addition of a little salt or dissolved gum arabic.

For simple hoarseness take a fresh egg, beat it and thicken with pulverized sugar. Eat freely of it.

KEROSENE will soften boots or shoes that have been hardened by water and render them pliable as new.

If pork is young the lean will break on being pinched; the fat will be white, soft, and pulpy.

FINE shavings from soft pine wood make a pleasant pillow. They have special curative virtues for coughs and lung troubles.

TO CLEAR a stove of clinkers put a handful of salt into it during a hot fire; when cold remove the clinkers with a cold chisel.

PINE may be made to look like some beautiful wood by giving repeated coats of hot linseed oil and rubbing hard after each coat.

What Good Cooks Say.

MILK TOAST.—Slice some bread, toast it of a nice light brown on both sides. Boil a pint of milk; mix together two teaspoonfuls of flour in a little cold water; stir this into the boiling milk. Let it boil about one minute, then add a little salt and stir into it two ounces of butter. Dip the toast in the milk, place it on a dish, and pour the remainder of the milk over it. The toast may be made much richer by increasing the quantity of butter.

BLACK PUDDING.—Three cupfuls of flour, one and one-half cupfuls of milk, one and one-half cupfuls of raisins (stoned), one egg (or without), butter the size of an egg, teaspoonful of clove, cinnamon, salt, one cupful of molasses. Steam four hours.

CHEESE WAFERS.—Rub a tablespoonful of butter to a cream, and stir in two tablespoonfuls of grated English cheese. Spread this mixture on thin water crackers or plain wafers, or, if you cannot get thin crackers, split the thicker ones. Keep them in a hot oven till they are a delicate brown.

BALLOON MUFFINS.—Place your gem pans on the range to get very hot. Take one pint of flour; half-pint milk, half-pint water; beat thoroughly with a keystone or wire beater. Butter the pans; fill two-thirds full and bake in a quick oven twenty minutes, or until they are puffs and nicely browned. Use no salt or baking powder. Salt is easily added when they are broken open to eat.

FUN FOR YOUNG FOLKS.

QUAINT FIGURES MADE FROM PASTEBOARD.

Sisters of Charity and Small Girls in Sunbonnets—A Pastime That Will Keep Idle Hands Out of Mischief for Hours at a Time—The Necessary Materials.

Card Board Curiosities.

Not every one is aware that the visiting cards which accumulate in most houses with such perplexing rapidity may be put to strange and pleasing uses, keeping idle hands out of mischief for hours at a time. Out of the stiff and chilly pasteboard cheery clowns and nimble puppets may be fashioned for the amusement of the small folk. Scarcely less entertaining and perhaps easier for young and impatient fingers to construct are Sisters of Charity and their little charges.

The necessary materials are within the reach of all—several visiting cards, some stiff white paper, a black pencil, a pencil with one end red and the other blue, and a pair of scissors.

With these, if one is only nimble and exact with her fingers, she can make a little world of her own, where no bugaboos are admitted, with pretty pasteboard people who will bow and scrape, and, above all things, do nothing that they should not.

Bend a visiting card in two, take it lengthwise; trace upon transparent paper half of the model represented in the first drawing, then reproduce it on one of the halves of the doubled card. The crease in the card should then become identical with the dotted line in the middle of the figure.

Once the contour of this half-figure has been traced, cut the card following this contour outline, then unfold the card and you will have a figure identical with the cut. Very little remains to be done in transforming the card into a Sister of Charity.

Rebend the card once more following the middle or median line. Bring forward the two arms following the dotted lines of the model, then form the cap by making two long oblique folds. Of course you may vary the shape according to your own ideas or according to the customary hat wear of the Sisters of Charity you may have in mind, but remember, it must come very far forward to cover the absence of the face, because it must be confessed right here that you can not make faces out of visiting cards.

Color the skirt dark blue with the crayon, and also the flowing sleeves that the sister wears, leaving the front of the skirt quite white to represent the apron. Design the rosary and a hanging bunch of keys, and if you want to perfect the figure place in her hand a little wax taper to represent a candle, or a little piece of bended paper to represent a mass book.

You may be surprised to see that the sister's small pupil has four legs in the outline. Do not be alarmed. When the card upon which the demi-complete tour of the model is traced is bent back two of these superfluous legs will be cut off, leaving just one on either side for her to stand on. If, however, these supports prove insufficient, the little girl's feet may be inserted in the crack of a split cork. Then she will be able to stand up boldly and face even a high wind. With the colored pencil her frocks and stockings may be given just that color which is most becoming to her.

If a still larger family of cardboard people seems desirable, it is quite possible to manufacture them in whole rings by folding and cutting the paper properly. Take a generous square, fold it in two; by a perpendicular fold bend it into four; then crease it in the middle and you will have the bit of paper folded into eight sections. On one side of the folded paper trace the model of the half sister and half girl, being sure to have their hands clasped one in the other. Cut with one stroke of the scissors the eight thicknesses of paper, following the outline. On unfolding the sheet you will find four sisters and four little girls holding hands in a cozy circle. The figures must be colored with the greatest care, as they are very fragile, especially at the juncture of the hands. The folds in each case should be made as in the single figures, and the superfluous legs must be amputated. When completed the circle may not be able to dance without some assistance, but it will stand splendidly. Place it upon

The Unruly Man.

A small boy made a big fat woman furiously angry and a car-load of people very merry, says the Kansas City Times. He was sitting down quietly when this portly woman came in. As nobody got up to give her a seat, she stood in the aisle at the mercy of the bumps and twists and turns of the road. The car had gone about two blocks, when the small boy got up, and, in a whisper that could be heard all through the car, said: "I'll be one of three men to give the lady a seat."

A Little Child's Science.

A little child of my acquaintance was looking out of a window one bright sunny day not long ago. Far out in the field lay a tin can, so placed that it reflected the rays of Old Sol in all its glory.

The child glanced up in the sky, but the sun was not there. It was back of him on the other side of the house. He took another look at the dazzling light in the field, and then, clapping his little hands with glee, he cried:

"Oh, mamma, the sun's fell; may I go get it?"—Wilmington Star.

New Abbreviation.

A lady tells a story of a young man who had come from the country to the city in which she lived, and in a short time fancied himself equal to any social emergency. He never asked advice upon questions of etiquette, and therefore made many mistakes.

At one time the lady issued cards to a dancing party, and among the invited guests she included this rather conceited and exceedingly awkward young man. He had to be out of town at the date of the party, and so was unable to accept the invitation. At the foot of the card he read the letters, R.S.V.P., and was much perplexed as to their meaning. However, he was nothing daunted by his ignorance, and wrote a note declining the invitation in as formal and stilted terms as he could command, and after signing his name added the letters, M.S.C.C.

On his return after the party, he went to call on the lady, and in the course of the conversation asked:

"By the way, Mrs. G., what did you mean by R.S.V.P. at the end of the invitation you sent me?"

Without a note of surprise in her polite voice the hostess replied: "Why, they stand for the French phrase, 'Repondez, s'il vous plait'—'Answer, if you please.'"

Then said the young man with a tone of satisfaction: "So I was all right. I thought I should hit it in my answer."

"Oh, by the way, now that you speak of it, I do wish to ask you what M.S.C.C. stand for. I can not imagine, nor can I find any one who has ever seen the abbreviation used," said the courteous hostess.

"That meant 'Mighty sorry couldn't come.' I should think that was plain enough," said the visitor, airily.

Higher Education of Women.

The higher education for women is undoubtedly an excellent and commendable thing, but it is open to question if it may not get too high for the best practical utility, says the Boston Jester. I number among my acquaintances a most charming young woman, who has devoted a number of her more recent years to the general furishing of an intellect naturally bright. As a result, she scintillates with a consciousness and readiness that at once daze and delight. She knows as much about literature as the late Lowell, and she handles the piano with a touch altogether Paderewskish. She has also given much earnest thought to the Rig Vedas of the ancient Hindoos, and also to theosophy. She is, in short, intellectual. These tastes naturally compel a residence in the immediate purlieus of Boston, but she occasionally pays a fleeting visit to her home, remotely situated in New Jersey. Thither at the recent Christmas time she went. On the breaking of Christmas morn her little brother, a young person of 4, was up early to begin the investigations of the day, and Erudita, wishing to lighten the maternal cares, essayed to dress him. Finally, after great deliberations and frequent experiments, he was duly attired. But the young man was not happy, and after the manner of his kind he soon began to snivel. "Why, my estimable brother, what is it that distresses you?" "Boo, boo! my clothes hurt me." A long and careful search utterly failed, however, to disclose anything amiss. But the tender tears still flowed till the mother appeared on the scene. "Who dressed that child?" she asked. "I did," replied her accomplished daughter. "Well, you've got his pants on hind side before."

Chinese Tea Culture.

It is estimated that 100,000,000 of the Chinese people are engaged in the culture, preparation, sale, carriage, and exportation of tea, and their interests are adversely affected by the rivalry of other countries.

Our women must stand united
And demand their rights
As American citizens.

You will find it easier and better to teach a person right from wrong than try to take chances to reform them after they have gone to the bad.

A social life that worships money more than life and happiness, pursues social distinction, as its aim is, in spirit and fact, an aristocracy.

We have found by experience that discouragements are found on all sides but that encouragements are dealt out sparingly by prudent hands.

It is said that time and tide wait for no man. The time for equal suffrage is now Feb. 22d at St. Louis. The women have waited long enough for time and tide.

The latest position of the friends of woman suffrage, heard by the New York Commercial Advertiser, is to give to all women the right to vote when they support themselves by work.

Poverty is no disgrace although somewhat inconvenient. Your chances for heaven are better than the man with a million dollars, though you are unable to put a nickel in the contribution box.

No matter what your rank and position may be, the lover of books is the happiest of all, and good literature is always in demand, especially in a family that does not enjoy the advantages of a first grade school.

THE ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE

And the Women's Demand.

As the time draws near for the convening of the St. Louis meeting, it is but timely that we present our views on the situation and take issue with those who in their weak and feeble way are trying to discourage the adoption of a suffrage plank at that meeting. It is with considerable degree of influence that some of the very ones that should be with us are using the old political scheming process to carry themselves into prominence, losing sight of our noble women who were great factors in bringing about success to the People's party wherever it has been achieved. These same men openly claim to be members of the F. A. & I. U. or friends to our noble order. What motive prompts their action it is hard to conceive. The F. A. & I. U. and Labor organization everywhere have endorsed universal suffrage, their motto is, "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." Will the St. Louis conference treat this as a farce and by their action say to the world, we merely passed those resolutions to please the women and keep them in line? Some say we must have a short platform. We do not object to that, Land Money transportation and Equal Suffrage. It will meet the approval of every true Alliance woman.

Mrs. J. C. Bare, of Baldwin Kansas, one of the most ardent Alliance workers, has the following to say in a letter recently published in the Advocate.

"We women are looking to this convention, hoping, wishing and praying, that as financial reformers they may not be so bent on securing majorities as to sacrifice principle to prejudices and at sacrifices which must be outrageous in order for true reform, and dare to demand political and property rights for women. There is no class of our people resting more completely under the despotism of a combination whose magnitude over shadows all others, than the woman citizen.

Then to leave out this plank in our platform will necessitate the changing of the mottoes of many reform organizations. The farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union's equal rights to all and special privileges to none will not look very consistent over a platform destitute of a woman's suffrage plank. The fact is established that the majority of the People's party are in favor of political rights for women; then why be afraid of a division of sentiment and a diminished support. The men of our party have not been afraid to allow the representative women to canvass the states, making speeches and singing songs, and to allow those who could not enter into campaign speeches to provide tons of vitals to feed the hungry multitudes at picnics and conventions; and who can say that women have not been a great moving power in the education of public feeling in the cause of the oppressed. Certainly, brothers, there is some reward in the feeling that we have been one of the strongest factors in bringing about a great revolution of sentiment. Every word our women speakers have uttered, every line they have written, have carried conviction to the corrupt politician, as well as to the honest searcher after truth and right. Our bread and pie-makers have never failed to come to the people's gatherings with their share of the work done to perfection. To all these hard worked sinner is due the honor of breaking down the last barriers of woman's right to political privileges. Eternity alone will reveal the good effects of this practical illustration these sisters gave during the campaign of 1890 of what woman can do. No longer can it be said woman is not a political economist, not a counselor, not an independent actor, after such an exhibition of her ability and loyalty. Can woman not feel justified in asking only the rights and privileges she wishes for her brother, since these rights take nothing away from those already privileged? And now that the golden rule and decalogue may have a place in politics, we women whose thoughts and desires for liberty under the old party rule were beginning to be feeble have become strong again, and we begin to realize that the onward march of truth and freedom will never be stayed. If the People's party gives to woman the ballot, its record will be the brightest spot in American history, excepting the emancipation of the black slaves of the south. The women of this land are beginning to hope that the time is near at hand when, as our Senator Peffer said, "the women will vote and the men cease drinking." We hope the day is not far off when our country shall hold its women on an equality with its men, and thus fulfill the motto of the United States: "Under God the people rule."

Mrs. Isabella Beacher Hooker, of Connecticut, says: "That the party that wants to succeed in the next Presidential election had better not only have 'Woman's Suffrage' inscribed on its banners, but it had better have women speakers, and this National Society will furnish you a thousand that will speak for any party that will honestly advocate political rights of women, and they will speak as well as every woman has spoken here to-day. That is my word. Employ them."

It is unnecessary to argue the cause of equal suffrage farther at this time, for it has been admitted, endorsed and recommended at all state and local meetings; that the women are a part of the people and no true Alliance man will volunteer any objection to their voting. But the simple question seems to be: Will it be policy to place such a plank in the platform? Dear brother we are not a policy party, but a party of reform in every sense of the word. The women will be in St. Louis demanding recognition and we believe that our people will see to it that we are recognized, and go hand in hand with the great battle of 1892, and victory will be ours.

NOTES.

Wimen air tew ignerunt tue voat.
Simple justice is all we ask.
It is not policy but our rights we want.

Give us a show in the race of life.
1,000 woman lecturers in the field; People's party 1892.

Give women the ballot they will give you reform.

Give our women encouragement and victory is yours.

Be as true to the women as they are to you.

Don't give us taffy; we are too old for that.

Give the women a suffrage plank; you may have the rest.

The women will stand by you to the last. Will you be as true to them?

Universal suffrage and a short platform will suit.

The Ocala demands and woman's suffrage is good enough.

The eyes of the world are upon you; don't make a mistake.

Don't miss the opportunity the women have offered to you.

You can never succeed without the women's help and cheer.

Rule the women out and the reform movement is a dead letter.

Stick to your friends and let policy take care of itself.

The women are in earnest and will never falter.

Put 1000 women lecturers in the field and revolution is here.

We do not come begging but demanding our rights.

We do not demand our rights with envy, but with love for all and malice to none.

Freedom's battles once begun,
Bequeathed from bleeding sire to son,
Though often lost, are ever won.

For Bina Alliance Otis.

The following was presented by Lydia M. Furbeck to the Shawnee County Alliance, and was unanimously adopted:

MR. PRESIDENT:—In view of the news we received from Washington City, confirming our hopes as to the increase and growth of the People's party, to write that a daughter has been born to our Congressman J. G. Otis and wife. Therefore be it

Resolved, That Shawnee County Alliance do extend to Brother and Sister Otis our hearty congratulations and pray that the little one may grow up a bright and shining light to humanity. And in A. D., 1813, be a voter empowered to assist in perpetuating the good and noble laws which ere that time shall have been enacted by the representatives of the people, elected to congress and the U. S. senate by the People's party.

From The Lecture Field.

Mrs. Mary M. Clardy has been lecturing in Gregg, Panola, Shelby, Nacogdoches and Angelina counties in eastern Texas. On January 5th, a Woman's Christian Alliance was organized at McKendree church, four miles north of Homer, Angelina county. After adopting a constitution the ladies nominated and elected their officers by ballot.

President, Mrs. Fannie Brookshire; vice-president, Mrs. Lee Freeman; secretary, Miss Alida Albritton; treasurer, Miss Julia Clark; leader on scriptural politics, Mrs. Brazil; manager of monthly sociable, Mrs. Masengill; manager of Alliance choir, Miss Ella Clark; agent for Alliance literature, Miss Aehsah Brookshire.

The post office address of the above ladies is Lufkin, Angelina county, Texas.

On January 6th, Mrs. Clardy had the pleasure of organizing a Ladies' Alliance at Center school district at the home of Mrs. Robert Agee. The officers chosen were as follows:

President, Mrs. Margaret Alexander; secretary, Mrs. Emily Agee; treasurer, Mrs. C. B. Burnes. A large circle of young ladies belong to this Alliance. It meets every Saturday afternoon at 2 o'clock at Mrs. C. B. Burnes'.

The post office of the ladies named above is, Homer, Angelina county, Texas.

CO-OPERATIVE COOKING.

The "Bellamy Club" of Kansas said to be a Great Success.

The Junction City Co-operative club, known as the "Bellamy club," has just entered upon its second year with a full compliment of members, most of whom have been with it from the first.

This club was organized to conduct a common kitchen, in which all the family cooking was to be done, away from the home of the members. There are forty-four ladies belonging to the club, all of whom express their satisfaction as to the result of their experiment. During the year that the society has been in existence the sum of $5,320 has been expended for table supplies. All bills have been paid as fast as contracted, so that no debts have been carried over. The officers of the society all serve without pay, having the work of supervision so well distributed that the task is not great for anyone. The secretary, Mrs. M. E. Clark, is one of the most enthusiastic over the results and predicts a prosperous future.

All the cooking for the forty-four families represented has been done at the society kitchen and the prepared food delivered at the various residences. The cost is estimated to be fully one-third less than at separate kitchens, with the advantage of greater variety and better cooking, a professional cook having been employed.

GIRLS, are you a little worried about growing old? Do you think it a calamity to become an old maid? Do you read the advertisements of "face massage," and do you weep and wail when you see wrinkles on your necks or at the corners of your eyes? If you do, you are silly! The truth is, life becomes more and more interesting. It is worth while to look a little old if it is the result of a broadening, progressive life. Is a man interesting in proportion to the smoothness of his features, and the youth of his complexion? "Ah, but," you say, "that is a different case!" No, it is not.—Womankind.

The Right Kind.

"I was thinking, sir," he said, as he hesitated at the door of the old gentleman's private office, "that perhaps I'd like to marry your daughter."

"A noble girl," said the old gentleman reflectively. "I don't know how I can spare her, but I suppose I'll have to some time."

"Yes sir, quite right, sir, and I'd like to have her, except—except—you know I'm not rich, sir."

"I know it," replied the old gentleman, "but you are drawing a fair salary, and I don't require wealth."

"I'm glad of that, sir, but I was sort of thinking that—that she isn't experienced in household matters."

"She isn't," said the old gentleman, "but she's a wonderful observing girl."

"Yes sir, and I think a great deal of her, but if I take her to a home of her own I'm afraid, sir—I'm afraid it would be hard, very hard. She was educated for a rich man's wife and wouldn't know—"

"You're partly right," interrupted the old gentleman, "but let me tell you something about that girl. She went to my closet a couple days ago to get something that was there, and there was a pair of my trousers hanging near the door."

"Yes; what of it?"

"One of the suspender buttons was gone."

"And she—she—"

"The young man was so agitated he could not finish the sentence."

"She noticed it," said the old gentleman.

"Noticed it herself?"

"No one had said a word to her about it."

"But she—she didn't—"

"Yes, she did. She sewed the button on."

"Please, sir, say 'yes,' pleaded the young man, "and—and if she'll have me let us name a day in the near future. And grant me one other favor. 'What is it?'"

"Don't, please don't let any other young man know about that button until after the wedding. I don't want to take any chances."

[BY AUNT LOUISA.]

The day may be vexing and weary,
We may work 'till we scarce can creep,
Yet rest always comes in the evening
When we rock our baby to sleep.
Too soon there will come a twilight
When our babes have our arms outgrow
And we sit in the quiet shadows
And rock in our chair alone.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

A CHOICE SELECTION OF INTERESTING ITEMS.

Comments and Criticisms Based Upon the Happenings of the Day.

A PROFESSIONAL ball player has just fallen heir to $25,000 and announces that he will retire from the diamond. He has 25,000 good reasons for doing so.

THE world failed to fly into smithereens according to the pleasant prophecy of a Kansas City seer. People who bought lavishly on credit because of this prediction will have plenty of time to repent.

LOCAL authorities at Holly Springs, Miss., now wear the belt for dense stupidity. Richard Brounsing, of Chicago, whom they arrested under the supposition that he was John L. Sullivan, was absolutely sober at the time.

The big theater hat will have to go. Another suit for damages has been brought, this time in Minneapolis. When men pay their money to see a show they are not going to be satisfied with the flowers on a woman's big hat.

A FIERY Westerner has sued the managers of a theater for allowing a couple of girls to sit before him wearing hats so large that he could not see the stage. If he would publish his address contributions to support him in the prosecution of the suit would flow in from all over the land.

It has reached a point where Chicago must mend her lawless ways and brace up for the World's Fair. Train robbing in the Western wilds is bad enough, but when a mail wagon can be held up, robbed and the plunder gotten away with right in the heart of Chicago, outsiders will begin to think that they would rather spend their leisure hours somewhere else.

In a murder trial in Pennsylvania it was established by medical evidence that a person hit on the head might be so affected as to go across the street, get a revolver, come back and shoot the assailant with deadly aim and all the time be entirely unconscious of what he was doing. He was not necessarily insane, but simply incapable of forming an idea or having a motive. Moral: Don't hit people.

THE Princess May Victoria, whose father, by the way, used to be called the Duke of Tick, because of his impetuosity, is a good-natured, spunky young person of respectable middle-class appearance, whose hair is not dressed as English young women and New England young women of good family are accustomed to dress theirs, but in the much-frizzed, curled and brought-down-on-the-forehead way which is fashionable in Vienna and St. Louis.

ONE important fact is too much disregarded by certain statesmen of both political parties just at present. There has never been a time when the country would cease to exist because of the death of a single citizen. There have, however, been times when the nation could attend funerals more frequently without regretting the cost. In a nation of 65,000,000 one man does not weigh as much as he appears to when standing on the scales created by his own self-esteem.

DENMARK looks very carefully after the interest of its paupers, and there is comparatively less pauperism there than anywhere else in Europe. It has recently amended its poor laws, and among the new features are the following: "Husband and wife must not be separated if they conduct themselves properly. Aged and feeble persons must not be placed where they will be disturbed or annoyed, and children must not be placed under immoral influences." These are wholesome and prudent provisions and will doubtless meet the views of the philanthropic of all countries.

THE case of Sawtelle, the New Hampshire murderer, who has just died, shows that the law in that State is a peculiarly stupid one. No person found guilty of a capital crime can be hanged until he has been in prison for a year. If the time were extended a trifle murderers might all realize the wish of the Western malefactor who, when told that he would have his choice as to the manner of his death, replied that he preferred to die of old age. The Saw-telle wretch richly deserves the rope, and a system that preserved him until nature took him off in its own fashion cannot fail to bring the administration of justice into contempt.

WE are not troubled in this State with violent altercations or exhibitions of violence on railroad trains, but at the same time a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States may be of interest to travelers. This decision was sent back to the Mississippi court from which it originated, a case in which an unruly passenger was shot by the conductor, for which shooting a verdict of $7,000 was returned against the railroad company. The Mississippi court refused to charge the jury that, if from the manner and attitude of the passenger, the conductor had reason to fear an assault and shot under the belief that he was in imminent personal injury, the company was not responsible. The Supreme Court decides that the jury should have been so charged.

BYRON addressed men as retpiles, Emerson as inferiors; Longfellow as critics; Wordsworth simply soliloquized, careless whether his voice be heard or not; Bryant spoke more to the intellect than to the heart—in select thoughts and chary expressions; but Burns and Whittier will be more deeply loved, if not longer remembered, than others, from the fact that they speak to us in the language of the heart and from the broad level of humanity. Besides this quality of generous, genial manhood, Whittier is distinguished by a vigorous moral earnestness. His creed may not be entirely orthodox, but his spirit is essentially Christian. No poet has more beautifully expressed a profound conviction of the reality and value of the great moral principles and obligations of our nature. Rejecting the shifting sand of human theories as the foundation of his faith, how grandly has he built upon the solid rock of the Divine Justice and Love!

In cool, deliberate daring a performance at Portsmouth by English Torpedo Lieutenant Sturdee, furnishes one of the most notable instances on record. To prove the correctness or falseness of his views regarding the availability of a steel-spiked boom intended to check the rush of a torpedo boat, the Lieutenant and four volunteer seamen made a rush in a boat provided for the occasion against a test boom. The trial was so hazardous that the lives of all concerned were especially insured for the benefit of their families by order of the admiralty. The importance of the experiment as a means of making an actual test of the advisability of a promising means of defense alone justified the risk in the eyes of the officials. The torpedo boat was sent at the boom at full speed. It was caught, spiked and torn so that when finally set free it foundered before reaching shore. The men were rescued in a severely bruised condition. By the outcome of the affair Lieutenant Sturdee's views were disproved. He had said he could break the boom. But he had established his own bravery and dash beyond a question. He and his four companions are of such stuff as makes naval heroes in time of need.

THE masses of the Mexican people have taken occasion more than once recently to display their unfriendly feeling towards Americans notwithstanding the prosperity which American capital and enterprise are developing in that country. It is said that in many parts of Mexico Americans cannot travel without the danger of insult or molestation, and that the display of the American flag has more than once provoked hostile or unfriendly demonstrations. The memory of the Mexican war still remains and the masses probably feel towards us somewhat as the French do towards the Germans for taking back their two provinces. But so far as the area lost by the Mexicans is concerned, it is utterly hopeless that a single acre of it ever will be recovered, hence it is stupid folly for the Greasers to be sulky or revengeful and to display their personal animosity towards Americans. The progress and prosperity of Mexico as well as the development of its resources depend upon American trade, capital and friendship. Whatever tends to weaken or alienate the latter can only react upon Mexico. It is for its immediate and material interests to cultivate friendly relations with this country and to invite American investments and free intercourse between the two peoples.

Grandview alliance, Johnson county, has a membership of fifty-five in good standing. It recently adopted a resolution favoring the free delivery of mail to farmers.

Hampden alliance, in Coffey county, holds open meetings every alternate week, which are exciting a great deal of interest, by reason of the free-for-all discussions.

In spite of the extreme cold weather, the Washington county alliance meeting held recently was attended by delegates from forty sub-alliances. And yet we are told the alliance is dying!

Hillsdale alliance, Jewell county, had an anniversary supper with a big turnout—many members who had grown careless in their attendance, came back and renewed their faith.

Smokomo alliance, Wabaunsee county, held a festival. The house was crowded. Oysters, chicken, cake and pie were served, and there was music, short talks and much enjoyment.

The Mitchell county alliance held recently was an enthusiastic gathering, and the reports from the subs. were highly satisfactory.

The lecturers of sub-alliances in Lincoln county are getting down to systematic work. Each sub-alliance lecturer is assigned the subject upon which he is to speak at quarterly meetings to take place on Saturdays before the county alliance quarterly meetings.

President Biddle don't let "delayed" or "missed" trains hinder him from meeting his appointments, but "hoofs it" if no other conveyance can be found.

The Bourbon county alliance held a profitable session on the 23d ult., and adjourned to meet again next Saturday.

TWO IS COMPANY—THREE IS A CROWD.

From the Milwaukee Advance.

The predicament of the political campaign in next year's presidential campaign will be a ludicrous one. The gold-bugs control both parties in New York, and that being a pivotal state, both parties must shape their platforms so as to satisfy the gold-bugs of New York. But what will satisfy New York will disgust the majority of the southern and western people, and there's the rub. But this difficulty could be surmounted if it were not for the marplot in the shape of the people's party. This is the unknown quantity that bothers the spoils hunters. Without this marplot, they could adopt most any kind of a platform because the people would have only Hobson's choice—to vote for the monopolies; whether labeled republican or democrat. But that third choice. If they could only kill it how happy would either be!

POPE LEO'S STRONG WORDS.

From the New Nation.

What Pope Leo would say to the principles and program of nationalism, if they were correctly brought to his notice, we do not know; but that he is as keenly alive as any nationalist to the intolerable nature of the present industrial situation, and the necessity of some sort of remedy, is apparent from the following extract from his encyclical on "The Condition of Labor." He says: "The elements of a conflict are unmistakable." And among these he mentioned "the enormous fortunes of individuals and the poverty of the masses." He continues: "All agree that some remedy must be found, and quickly found, for the misery and wretchedness which press so heavily at this moment on the large majority of the poor. The ancient workmen's guilds were destroyed in the last century, and no other organization took their place. Public institutions and the laws have repudiated the ancient religion. Hence, by degrees, it has come to pass that workmen have been given over, isolated and defenseless, to the callousness of employers and the greed of unrestrained competition. The evil has been increased by rapacious usury, which, although more than once condemned by the church, is nevertheless under a different form, but with the same guilt still practiced by avaricious and grasping men. And to this must be added the custom of working by contract and the concentration of so many branches of trade in the hands of a few individuals, so that a small number of very rich men have been able to lay upon the masses of the poor a yoke little better than slavery itself."

The above, let it be remembered, is not an extract from a speech by a rabid anarchist, nor was it found in the pocket of the fellow who tried to blow up Russell Sage. It is a deliberate verdict on the present industrial situation given by the venerable head of the most ancient and conservative church in Christendom.

THE COUNTY ALLIANCE.

From the Sedan, Kas., Freeman's Lance.

The meeting of the county alliance was one of harmony and enthusiasm. About eighty delegates were present. Important matters pertaining to the welfare of the order were discussed and much good will result from this meeting. One thing about these county alliance meetings we will speak of for the benefit of certain croakers around this town. We heard one of these know-it-all fellows say that, "as proof that the alliance is dead, compare the number in attendance to-day with the numbers in attendance on former occasions." It is not for this particular class of croakers that we speak, for such brainless idiots are not capable of grasping an idea, but for those who might be misled by such clatter. During the early life of the alliance the representation to the county alliance was one delegate for every ten members. This, it was found, made a cumbersome body and the representation was reduced to one delegate for every twenty members. The county alliance in session is a delegate assembly, and, while the number of delegates has been reduced, the enthusiasm, if the meeting just closed is any indication, has not cooled, but, on the contrary, is increasing. As we have not yet received a detailed report of the meeting, we can only say that the most perfect harmony prevailed, the reports show the order to be in a flourishing condition, the resolutions had the true ring to them, and the delegates went home feeling elated and all were determined that this year should be one of vigorous work in the order. Long live the alliance.

RULE OF THE PEOPLE.

From Augusta, Ga., Alliance Farmer.

It is a pleasant thought to dwell upon—the rule of the people. That time when the wire-pullers and politicians who have manipulated the politics of this country for half a century will take a back seat. When men who have controlled our government, dictated by rich corporations and money powers, will be relegated to that oblivion their deed, and misrule deserve to place them. This event may be sometime off, but the rays of the rising sun of reform are already beginning to warm the hearts of the great masses. It is not only supported by the farmers, but by the laboring people in every department of life—in the shops, in the factories and in the mines. This great reform movement is gaining strength with each setting sun. The people everywhere are becoming interested in it and so soon as they understand the great principles underlying this mighty movement they join in the procession and move on to victory.

The political revolution of the century is upon us and it is a revolution for the bettering of the masses. It is a revolution which means the "reign of the people"—the day of the people. There need be no fear that the people will not be equal to the occasion. They are thinking for themselves and are prepared to act intelligently upon any subject. The day cannot be long delayed when "a hope will be turned into a fact," and the people will reign supreme.

FAITH IS WANTING.

From the Fort Worth, Tex., Independent.

Reform leaders sometimes get discouraged, and no wonder. There is much reform needed in this world, so much that it seems like mountains to be moved. And when they get to actual work, the grain of faith even as large as a mustard seed is found wanting in those who need reform most. Working a reform is like getting religion on the orthodox plan. A man can't get religion unless he wants it. He may be convicted of his sins, but can't be converted to salvation unless he wills it. So with reform. The wage-workers—the very ones needing it—recognize their need, appreciate their condition, sit on the mourners' bench during a campaign in their behalf. Yet they go back to the world, the flesh and the devil for fear of a laugh from the two old parties, or perhaps for fear of the loss of a job. So insidiously is wound the web of slavery around the freedom of this people that they can scarcely believe it true. When they do awake, alas! it may be too late.

LITTLE NUT PEOPLE.

Old Mistress Chestnut once lived in a burr
Padded and lined with the softest of fur.
Jack Frost split it wide with his keen silver knife.
And tumbled her out at the risk of her life.

Here is Don Almond, a grandee from Spain,
Some raisins from Malaga came in his train.
He has a twin brother a shade or two leaner.
When both come together we shout, "Phil-open!"

This is Sir Walnut; he's English, you know,
A friend of my Lady and Lord So-and-So.
Whenever you ask old Sir Walnut to dinner,
Be sure and have wine for the gouty old sinner.

Little Miss Peanut, from North Carolina,
She's not "ristocratic, but no nut is finer.
Sometimes she is roasted and burnt to a cinder.
In Georgia they call her Miss Goober, or Pinder.

Little Miss Hazelnut, in her best bonnet,
Is lovely enough to be put in a sonnet;
And young Mr. Filbert has journeyed from Kent,
To ask her to marry him soon after Lent.

This is old Hickory; look at him well.
A general was named for him, so I've heard tell.
Take care how you hit him; He sometimes hits back!
This stolid old chap is a hard nut to crack.

Old Mr. Nutcracker, just from Brazil,
Is rugged and rough as the side of a hill;
But like many a countenance quite as ill-favored
His covers a kernel deliciously flavored.

Here is a Southerner, graceful and slim,
In flavor no nut is quite equal to him.
Ha, Monsieur Pecan, you know what it means To be served with black coffee in French New Orleans.

Dear little Chinkapin, modest and neat,
Isn't she cunning and isn't she sweet!
Her skin is as smooth as a little boy's chin,
And the squirrels all chatter of Miss Chinkapin.

And now, my dear children, I'm sure I have told
All the queer rhymes that a nutshell can hold.
—St. Nicholas.

MISS FAULKNER.

Dick was prepared for a dull morning. Driving your sister is not the most exciting occupation imaginable, and when that sister and her betrothed occupy the back seat and are totally absorbed in each other, the situation is almost dreary. Dick was feeling gloomy.

If Jim Gardner and Carrie were a pretty picture of devoted happiness, Dick was no less pleasing as a sample of sturdy young manhood—sturdy and yet shy.

Dick was a bashful fellow, but he was so handsome and blue-eyed, and fair-haired and sun-burned, that his modesty was only an added charm.

"Drive into Mrs. Ransom's Dick," said Carrie. "Mother wants me to get her spiced pickle receipt."

Something blue and white was visible in a hammock in Mrs. Ransom's rear yard.

"Oh," Carrie murmured, "it's Mrs. Ransom's niece, a Miss Faulkner from the city—some city. Sally Decker was telling about her. She says she's awfully rich and stylish; says she's been here before, but she never dared call on her. She says she's been to Europe twice, and—well, that she's too stylish for anything!" Carrie ended, hurriedly.

Jim gave a derisive laugh, but Dick sat painfully blushing. To be forced to encounter such a creature! He preferred being swallowed by an earthquake.

Cordial Mrs. Ransom came out at sight of the buggy.

"Come here, Maggy," she called. "My niece, Miss Faulkner—Miss Corwin, Mr. Corwin, and Jim Gardner. I've heard you were engaged to a Jim Gardner from Mecklinville, Carrie, and I suppose that's the young man."

It ended in a good general laugh. But Dick was too bewildered to laugh. For there was added to his awe the element best calculated to reduce a shy young man to the depths of misery—admiration.

Miss Faulkner wore some airy summer garb in which blue predominated—blue stripes, a blue felt hat, blue lacings in her blouse. She was black-haired, dark-eyed, pink-cheeked, and the possessor of a deep dimple.

"You must come with us for a drive, Miss Faulkner," said Carrie, promptly.

"Go on, Maggy," said Mrs. Ransom. Dick stepped down, and Miss Faulkner, with a laughing word of deprecation, stepped up, then Dick drove on.

"Forgot the pickle receipt!" Carrie cried.

If Dick could have laughed with them! But he could not. His mood was almost solemn. He was not only stiff with embarrassment, but he was startled. Had he ever seen her before? Where? It might have been in some angelic vision.

Miss Faulkner was charming as she turned to him, with a faint blush, for the oddity of the situation.

"I'm rather unconventional to come like this," she declared to Dick. Jim and Carrie had settled back to a duet.

"But I do love to drive."

"You do?" said Dick.

He meant it to sound genial, but knew it sounded stiff.

"I think the roads about here are beautiful," said Miss Faulkner. "But the names you call them! I've heard of the crab road and the old cider-biof trail road."

"And the Josiah Hinckley road," said Dick, managed to add.

"I should think you'd call this the rick-rack road," she said, scanning its winding length.

Dick laughed. If only the blood had not gone tingling into his face the next minute! It was the sudden recollection that Miss Faulkner had been twice to Europe which made it.

"Aunt Mary thinks there's no place like Norway," said Miss Faulkner, brightly. "It is very pretty."

"Not so very," said Dick.

Her blue sash blew into his lap, and he did not know what to do about it.

"But it is," said Miss Faulkner. "Are there many young people?"

"Not very many," said Dick.

He wished Carrie and Jim would help him out, but they were fathoms deep in a low-toned dialogue.

"I think I should know," said Miss Faulkner, whispering and smiling, "that your sister was engaged, even if I hadn't heard it."

"It's plain enough," said Dick.

"If she were not so stylish, so rich—hadn't been abroad so frequently!—and if he were not haunted by that queer notion of having seen her before."

"If I didn't bring my book along!" she ejaculated, thumbing her hitherto forgotten pamphlet. "A silly little thing I was reading in a hammock—a regular hammock novel—'Molly's Lovers.' Molly has six frantic lovers so far, and I'm expecting a seventh every minute."

Why couldn't he think of something to rejoin? He should think of the right thing later, he knew. He flicked the horses, and thought of saying something about the length of her visit, but that brought to mind the imposing glories to which she would return. Rich, stylish, travelled, and Dick had never been farther than Farrington in his honest, healthy life.

But he mastered courage for a desperate final effort.

"Haven't I seen you before?" he said rather bluntly.

"Me! Where?" said Miss Faulkner.

"That's what I don't know," he said lamely. "But I thought—why—somehow—I don't know; I can't explain it. Maybe I never have."

He expected no reply to that stammering attempt, and got none. Miss Faulkner sat quiet, as though discouraged and exhausted at last. And Dick—poor Dick! He wished that he was somewhere—anywhere else; that he knew enough to say boo to a goose; that he had never been born. What must she think of him? That he was a tongue-tied, rural gawk!

He cast an affrighted glance at her, sitting demure and lovely. He was almost in love with her, he knew that. In love with her! Well, his misery was strangely complete. Half an hour ago he had been phlegmatically serene. Now!

"Look!" Carrie cried, miraculously rousing herself. "Wild roses! Jim, go and get some this instant. Dick, too. You want some, don't you, Miss Faulkner?"

"Oh, yes!" Miss Faulkner cried, and took the lines from Dick.

"You shall have all I can get," he murmured anxiously.

Jim followed him, and Carrie followed Jim.

"I know they'll overlook that prettiest spray—just for a minute, Miss Faulkner," she said.

It was far more than a minute. The horse gave a sudden plunge; though eighteen years old and soberness itself, he clung to the habits of youth. A white paper was driven under the sorrel nose by the wind, and the frightened animal gave a snort and galloped down the road at high speed.

There was a turn not far away, and Dick had not recovered his breath before he saw the last flicker of Miss Faulkner's blue dress in a cloud of dust. The old horse flew round the corner.

"She'll be killed!" shrieked Carrie, while Jim stood petrified.

But Dick swung into the road and ran. He had not been aware that such powers of swiftness lay in him.

Of course she would be killed, or fearfully injured, at best. He should find her lying somewhere—that he was sure of. But where? He had turned the corner, but he could as yet see nothing. How far he had run he didn't know. It was nearly a mile. Small wonder that when he did make out something ahead of him at last things were swimming before his eyes and his head was buzzing. The object was a person, and not a recumbent person, either. It was Miss Faulkner hurrying toward him.

"Mr. Corwin," she panted, "oh, did you think that I was killed? How absurd it was. Nothing but a newspaper. But how you look. You've run all the way!" She dropped down on the grass, and pulled him down beside her. "I'm afraid you've almost killed yourself," she cried. "Do take off your hat and loosen your collar. You're purple!"

"I'm all right," Dick gasped. "It's you. I thought I should find you lying dead somewhere. I saw your hat back there."

"That came off of course."

"I almost gave you up then."

She half pouted.

"Didn't you think I had a bit of nerve to let myself be killed by a frightened horse? I just sat still and held the lines with all my might and let him run till he got tired. I was sure he'd stop some time. He's up there under that big maple. See him? I tied him to the post and ran back. I thought you'd be worried," she finished demurely.

"But you're plucky!" cried Dick.

his heart thumping a trifle less furiously.

"Why, not so awfully," said the girl, glancing at him half frowningly. "Any other line of conduct would have been stupid, you know. And why shouldn't I know something about horses? We have one, and I drive all over Farrington every day."

"Farrington?"

"Don't go back to monosyllables, Mr. Corwin. Yes, Farrington. Why not? I've lived there nineteen years and three months."

"In Farrington?" said poor Dick, dazedly. "My sister said you were from the city."

"Hardly. Farrington has only 10,000 inhabitants, you know. Is that the reason you were afraid of me?"

She lowered her mischievous eyes. "That and a few other things."

"What other things?"

"My sister said she heard that you were very rich, high and mighty, and—but if it had been true, I ought not to have acted like a fool. I'm bashful, naturally, Miss Faulkner, and I was about rattled out of my wits. Oh, yes; I heard you had been to Europe twice."

She threw up both hands and her pretty round chin.

"Europe! We went to the Thousand Islands once; but we had to economize rather to do that. Father has a hardware store, and not such a very prosperous one, either. There! Am I candid enough for you? Are you afraid of me still, Mr. Corwin?"

What was the matter with the blithe girl? She was smiling, but her dark eyes were misty. Dick did not know then, but a time came when he did. He had felt the power of her delicate beauty, her brightness, and—there was an answering thrill in her own heart.

"I am not afraid of you," said Dick. "And I know where I saw you before; it was in Farrington, a long time ago, and I have never forgotten you."

As he looked at her she blushed and smiled; and it did not occur to them to drive back till Jim and Carrie came in sight down the road.

Dick's shyness was not wholly eradicated. It was five months afterward that he came home from Farrington and told his sister he had left a ring on Maggy Faulkner's hand.

"We liked each other from the very first," he said simply. "Only that story of yours came near settling things; the horse ran away in the nick of time."

"It wasn't mine, Dick," said Carrie. (She and Jim had been married in September.) "It was Sally Decker that said it, and she always mixes things up. It was your own fault if you believed it; I didn't."—Waverly Magazine.

Nothing Forgotten.

It is a terrible reflection—nothing is forgotten. The oath you have just uttered will be remembered forever. In the long ages of the future it will echo through the caverns of despair, making more terrible the dismal abode. A good word you have spoken will vibrate on the ear, giving melody throughout eternity. Be careful how you speak. Take care what you do. The archives of Heaven will never be destroyed, the scroll you now pen with your acts and thoughts, will remain in living characters on the walls of nature, never to be obliterated. What volumes of oaths and falsehood will be opened to the everlasting condemnation of thousands! Who will not think right and act right, that the future may be written in golden words of love and kindness, mercy and truth! Let the terrible thought, nothing is forgotten, be so fixed in your mind, that you will never utter an oath—tell a falsehood—or speak a word, that you would not be willing for all the world to hear.

A Witty Answer.

It was a witty answer by which a hero whom Bismarck was commissioned by the Emperor to decorate with the Iron Cross of the First Class discomfited the Chancellor's attempt to chaff him.

"I am authorized," said Bismarck to him, with that liking for playing jokes which has been so strong throughout his career, "I am authorized to offer you a hundred thalers instead of the cross."

"How much is the cross worth?" asked the soldier.

"Three thalers."

"Very well, then, Highness; I'll take the cross and ninety-seven thalers."

Bismarck was so surprised and pleased by the shrewdness of the answer that he gave the man both the cross and the money.

Safe to Remain.

The fact is not stated, but this little occurrence, reported by the New York Sun, must have taken place in the good old times when ministers were more eloquent, or congregations more patient, than is the case at present.

A stranger entered the meeting house in the middle of the service, and took a seat in the back pew. Presently he whispered to the man at his side, evidently one of the old members:

"How long has he been preaching?"

"Thirty or forty years, I think," answered the elderly man. "I don't know exactly."

"I'll stay then," said the stranger. "He must be nearly done."

THE ARIZONA KICKER.

LIVELY DAYS IN ARIZONA NEWSPAPER LIFE.

Some Circulation Figures That Mean Business—The Postmaster Is Still Doing Business at the Old Stand But May Meet His Reward at Any Moment.

Journalistic Jabs.

HE exchange editor of the New York World has extracted a number of very interesting paragraphs from a late issue of the Arizona Kicker, and of these we give the following:

WE MEAN BUSINESS.—Our temporary came out last week and laid claim to a bona fide circulation of 3,600 copies. We are willing that he shall do a reasonable amount of lying, but such stupendous falsifying must cease.

We'll bet $100 to $50 he hasn't got 1,000 circulation.

We'll bet $100 to $25 that he hasn't got 500.

We'll bet $100 to a cent that his actual circulation, counting in all deadheads, is not over 350.

Further, we'll give him our check for $100 if he dares to take advantage of any of the above opportunities to make more money than he has seen for twenty years before.

OF COURSE.—A Massachusetts subscriber to the Kicker writes to ask if there are any churches in this locality. Does he imagine us to belong to the Cannibal Islands? Of course there are! That is, there is one around somewhere, and we've heard talk of another. If the writer had read his copy of the Kicker as closely as he ought he would have remembered the case where Shorty Pete sat on the church steps and put a bullet through Hank Jackson's nose thirty yards away. Churches! We should smile! Services have not been held very regularly since the old man Davis got drunk and spent one whole night breaking out the windows, but the boys are liable to catch a preacher most any day and put him at work.

A CANARD.—The story about the streets yesterday to the effect that we had finally killed Mr. Wamaker's postmaster in this town must have been started to affect prices on the mule market. There was not the least bit of truth in it. There isn't the slightest excuse for his living, but we suppose he will continue to do so in order to spite the 60,000,000 inhabitants of the United States. We can't see any other object.

While on this subject it may be well for us to remark that we shall visit the postmaster to-morrow to inquire why in Texas it takes four days for a copy of the Kicker to get down the road twelve miles. He'll fly mad, as usual, and will quite likely attempt to draw his gun on us. If he does we shall very likely decide to kill him and have done with it. Everybody says we have delayed the matter altogether too long for the good of the Postoffice Department.

NO STOR.—We understand that Col. Smiley, who has been down on the Kicker ever since we showed that the capital and assets of "The Great Arizona Land Company" consisted solely of two acres of sand and a pair of long-legged boots, spent more than two hours the other day trying to get Jim Taylor to stop his subscription to this paper. The object was to make us feel bad, but it didn't work. Jim not only dotes on the Kicker, but can't hardly wait for publication day to come around. Besides, he tried it on us last summer, and how did he come out? It took us half a day to find him, but after he was found it didn't take him two minutes to subscribe again. We don't compel a man to subscribe, but after he's become a subscriber he has got to have mighty good reasons for throwing up his hand. Indeed, he's got to own a mule which can outrun ours.

RETRACTION.—The policy of the Kicker since the first issue has been to state things fairly and truthfully, and whenever we have discovered that a published item has done any one injustice we have not been slow to follow it with an explanation perfectly satisfactory to the party aggrieved. Last week we had a local item to the effect that some miserable wretch had robbed Maj. Smith's clothes-line of four shirts, and we indulged in the hope that he would speedily be caught and given a dance on the head of a barrel.

It seems that we were mistaken, and the Major feels that he has been placed in a false position to the public. The fact is, as he wishes us to state, he does not own four shirts, but only two, and neither of these is a white one. They are old blue-flannel shirts, much the worse for wear. What was really stolen was a Navajo blanket, and we are glad to make this retraction and set the Major right before this community.

OUR CHRISTMAS ISSUE.—No newspaper published within 300 miles of this town has ever attempted the feat of getting out a special Christmas issue. The Kicker has produced something worthy of its large and respectable clientele. It was a sixteen-page paper, profusely illustrated, and among the good things it contained we may enumerate:

A sketch giving particulars of the last twelve murders in Arizona. Very blooded article.

An article describing how Indians scalp their victims. It will make your hair stand on end to read it.

A two-column sketch entitled, "Men I Have Shot." Gives names of a score of men and relates full particulars of the death of each. The reader will instinctively reach around for his gun as he peruses this truthful sketch.

A very racy and entertaining sketch, entitled, "Fourteen Cases of Lynch Law." This is by a man who always furnished the barrels for the victim to stand on, and he knows whereof he writes. You can feel the barrel wobble as you read.

Another special feature was an illustrated sketch entitled, "The Stages I Have Held Up." This by a genuine road agent, who experienced religion, quit the business and is now sticking type in this office. We hadn't read the article half through when we handed the author our watch and wallet and held up our hands.

Managing a Baby.

As the Michigan Central train was coming to Detroit one day last week there was a baby on board that cried for two straight hours. It was not a cry of teething or colic, but just the whining squall of an infant vixen that wasn't going to be suited anyhow.

The passengers on the car could neither sleep nor read, and at last a red-faced old gentleman turned to the mother and said:

"Madam, if you would stop trotting the life out of that young'un it would let up screaming."

"I guess I know more about babies than you do," snapped the mother.

"Well, all I've got to say is, I've raised eight and the whole caboodle of them never made as much noise as that one," he retorted.

"Perhaps you would like to try your hand on this one. If you can stop him it's more than I can do."

"Give him to me, madam, and in ten minutes he'll be as quiet as a lamb. I've seen worse children many a time."

He winked at the other passengers as he reached out his hands for the baby.

"Tootsey-wootsey tum," he urged, and the infant opened one eye to look at him, while it stiffened like a poker, and roared louder than ever.

"If you will step into the next car so that it won't see you," said the obliging traveler, "I can hush him sooner. He'll be all right, ma'am, don't you worry."

"I won't," said the woman thankfully, as she resigned the squaller and disappeared into the next car.

"H-u-s-h, stop now, little fellow; ride a cock horse to Banbury cross; there was an old woman sh-sh-sh—let go of my hair, you little wretch!"

The baby had tangled its fingers in the chin whiskers of its new friend, and was pulling them out by the roots.

"Stop that noise," howled the passengers in chorus, "or give that kid back to its mother."

He would have been very glad to have acceded to either of those requests, but the mother was gone, and the baby was increasing its music every minute.

"Walky-walky, pet?" he asked in a voice like a callopie; "hush my dear lie still and—murder! Won't somebody go after its mother?"

But nobody would stir. They all wanted to see him manage that baby.

When the conductor called "Detroit" and the train slowed into the depot, a wild-eyed man, coatless and dishevelled, was tearing from one end of the train to the other, while the baby screamed over his shoulder.

"I'll take him now," said a mild voice, and as its mother appeared, that child stopped howling; a cherubic smile dimpled its face, and it looked as if it had never shed a tear in its life. But its volunteer nurse was a complete wreck.—Free Press.

He Had Heard the News.

One of the bishops of the Episcopal Church, wishing to retain some of its old customs among his people, introduced the quaint greeting of the Easter season. One friend meeting another says: "The Lord has risen." The other replies: "He has risen indeed." Many of the Bishop's congregation adopted this form, and among them a certain young lady, devout and holy as a saint. Easter morning meeting a friend, a young man, presumably one of the Bishop's flock, though by reputation not much of a churchman, she said to him: "The Lord has risen."

The gentleman stared blankly for a moment and then replied hopefully, "Oh, really?" The next moment, turning the corner, he met the Bishop. With a pleasant smile the old gentleman said, "The Lord has risen."

This time our friend, feeling that something unusual was up and not liking to be thought ignorant of the fact, replied knowingly, "Yes, Miss Smith was just telling me." The Bishop introduces no old customs now. —Harvard Advocate.

- 6th. To teach the principles of international arbitration and, if possible, to prevent war.

Money in Cabbage and Celery.

"Blood will tell." Good crops cannot be grown with poor st. sins of seed.

The most extensive growers all over the Union now consider them the best in the world. A catalogue giving full particulars regarding them will be sent free to any one interested. When writing for it enclose 20 cents in silver, or postage stamps, and we will also send "How to Grow Cabbage and Celery," a book worth its weight in gold to any grower who has never read it.

Address, ISAAC F. TILLINGHAST, La Plume, Pa.

A Golden Nugget.

A strange novelty in this golden table corn, with its beautiful rich cream color. It is claimed by those who know it that it is very sweet, early and tender, and a superior corn. We notice Vick recommends it very highly. The Floral Guide, which comes to us bringing a bouquet of Carnations on the front cover, with a splendid bunch of Brilliant Poppies on the back, gives full description of this new corn, which is only 15 cents a packet. Vick's Floral Guide is worthy a place in the home of anyone who expects to make a garden the coming spring. By all means send ten cents to JAMES VICK'S SONS, Rochester, N. Y., for the Guide, and you can deduct this amount from your first order. It will pay you well.

SOMETHING NEW AND VALUABLE.

The new book, entitled "PROFIT AND PASTIME, OR THE INDUSTRIAL CLUB DECLAMER," recently published by the Vincent Bros. Publishing Co., of Indianapolis, Ind., surely is a beauty, and at the same time a most timely publication. Our industrial clubs all suffer for a want of social and literary entertainment; so much so that they often lose their attraction for those most wanted. This new book is beautifully illustrated, and is chockful of poems, readings, plays, dialogues, declamations, and, in fact, everything calculated to amuse and instruct both young and old, while through its 320 pages it never loses sight of the underlying principles of social and moral reform. Prices: Paper cover, 50 cents; library cloth, gilt-edge and stamp, $1.25.

LOOK BACK.

[Addressed to a Colored Brother at the Conference.]

You rose in your place, colored brother,
Demanding that all should hear,
And opposed the freedom of women
In words that were strong and clear.
In your talk you meekly admitted
That the franchise for woman is right,
But you dreaded to burden our platform
While our hopes of success was so slight.

Turn your eyes to the past, colored brother,
Look back for some thirty-two years,
And your dark face with shame will grow purple
At thought of your unmanly fears;
For there in the past sorrow-laden
Were days as bitter as rue,
When the eyes of the world were turned upon
A platform burdened for you.

And shame upon you! 'Twas a woman
Took up your unpopular cause,
And published your wrong to the nations
Crying shame on your country's laws.
Then the heavens resounded with battle
And perished the noble and true,
And the nation trembled and suffered because
A platform was burdened for you.

Our rivers ran blood, our fields became graves
That were filled with the young and the fair—
Our cities were ravaged with foul disease
Bred by battle-polluted air;
For often there lay unburied
The forms of the Gray and Blue,
And the elements bleached their bones because
A platform was burdened for you.

And will you turn from thought of that strife
With its wealth of tears and graves,
And use your freedom to plant your foot
On the necks of other slaves?
O shame! Turn back! Lift up your deep voice
For your sisters whose rights are so few,
And crown your brows with the courage of those Who burdened a platform for you.

Hoist reason and courage, my brother,
Truth is mighty and will prevail;
The ship that bears the ballast of right
Is the one that weathers the gale.
Go back and be a chattel again,
Or become a freeman true,
And support the cause of your sisters who helped
To burden a platform for you.

EMMA GHEENT CURTIS,

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

BY MRS. CONGRESSMAN DAVIS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 16, 1892.

MY DEAR FARMER'S WIFE:—While calling lately on my friend, Mrs. J. G. Otis of your city, wife of your congressman, the conversation turned upon the subject of the "National American Equal Suffrage Convention," held in this city, Jan. 17 and 21 inclusive. Mrs. Otis, though unable to attend the meetings, had been inspired by reading the proceedings in the Woman's Tribune. Our talk therefore, was regarding the conviction and the convincing power that emanated from the leaders and speakers, and filled us both with enthusiasm.

You see we had a sort of old-fashioned Methodist class meeting, confessing our short comings and our renewed desires to advance in every possible way the suffrage cause; and on this ground Mrs. Otis asked me to drop you a letter.

The opening service of the convention, held at the church of "Our Father" Sunday, Jan. 17, was a sermon by the Rev. Mila F. Tupper. The text "Think on these things," was used to develop the thought that success is attained through the moral power of ideals. It was made to appear that women had been helped by an ideal which pictured her as necessarily chaste and tender, and that she has been deeply harmed by the standard which has not expected of her strength and courage. The sermon was a strong plea for this wider ideal of womanhood.

The first executive meeting of the session was on Monday at the same church. The convention was called to order by Rev. Anna Shaw, who said: "When the United States congress speaks, every body must keep silence, especially women. To-day has been appointed for a reading at the Capitol, and therefore many of our oldest and most experienced leaders are there, and the duty of carrying on the business of this meeting will involve on less distinguished individuals.

These simultaneous meetings—killing press-birds with one stone—are attributable to the generalship of Susan B. Anthony.

With the following short account may interest your readers:

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEES.
The Woman Suffrage Association was accorded a hearing on Monday morning before the house Judiciary Committee. Mrs. Stanton gave an address on the rights and responsibilities of individuals, and the impossibility of one human being assuming those for another. She was followed by Lucy Stone, Isabella Beecher Hooker and Susan B. Anthony, all of whom were listened to with marked attention.

"This committee last year gave a favorable report on the Woman Suffrage Amendment, which marked a distinct step gained in the history of the movement. This congress, the committee has several new members and stands; Messrs. Culbertson, Texas; Oates, Alabama; Byrum, Ind.; Stockdale, Miss.; Goodnight, Ky.; Boatner, La.; Buchanan, Va.; Chapin, N. Y.; Layton, O.; Wolverton, Pa.; Ezra B. Taylor, O.; Buchanan, N. J.; Ray, N. Y.; Powers, Vt.; and Broderick, Kan.

"The Star says of the hearing, 'Mrs. Stanton is a woman of powerful intellect, and as an advocate is second to no man in the House.'

"The new members of the committee were apparently surprised at receiving such a talk from a woman, and there was the most marked attention on the part of every one present."

"The surprise of the new members was still greater when they found that Mrs. Stanton was not a phenomenal exception, but that all the women there could make an argument that would do credit to the best of public men."

"A hearing was held in the Senate reception room Wednesday morning before the select committee of the Senate on Woman Suffrage. This committee are; Senators Vance, N. C.; Carlisle, Ky.; George, Miss.; Hoar, Mass.; Allen, Washington; Quay, Pa.; Warren, Wy."

HEARINGS BEFORE THE UNITED STATES SENATE COMMITTEE ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 20, 1891.

"The committee having under consideration a petition from the National Woman's Suffrage Association of Massachusetts, praying that an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, granting to women the right of suffrage, be submitted to the several states for ratification and adoption, gave a hearing, to representatives of sundry State Woman Suffrage Associations.

"The CHAIRMAN (Hon. Z. B. Vance, of N. C.): 'We have before us, gentlemen of the committee, a petition from the National Woman's Suffrage Association of Massachusetts, praying that Congress submit an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, granting to women the right to vote. Upon that I have summoned the committee to meet this morning, and there are present a number of ladies who desire to be heard before the committee. If it be the pleasure of the committee, we will now hear them in such order as they among themselves may suggest.'

Senator GEORGE: "I move that they be heard."

Senator WARREN: "I second the motion."

"The motion was agreed to.

Miss SUSAN B. ANTHONY: "Mr. Chairman we have here at this national gathering, representatives from 26 states, though we do not propose within the limited time at your disposal to make 26 speeches, much as we should like to do it. Inasmuch as in the hearing last Monday morning before the Judiciary Committee of the House, the veterans were heard, we propose this morning, to present to you the younger women who are at work in the several states."

Senator GEORGE: "That suits exactly."

"Miss Anthony, thereupon, introduced the several speakers."

There is not room to epitomize these able, eloquent, appeals. But pride for our own dear Kansas bids us clip the following from the Washington Post:

"The really great speech of the hearing was made by Mrs. Annie S. Diggs, of Kansas. It was so adroit that any politician might have envied the head that evolved it. The committee opened its eyes at the bright things and the thorough way they were laid down. Mrs. Diggs is the great Alliance orator and is in the inner circle of that movement. She declared there wasn't an argument in the entire gamut that hadn't been refuted by Kansas experience. 'Talk about men not taking off their hats to us nor giving up street car seats if we voted! You ought to see the way the men lift their hats to us women in Kansas and how they rise when a woman enters a street car! Then about difference of political opinions between husbands and wives. She told of one case where the women all turned around, although they were republicans by education and environments, and voted for a democrat because the republican wasn't fit to transact a mayor's duties. Sensible men weren't mad with their wives, and homes were not disrupted; although husbands were mad, it was not at their own, but other men's wives. She wouldn't plead with either party to grant woman's suffrage, because the party that considered the expediency of such a course and adopted it would be successful, and she herself belonged to the People's party, which was the party for women already, and she could not wish either the republicans or democrats to pursue any course that so obviously bore with it the assurance of success and continuance in or elevation to power. Mrs. Diggs woke the gentlemen up and spoke withal so laughingly that they couldn't but look gracious in spite of the dose she gave them. 'That's practical; that's talk,' one of the committee said afterward."

This hearing was a success to the extent, at least, of converting three persons, then and there, to Equal Suffrage. Two congressmen and one congressman's wife. It has been remarked when a woman is converted she stays so, but we are not so sure of the men. Yet we are very thankful for the courtesy that was extended to the members of this convention. We were much gratified also to see the plate on the door of the senate committee room bearing the words: "Woman Suffrage." It emphasized the fact that there is one little corner under the great white dome of the Capitol where woman is permitted to plead for justice.

Could you, woman of Kansas, have heard these patriots plead for our rights at the national Capitol, could you have heard the fervor and earnestness of their prayers, you would crouch in humiliation to be a mere cipher in the struggle. Had you seen these veterans with silver crowned heads and patient, hopeful faces, could you have heard their arguments unanswerable and sublime, we would not deign to accept the results of their toil without putting your own shoulder to the wheel. You would ask as I did, "What have I done to gain this great boon of equal rights?"

When municipal suffrage came to us in Kansas, I accepted the privilege gratefully, took my daughters to the polls, proud to show to them that our glorious state accorded to women this much of their rights, and further I gloried in the prospect that this privilege was only the beginning of greater blessings. Little did I appreciate how much of vital force this precious morsel of suffrage cost. There I have sat contentedly passing as a suffragist—a born one, I imagined—for my sainted mother taught me to love the fundamental suffrage principles when "Woman's Rights" was a by-word, and "blue stocking" was an epithet of reproach. But are such professions enough to quiet the conscience of a Kansas woman now, when there is so much to gain or so much to lose? There is no standing still now. To do this is to lose what we have. For this reason Kansas was made a field of special work by this convention; and laborers are there now whose efforts every suffragist should seek to sustain and strengthen by encouragement and help.

Every woman knows how much may be done to extend the influence of public speakers.

At this convention, reports from twenty-six states tell of wonderful results from small beginnings. In each case was seen earnestness, enterprise and energy grappling with peculiar difficulties and winning laurels of success.

In many of the reports was a discernible distrust of old-line legislation and a hopeful looking toward the People's party to espouse our cause. For instance, the report from Iowa by Mary J. Coggeshall has this paragraph: "Woman's Suffrage has reached the public ear through the Knights of Labor, the People's party and the Farmer's Alliance." Many of this character might be quoted.

The "Massachusetts National" has developed a system of educational work which points to advanced thought on political and economic subjects. Some of the themes discussed may be suggestive to committees in arranging programs for the numerous literary clubs in Kansas.

The subjects discussed by the class are as follows: Reciprocity, Recent Silver Legislation, Report of the Washington Convention, Behring Sea Controversy, Acts of the Legislature of 1891, Revolution in Chili. Debates were instituted also by this Massachusetts National Society, on Protection and Free Trade, Taxation of Church Property, The Lobby, The Principles of the People's Party and Government Control of State Affairs.

Such subjects thoroughly studied and discussed with candor and deliberation will steadily advance the suffrage cause. "Knowledge is power." M. P. D.

MR. OTIS' BILL.

To Provide Public Revenue by the Loan of Money to the Several States of the Union, and for Other Purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is authorized and empowered, from and after the passage of this act, to have two billion dollars of paper money, or such sum as may be necessary to supply the requirements of this act, duly printed, engraved, numbered, signed and stamped, in manner and form as he may direct, and in denominations from one dollar to five hundred dollars, as the ordinary demands of business may require, each bill, being made absolute money, and not in form of a promise; and all of said money to be a full legal tender for all debts, both public and private, and interchangeable at par with any other kind of lawful money of the United States, and to be known as the "National Union Loan Fund," and placed in the Treasury of the United States subject to the order of the governors of the different States of the Union, as hereinafter specified.

Sec. 2. That any State in the United States desiring to avail itself of the provisions of this act may do so by a joint resolution of the legislature thereof, setting forth:

First. That said State agrees to pay to the United States one per centum per annum on all sums drawn and retained during each year from the "National Union Loan Fund," payable semiannually on the first days of January and July in each year.

Second. That said State will provide by law for the loan of said money to its own citizens, upon reasonable security, at a rate of interest not to exceed three per centum per annum, in such manner and under such rules and regulations as may seem most expedient to such State.

Third. That all drafts made upon such fund shall be made by the governor and secretary of state, with the great seal of the State attached, and be conforming to the law of such State authorizing such draft (a copy of which law, duly certified, must accompany such draft); and that a full statement of account of the State with the "National Union Loan Fund," verified by the treasurer of such State, shall be rendered to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States at the close of every six months, and all interest due the General Government shall be transmitted with such report on the first days of January and July in each year.

Sec. 3. After such State has passed, by its legislature, such joint resolution, and due notice has been given to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of such action, it shall be duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to honor the draft or drafts of such State, made upon the "National Union Loan Fund," to the extent of fifty per centum of the assessed value of the real estate that is situated within said State, as shown by the last census of the United States; and it shall be the duty of the Treasurer to render a full and detailed report, at the commencement of each Congress, of the condition of the "National Union and Loan Fund," and the net revenue derived therefrom to the United States during each year.

Sec. 4. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

L. L. Polk on the Platform.

The conference of the great industrial organizations of the country at St. Louis on the 22d ult., was an event that is destined to become memorable in history. It was not a convocation of partisan leaders to devise methods for the ascendancy of party, to promote personal ends, to plan for the distribution of patronage among partisan favorites, to further the designs and demands of dictatorial money power; but it was a mighty gathering of honest wealth-producers, bread-winners, and tax-payers from the farms, factories and shops all over the land, earnestly honestly seeking a remedy for the evils and oppressive and unjust burdens which have been heaped upon them through corrupt class-legislation and which so seriously threaten the safety of the country and the liberties of the people. No grander body of men with a grander purpose ever assembled in any age or country.

In some respects it was the most remarkable body that ever convened in our country. Every state in the Union, except, perhaps, Rhode Island and Delaware, were represented. Life-long democrats, life-long republicans, greenbackers, prohibitionists, single-tax men, equal suffragists, old soldiers of the "blue" and the "gray," representing thirteen different industrial organizations, met together, and with wonderful unanimity and fraternity aligned themselves solidly under one banner and pledged their faithful allegiance to one platform of principles.

The committee on platform was composed of one hundred and twenty delegates representing every state. It unanimously recommended the address and the platform. The conference, composed of over one thousand delegates, unanimously adopted the address and the platform, except two votes cast against the address.

When before, in the history of this or any other country, has such thorough and harmonious concord of action characterized such a body? Can any one doubt for a moment the ultimate and overwhelming success of such a force and power?

The friends of reform throughout the Union will recognize the fact that the great principles set forth are substantially the same as those of the St. Louis meeting in 1890, and the Ocala and Indianapolis meetings, and are confined chiefly to the great questions of money, land and transportation. A generous spirit of concession and fraternity prevailed throughout. A large portion of the delegates were in favor of an open declaration by the conference for independent political action, but in deference to those who held that the conference should not take such action as would appear to bind the different organizations to any particular political party, generously yielded their views on this point. But they immediately availed themselves of the opportunity afforded by the mass convention, to emphasize their position as to independent political action. Any other course would have been ridiculously inconsistent, unmanly and cowardly. If that great body of representative men had adopted the address and the platform, and had dispensed without providing for some definite and decisive method for enforcing its principles, it would have incurred the contempt of all intelligent men, and would have been laughed to scorn by the whole country.

All the Southern states were well represented, and between their delegates and those from the North there existed a generous and magnanimous rivalry in the grand and manly work of uniting and fraternizing the two sections.

Presuming that you will procure the details from our special correspondent and other sources, they may be omitted here.

Since my arrival in this city, I had the pleasure of meeting Hon. S. B. Alexander, and asked his opinion of the action of the St. Louis meeting. He said:

"I have seen only the accounts that were given out by the associated press, and I have been patiently waiting the truth. Fortunately I have just seen President Butler, and from him have learned the truth of the matter. I am greatly gratified to learn of the harmony that prevailed, and especially am I pleased with the platform. It is one that I think all true Alliance men can and will heartily support. The three planks, money, land, and transportation, are the exact doctrines which I have advocated as president of our State Alliance, and by all my votes in our meetings. You will remember that on the government ownership of railroads you and I were the only ones in the Ocala convention who cast our voice and votes in favor of it, and we are so reported in the official proceedings."

WARY WOMEN'S WAY.

FACTS AND FICTION FOR FAIR FEMALES.

Woman's Work at the World's Fair—A Convenient Tea-Table—Women as Managers—How to Fit a Bodice—Expensive Hair-Dressing—Women at Forty.

Woman's Inventive Work.
WOMAN'S work will not be neglected in the ethnological exhibit of the World's Fair. The chief of that department, says the Western Rural, when asked by the ladies if he would assist them in showing by means of relics and remains that women were the originators of the industrial arts he said that he must necessarily illustrate this fact in his exhibit, as woman was the originator of most of the industrial arts, and that part of the ethnological exhibit which relates to such objects should touch directly upon the work in which the Board of Lady Managers is interested, and would really be a development of the plan proposed by them.

Woman first invented the appliances for the preparation of the food which men procured by hunting and fishing. She was the menial who performed all labor even to tilling the fields, so that she was the original granger. She prepared and shaped the clay for utensils of domestic use and gathered materials for garments from fibers of trees or shrub, the feathers and even the down of birds, the wool, hair or hides of animals. So she was the first potter, tanner, weaver and also the first tailor. The exhibit will bring out the fact that as civilization progressed woman no longer did the crude work of the potter, but became the designer and originator, thus showing that she was the home-maker and possessed to illustrate the methods of preparing such articles by families of native American peoples which can be brought here at the time of the Fair. He said that earrings, bracelets, anklets, and false hair were first made for the adornment of men. Over half the ethnological exhibit will represent the work of women.

Miss Fletcher, who has been assisting Prof. Putnam in collecting his exhibit, gave an account of her work among the Indians. Prof. Putnam says she knows more than any other living woman about the red men. She first came to his notice as a student of archaeology. Through this study her philanthropic interest was aroused, and she became an earnest worker for the Indian. Becoming acquainted with an Omaha girl she decided to visit that tribe and live with them in their primitive way, which she did for some time.

A Convenient Tea Table.
A most convenient tea-table, from which thirty persons may be served if necessary, is so arranged that each cup, saucer, and plate sinks into a recess cut into the table, so that it and all its appurtenances may be moved from one room to another without any mishaps fatal to the china. There are dropping shelves, too, and handles which fold down to the sides of the table when not in use to carry it about. The table is of polished oak, which makes an effective setting for the delicate porcelain with which it is equipped. For lawn teas and for yachting parties nothing could be better than such an arrangement.

Women of Forty.
At forty, if ever, the ladies know how to make the most of themselves, which is untrue of the vast majority in the twenties. Perhaps at no other age is the best type of woman more strikingly beautiful. She understands how to exercise her gifts and charms in most effective fashion. The grace of perfect self-possession, often wanting in young woman, is hers. If she was diffident, awkward and inexperienced, contact with society has removed these imperfections. If she was gushing, emotional, affected and too talkative, she has corrected these faults and is warily winsome where before she was positively wearisome. In the normal evolution of taste she has acquired the rare art of dressing faultlessly and so avoiding the detracting infelicities of earlier years. Her selections of style, color and material harmonize with her figure, complexion and the occasion, and she doesn't look "a day over thirty."

The woman of forty is infinitely more attractive to men than she will be in later life, when her fine complexion fades, wrinkles leave their year-marks across her brow, silver threads her glossy hair, her eyes lose their luster and her step its sprightliness. She may always be agreeable, but never again so fascinating.

The woman of forty? She is distracting, delightful, divine! Her society is a solace which robs remembrance of all remorse and poverty of all pain. The spell of her dark depthless eyes wakens latent emotions into ecstatic life, while the music of her voice thrills and fills the soul with joy unspeakable. Grace, goodness and gentleness supplement the rare and ravishing beauty of face and figure, and her welcoming smile is a precious prize, beside which wealth and learning and kingdom are but dross. Luxuriant nature in the infinite plenitude of her blessings has bequeathed to man naught else so intoxicating and incomparable as the woman of forty.—Troy Press.

Women as Managers.

Now it is perfectly clear to any man who gets at the realities of things that it is impossible for one woman to manage another woman. She can manage a man without any trouble at all. Whether he's her husband or hired man, she knows how to bring him into subjection and keep him there. But in the parlor or the kitchen every woman is equally prone to believe that her way is better than any other woman's way. If one woman submits to another and yields her way it is only temporarily and with a mental, sometimes with an expressed, reservation, which covers the whole case. She will not do it one moment longer than she can help it.

It is a curious and interesting fact that a man who has tried to manage one woman and has failed hopelessly, who is managed by his wife because he is philosophical enough to see that it is really the best way out of it, can go from his home to his factory and manage a hundred men and several hundred girls, so that everything will seem to run like clockwork, while his wife at home, the very woman who has him completely "under her thumb," can't manage her cook and house girl to save her life. If she insists on carrying the hopeless attempt too far, the cook and house girl leave the house and hire out at the factory, where they are managed without the least trouble. Whereupon the highest feminine intellects conclude that the presence of factories in this country is largely responsible for what they call the "servant-girl problem."

There is no problem about it—none whatever, says the St. Louis Republic. Women do not object to being managed by any man they do not expect to marry or have not married already, but they do always, and they always will, object to being managed by another woman, and when they submit to it, it is only until they can escape from it. If they have nowhere else to go of course, they cannot go anywhere else, but if they have—they will. Next to starvation itself, the greatest evil for a woman is in being managed by another woman.

The highest feminine intellects may go on evolving hundreds of columns of what they suppose to be reasoning on a "problem" without changing this in the least. It was and is and is to be.

Fitting a Bodice.

Fitting the waist or bodice of a dress is the most important and at the same time most difficult part of dress-making. Therefore these hints from a writer may be of use. In cutting a bodice always shape each part so that the woof threads will go as straight around your waist as the belt-tape does. That puts the warp perpendicular and gives almost a perfect bias on the seams in the back. When stuff is cut on the cross be careful to have a true bias around the waist, and up the front and back seams. Another thing, if you want your gown to sit smooth over the shoulder, before basting it, stretch each front piece as much as you can halfway from the neck to the armhole, and hold the back full to it for the same distance. Never mind the apparent pucker. Pressing will banish it, and give you an easy seam that will hug the curve of the shoulder almost as a man's coat does. In fitting an armhole if it needs taking in, either set the forms higher on the back or change all of them, bottom as well as top.

Why She Walked.

One day last summer I was waiting in a New York ferry house for the boat that was to take me to New Jersey, when my attention was attracted by a pretty gray-eyed girl of about 14, who came limping in as though she were very tired. Another young girl, who had been seated by my side, sprang up and rushed to meet the newcomer.

"Why, what's the matter? I've been here ever so long. How did you hurt your foot? What in the world kept you?"

These questions tumbled over each other as young girls' questions are apt to do as the two seated themselves, and then Miss Gray Eyes, holding up a lovely, waxen, fragrant magnolia flower, answered the last question first.

"This kept me," she said.

"That flower!" exclaimed her friend, in astonishment. "Why, Laura, what do you mean?"

"I mean exactly what I say," was the reply. "This flower made me late and caused my lameness. And, if you'll be patient for a moment or two, I'll tell you all about it. You see, when I finished shopping at Willisy's, I had just five cents left for my car fare to the ferry. But, instead of paying car fare with it, I bought this magnolia and walked."

"Walked! Way from Fourteenth street? Laura, you're crazy."

"No, I'm not; I'm only very tired, and now don't you say another word till I get through. My mother loves magnolias, especially the kind that grow South, for when she was a girl and lived in Virginia they grew all around the old homestead. And, since she has become an invalid, she seems to love them more than ever. Well, you know we can't raise that kind of magnolia in this part of the country, and so she never sees one except by chance. I thought of all this when I saw a boy offering a bunch of the lovely things for sale (I suppose he got them from some hot-house) at the foot of the elevated station stairs, so I didn't go up the stairs, but bought one flower, with all the money I had, and walked to the ferry."

I couldn't help it, girls and boys, but I turned to that gray-eyed girl, as the boat came in, and said:

"God bless you, my dear, for I'm sure you are a blessing to your mother."

And before she could recover from her surprise at being thus addressed by a stranger, I was gone.—Detroit Free Press.

Two Versions.

People who are frightened are not always conscious of what they do or say at the time; they frequently report themselves to have been perfectly calm and self-possessed in cases of real or fancied danger, while eye-witnesses tell a very different story. Little Mary Woods had spent most of her life in the country, and she had no more fear of a cow than of a kitten; but when her 17-year-old city cousin Frances came to the farm one summer, Mary learned that there was at least one person in the world to whom a cow was an object of terror.

Frances had gone berrying with her little cousin, and as the bars between the berry pasture and the adjoining field happened to be down, a gentle, harmless cow had wandered through the opening till she came quite close to the children. Frances, in describing the scene to her aunt, said:

"Of course, Aunt Sally, I didn't want Mary to know I was afraid of a cow, but I really thought I should scream when I looked up and saw that dreadful, glaring-eyed creature close at our heels. Still I was perfectly calm, and I just walked quickly but firmly to the stone wall, taking Mary by the hand, and I said, 'Let's climb over this wall, Mary; I see some splendid bushes over on the other side!' and she followed me right over."

"She asked me a little while afterward if I was afraid of cows, but I was very busy picking berries just then, and the child didn't repeat her question. I wouldn't have had her suspect I was so frightened for anything."

That night, when the small Mary was getting ready for bed, she said, "Mother, do you know I truly think Cousin Frances is afraid of cows?"

"Why?" said Mrs. Woods.

"Well," said the supposed-to-be unsuspecting child, "you know we were picking berries in grandpa's hill-pasture, and Mr. Fox's Brindle got in there, and she came close up to us. Cousin Frances had been busy picking, and she didn't hear Brindle till she gave a little 'moo.' And then Cousin Frances turned just as pale, and she grabbed my hand, and dragged me along to the wall as fast as ever she could, and she said, 'Let's climb over this cow, Mary; I see some splendid cows over on the other side!'"

"It was the very worst place in the whole wall to get over, and the berries weren't big at all! And," concluded the small sage, "I asked her if she was afraid of cows, and she didn't answer me; so I presume she didn't want to tell a wrong story!"

Curious Action of Smoke.

Out in the top of a light, shallow pasteboard box two holes, each about an inch in diameter, and placed over each an argand lamp chimney. In one hole stand a candle cut to such a length that it will project about half an inch above the box. Light the candle and then hold burning "touch paper" over the other lamp chimney. The smoke, instead of rising, will go down one chimney, and after it has filled the box will rise through the other. The reason is that the burning candle makes a draught up its chimney, and if the box is air-tight to supply the place of what is going out, air must come down the other chimney. "Touch paper," by the way, is made by dipping unglazed paper in a solution of saltpeter. When dry it burns with a smoke but not with flame. Another experiment is to hold the hand tightly over the chimney where the draught is downward. The candle in the other chimney will begin to burn feebly and smoke, and will go out if there are no cracks in the box for air to get in. The reason air does not get to it down its own chimney is that the upward draught there is too strong.

Two boys may create a pile of fun for the company by making up as a dwarf. Let one of them stand behind a table and place his hands on it, while the other stands behind the first and passes his arms around him. The head and body of the second boy and the legs of the first are hidden by curtains, which can be managed if the table be placed in a doorway. Boots are then placed on the hands of boy number one, and a jacket put on over his shoulders and the arms of the hidden player. Then an excellent imitation of a dwarf is thus formed. The face should be disguised as much as possible, and the dwarf may be dressed fantastically to represent a Turk or Moor. To add to the fun, a third person might act the part of showman and give a comic account of the dwarf's history. Then the freak might deliver a speech, appropriate gestures being made by the player who furnishes the arms. These are apt to be ludicrous, as the second boy will probably have trouble in fitting his actions to the words of the first. The dwarf can dance and perform many remarkable feats, such as rubbing his head with his toe or putting both feet in his mouth at once. Three bright boys can keep a room full of company convulsed with laughter with this act, but it should be well rehearsed beforehand.

Napoleon's Remembrance.

Madame Junot, in her "Memoirs of Napoleon," relates many interesting and amusing anecdotes of the Emperor's youth. He was, as a lad, quick-tempered, sensitive, and somewhat vain of his personal appearance, but possessed sufficient good judgment to control his temper upon occasion, and to give no evidence of injured vanity.

"I well recollect," writes Madame Junot, "that on the day when he first put on his uniform, he was as vain as young men usually are on such an occasion. There was one part of his dress which had a very droll appearance—that was his boots."

"They were so high and wide that his little slim legs seemed buried in their amplitude. Young people are always ready to observe anything ridiculous, and as soon as my sister and I saw Napoleon enter the drawing-room we could not restrain our laughter."

"At that early age, as well as in after life, Napoleon could not relish a joke, and when he found himself the object of merriment, he was certain to become angry."

"My sister, who was some years older than I, said that since he wore a sword he ought to be gallant to ladies, and, instead of being angry, should be happy that they joked with him."

"You are nothing but a child—a little pensionnaire!" said Napoleon, in a tone of contempt.

"Cecile, who was then twelve or thirteen years of age, was highly indignant at being called a child, and she hastily resented the affront by replying to Bonaparte, 'And you are nothing but a puss in boots!'"

"This excited a general laugh among all present, except Napoleon, whose rage I will not attempt to describe. Though not much accustomed to society, he had too much tact not to perceive that he ought to be silent when personalities were introduced, and his adversary was a child."

"Though deeply mortified at the unfortunate nickname which my sister had given him, yet he affected to forget it, and to prove that he cherished no malice on the subject he had a little toy made, and gave it to me. This toy consisted of a cat in boots, and in the character of a footman running before a carriage. It was very well made, and must have been rather expensive to him considering his straitened circumstances."

"He brought along with it a pretty little edition of the popular tale, 'Puss in Boots,' which he presented to my sister, begging her to keep it as a token of his remembrance."—Youth's Companion.

What a Chance.

A clever teacher, who has the power of calling out originality in her pupils, says that she should certainly have no time for the use of textbooks if she attempted to answer all the startling questions asked in her class. One day the attraction of gravitation was under discussion and Charley Beale volunteered the opinion that he "didn't see any need of it anyway."

"It seems to me," said Charley, "there's no particular use in having the earth attract things. Now, when the apple fell and made Newton think out the reason—why, that apple might just as well have stayed where it was till somebody gathered it."

"You play ball, don't you?" asked the teacher.

"Yes'm."

"Suppose you hit the ball very high, what happens?"

"It falls."

"But if there was no attraction toward the earth it wouldn't fall. Don't you think that might prove inconvenient?"

Charley did not answer immediately. His eyes were bright with the light of a new idea.

"My!" he broke forth involuntarily. "What a chance for a home run!"—Exchange.

Oleomargarine.

The leading article in the latest number of the Medical News is devoted to a discussion of the oleomargarine question by Prof. G. C. Caldwell. After describing the processes of manufacture, and showing that the butterine product may be as clean and wholesome as real butter, the writer says it is not so digestible, though not less so than are any other animal fats except butter. He does not believe any satisfactory proof has ever been furnished of the presence of disease germs in the artificial product, unless when admittedly in a decomposing state, and no case of disease, nor any general specific form of disease, can be pointed out as due even in the most indirect manner to the use of this food product.

There is no positive proof that butterine is now made of disease-causing materials, or ever has been, though dyspepsia may possibly be favored by its large use, due to cheapness. And it can hardly be said that the passage of a national law has given any better assurance than previously existed that only a clean and pure product will be sold. The chief motive for such legislation was that of attempting to save from pecuniary damage another industry working along the same line; and it is not surprising that many regard it as unjust to prohibit the manufacture or sale of this substance whether directly or by such ridiculous subterfuges as requiring it to be colored pink or any other abnormal hue.

But, on the other hand, oleomargarine is not butter, and it is wrong to sell it as butter, no matter how good the imitation may be. Probably its manufacturers and sellers have brought upon themselves all the trouble in the way of prohibitive legislation by their attempts to sell it as butter. "All over the civilized world general or special laws exist prohibiting the selling of anything for what it is not, and no one denies the equity of those laws." When a man sells oleomargarine as butter he is violating those laws, and just in proportion to the ease with which the imitation can be palmed off for what it is not, and just in proportion to the value of other useful industries that are injured by such deceit, should be the penalties imposed on the fraud. The efficiency of the means for its detection ought to be ample, so that the producer of the genuine article need not go far out of his way for the means of defense. Therefore laws requiring that oleomargarine shall be sold for just what it is are just laws, no matter how stringent they may be.

Furthermore, the writer indicates it as his conviction that there is work for the boards of health in connection with the manufacture and sale of this food product in States where these are permitted. Especially should it manufacture be watched. This need to be done at least until it has been fully established that only clear fat from animals killed in health can be used, and there is some doubt in regard to this point. The large license fee required throws the manufacture into comparatively few hands, and thus inspection is rendered more easy. Under such restrictions it should be that the trade in this food product might safely be left to itself, and it might be a blessing to the community as a whole in supplying low prices a savory substitute for butter, far better in quality than most of that which the poorer classes had to eat if they can get only genuine butter. And as to those who can afford to pay for good butter the opportunity to get it will be better, dairymen will be obliged to make butter if they make butter at all.

Our women were as true as steel.

The Industrial platform is for all, both great and small.

We asked for a Suffrage plank and we received a resolution.

Let our Standard Bearers be men who cannot be bought nor sold.

The world would be better with a few more such men as T. V. Powderly.

The People's party is the only party that will give women their franchise.

Hon. T. V. Powderly cast the solid Knights of Labor vote for Equal Suffrage.

The Equal Suffrage resolution is the stepping stone to the great Industrial platform.

The platform that favors our fathers, husbands and sons helps the women and children the same.

If your motto is "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none," live and die by your principles.

Freedom's battles once begun, Bequeathed from bleeding sire to son, Though often lost, are ever won.

Give us men and women with clean records to make our laws, and then the much needed reform we will have.

ALTHOUGH the decision of the St. Louis convention was not just as we would have liked, yet the platform is excellent as far as it goes.

If you want the help of women you must select good men. You have them in your ranks. We do not expect you to be perfect.

"The St. Louis convention was composed of a level headed set of fellows."—Ez.

Yes brothers, some of them were so level they were actually flat.

EQUAL SUFFRAGE is a side issue, is it! Heavens! Such stupidity. If the women had have been side-tracked, where would you have been to-day?

READ our offer in another column. The FARMER'S WIFE Three months for Ten cents, and send your choice for president and vice-president of the United States.

It's funny the women will insist that they are a part of the people. But you know sometimes ignorance is bliss, and I suppose they have not been properly educated.

HAPPY would the women of America be to stand by the side of their husbands and with their ballots place two as brave men at the head of our nation as ever were the Blue and the Gray.

Would you succeed in the great battle that is to be fought? Then keep good men whose names are untarnished at the front. Men who will stand by your motto just as it reads.

GRAND noble heroes were they who met at St. Louis, February 22nd. Noble men, who had said that united they would stand and free their beloved country from the bonds of oppression, if to accomplish the work a sacrifice must be made (of themselves). No, no, not consistently. With the motto of "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

WHAT a grand declaration was the one when the Blue and the Gray declared that the same stars and stripes should wave as an emblem of protection for white and black, North and South alike.

BROTHER, we only ask for the power to help you make this grand movement a success. We do not plead for notoriety, but we do plead for the right to protect our homes and our children. Do we plead in vain?

O, YE sainted husbands and fathers who died upon the battle field that all men might be free, did you ever think that the time would come when your wives and daughters would be compelled to ask for their freedom and that the men you gave your life for would say to them, "you have no rights that we are bound to respect?" Alas, such is the case.

"The people are the natural rulers of this country," so says the Des Moines Tribune. Our sentiments exactly agree with those of the Tribune in general. Now when it is settled who are the people, then we will all settle down to business and see that the rulings of the people are just. But as long as our country is governed by less than one-half of the people, just so long there will be trouble. See?

It is funny that the women will insist that they are a part of the people. But then I suppose our education in that line has been neglected; or else we are willful and persistent, just like our husbands. You know they claim that they have rights that have been trampled on by a few men like bankers, railroad corporations, millionaires and such (and I guess they are right), and so they banded themselves together and enlisted all in their service (even the women) and they say they will have their rights. And the women of America have taken a silent vow and pledged themselves to help free them from the most terrible conditions that men ever placed themselves in, and we say to you "Taint not be the way," we will stand by your side through all, but while we are together working to win this battle which will determine whether the laborer has any rights that should be considered, the women of America are forming themselves in a solid band, clasping hands from the Atlantic to the Pacific and the time is coming when we will proclaim to the world that we have rights that shall be respected. And woe be to any one who shall say that the dear old flag does not mean liberty for the mothers of this land.

For the FARMER'S WIFE.

Woman In The Past

BY EVELINE MCCORMICK.

ED. FARMER'S WIFE:—That brilliant and courageous woman, Mary A. Livermore, says in a recent article entitled "Centuries of Dishonor," "The contemptuous opinion of woman entertained by the past, has found expression, not alone in literature, but in unjust laws and customs. Civilly, she has been a minor, and politically she has had no existence." Mme. de Staël wrote truly, "That with all the faculties with which nature had gifted woman, she had been able to exercise fully but one—the faculty of suffering."

When we read such painful facts as these in regard to our sex in the past, how can our girls read history with any very great degree of admiration of the deeds of men? Where, and in what, consists the boasted chivalry of the so-called knights of the past? In the light of such knowledge, we fortunate women of the present day should rejoice that our lives were cast in the promising light of the 19th century, though a bitter fight is yet before us ere we can be classed as equal before the law with the most depraved, most illiterate of the opposite sex.

Ever since I have been old enough to understand the commonest talk, I have heard the cry of remonstrance against "taxation without representation," as if it was a most heinous wrong if ever enforced against a male for a punishment accompanied by a penalty for crime. But I, a woman, have gone on year after year, handing in an extravagant and extortioned assessment on property, the illiterate, dull scavenger that cleans my back yard having voted what I shall do with my own. I have a friend who having made a terrible step in marriage, has recently had her child taken from her by the husband. She was obliged to obtain a divorce, from the law giving him the right so to do. What worse could savages do than this? And man, in his professed wisdom and chivalry, lets such a statute remain on the books in any state in the union.

Kate Field says in her "Washington" if she was not thoroughly convinced of the fact that universal manhood suffrage has proved a ghastly mistake, she would readily array herself on the side of universal woman suffrage. If the readers of the FARMER'S WIFE can indulge me in the thought, I can but feel she is somewhat in the right. While I am convinced it is for the greatest good to all concerned that woman should have the ballot, yet it does seem like magnifying an already terrible evil to place it in the hands of any more incompetents. As I am enlightened now on the subject, it appears to me to be wisdom to take the ballot from all incompetent, illiterate men, and give it into the hands of all competent and intelligent women, regardless of property representation.

I will ask space farther to quote the following sublime words from a recent magazine article by Prof. Jas. Rhodes Buchanan: "It is not extravagant to believe that when the voice of fully developed woman is heard in the determination of national policy, neither walls nor forts, nor steel clad navies will be required, for nations will no longer be as dangerous as wild beasts, and the ten millions of men now under training for homicide will learn that they are human beings but not international assassins. The end of war will also be the end of starving poverty."

HOME EDUCATION.

BY FANNY TETRILL.

In the tumultuous agitation that now permeates every department of our political and social economy, one of the most hopeful indications of a permanent reformation, is the diligent spirit of inquiry that is manifested on the part of the laboring classes who have hitherto permitted themselves to be blindly led by a few until they have discovered themselves on a brink of a precipice, the real depth of which will be measured only by the gigantic arm of Centuries.

This direful disturbance on the placid pool of politics is hailed by many as a harbinger of evil—the menace of doom, when, in truth, it should be greeted as the surest sign of progress—an infallible token of good.

To what source, pray, will a nation look for progress if not to the enlightenment of its citizens? The character of a state depends upon the character of the individuals of a state; there cannot be an enlightened nation without the enlightenment of the individuals of a nation. But "its only on the roaring loom of Time that the enduring fabric of a stable government is woven." A nation is not made, it grows. It cannot be forced by artificial means like an exotic. Like the disciples of Educational Reform, we must report to "natural methods." An education in statecraft is not the only needed culture. The needed regeneration of our country is of that radical nature that cannot be accomplished by easy methods and in a brief space of time; it cannot be effected by legislation, by higher education, by political education, by social reformation; but when we add to an aggregation of all these forces, the slow, practical methods of ethical education, we may reasonably hope to see the ushering in of the millennial dawn.

In our eagerness for adopting plans that will bring the most visible results, we are apt to overlook some of the most powerful agencies that operate to develop a prosperous people. One of the most fertile fields of culture, and one of the most neglected, is the home. More than a hundred years ago Pestalozzi tried to teach the world the truth of Plato's observation, viz: "The reformation of a nation begins in the nursery." O mothers! what a work for you. The happy future of our country must be built up by the tiny hands that today are rearing mimic castles. Yes, the soft, rose-tinted arm of childhood is the strong crow-bar with which the mountains of sin and prejudice must be overturned.

[These introductory remarks will be followed next issue with the subject Character Building, treating only of that phase of it which belongs to the home.]

Faith, Hope and Charity.

From the Alliance Tribune.

When I first thought of writing upon this subject I thought perhaps I should enlarge and broaden out each separate word—Faith, the first, Hope the second, and third, Charity, but now that my time is narrowed down to a few moments in which to write, I shall use the words in a large measure collectively.

In all reform measures it necessarily requires a large amount of faith and hope to accomplish our object. We feel we are in the right, and that we are striving to better mankind, by overcoming existing evils, putting down corrupting influences, crowding out prejudice and selfishness, and in their place strive to elevate mankind to a higher moral, intellectual and social condition. We feel we are in the right, and feeling thus we must have faith to believe that right will win. It requires a great deal of faith and charity in the hearts of men and women to overcome the prejudice and inordinate selfishness that we all possess to a certain extent, and that we shall have to free ourselves from before our object shall have reached the end we have in view. When we shall possess the true spirit of co-operation and brotherly love in our hearts and lives we shall be a long way on the road to success, and this we must have before success will be ours. All feelings of doubt and suspicion must be overcome by faith in those who are striving and toiling day after day to lighten our burdens and make it possible for all to have an equal chance in the race of life.

The Alliance is broad in its principles; grand in its motives; how easy then to shipwreck all our hopes by a spirit of intolerance and doubt. Doubt would take the place of faith, despair, that of hope and selfishness would forever tramp out all spirit of charity, and who can tell what the result would be.

Brothers and sisters, do you not think and feel that the work we have in hand is one of the very grandest? that if we succeed we shall feel we have not lived and toiled in vain? Many there are who say, "Oh yes, I belong to the Alliance. I like it. I feel that it is just the thing, but I cannot do anything to help." Let me ask, do you try when requested? Do you make an effort, or are you so selfish that you are always willing to receive and never give? To write or prepare a paper takes time; to select an article to read takes time; then who can triumphantly say his or her time is more valuable.

We need men and women whom we can reason with without getting in a passion; who will have patience enough to listen to both sides of a question; who will honor truth and principles above all other things, and charity enough to give you credit for sincerity, and who can respect the opinions of others. To all such we cordially extend the hand of fellowship and invite them to come in and join with us and lend a helping hand. We are working for the good of the many, and in striving to help others we help ourselves. It matters not how humble our lot in life may be, if we are faithful we gain the honor and esteem of others; if we lend a helping hand to those who are in trouble in this hour of need, we win their friendship and love at the same time fulfilling the injunction "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of one of these ye did it unto me." It has been said that Christianity furnishes the ideal rule for the government of human action; that the law of the universe is co-operation. It is God's law. Why does man discord it? Is it because of our insincerity and doubt, or because it is such a hard matter to change our manner of life?

This is a wonderful step for the toiling masses to take, but once taken there ought not to be any turning back. "Equal rights to all special privileges to none," is our motto, and we should never rest until we have accomplished it. So will our Faith, Hope and Charity in our fellow man be so firmly anchored that time nor tide can ever lessen but rather strengthen the bonds of love which unite us to the thousands who are looking and longing for our success. We say, hope on, and your faith will surely be rewarded, for a change is surely coming—the people have spoken.

NOTICE.

I have just perused a copy of the FARMER'S WIFE of Topeka Kansas. It is a capital paper ably edited, and filled with good wholesome articles upon important and vital subjects.

I can't see why every farmer's wife in the land can't have this paper come to her address.

It is cheap, 50 cents per year, comes monthly, and sparkling with gems of thought, pungent, crispy articles on land, transportation and money. It advocates reform.

The editor is Mrs. Emma D. Paok, and Publisher is I. W. Paok. It is well Paok-ed concern, and will come safe and direct every month in the year, to those who wish its monthly visits.

ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE.

The Women Recognised Miss Frances Willard as Vice President.

An Equal Suffrage Resolution Passed Without a Descending Voice.

The great Industrial conference at St. Louis, February 22, adopted the best platform ever placed before the people. It accomplished all for which it was called for, the uniting of all Labor organizations.

The mass of the convention was from the first in favor of an Equal Suffrage plank in the platform.

The committee agreed to so report, but for the sake of harmony it was afterward taken from the report.

Miss Frances E. Willard presented, however, a minority report embodying both Equal Suffrage and Prohibition.

"Discussion on this report occupied a great portion of the afternoon. It was evident from the first that it would not be adopted. The delegates, as a mass, while favoring the demands, believed them untimely and unwise at present. They thought that financial and economic reforms were first and most needed, and that moral reforms would naturally follow them.

The following resolution was introduced by Mrs. Emma Ghent Curtis.

Resolved, That we demand that the question of woman suffrage be submitted to the state and territory legislatures for favorable action.

Mrs. Curtis made a clever little speech in support of her measure, which reflects credit not only on herself but to the noble order of which she is a member.

This resolution passed without a descending voice and shows clearly that the great Industrial conference was universally in favor of Equal Rights.

They demand that the question be favorably acted upon by the legislatures of each state and territory. It also puts the Industrial conference clearly to the front as demanding from Congress an amendment to the Federal Constitution prohibiting States from disfranchising citizens because of sex.

And while we stand fairly and squarely upon the platform and endorse it fully and without reserve, we proudly point that grand motto hanging as it does on the four walls, "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none" regardless of sex.

Among the women present at the Conference were Mrs. Annette Nye, California; Mrs. Emma Ghent Curtis, Colorado; Mrs. Emma D. Paok, Kansas; Mrs. Mary E. Lease, Kansas; Mrs. Fannie McCormick, Kansas; Mrs. S. H. Snyder, Kansas; Mrs. Dr. McLellan, Kansas; Mrs. E. H. Snow, Kansas; Mrs. Mary M. WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

Read before the Shawnee Co. Alliance and Requested Printed in the Tribunes.

By Emma D. Paok.

To me there is an absurdity in the name given to or assumed by the party interested in the cause of woman's elevation, which seems to have escaped general notice. "Woman's Rights," if rights, why ask them? Why place in the light of a favor, or something which cannot be obtained without the consent of man that which inherently belongs to you? The very fact of asking for anything implies the control of it by the person from whom we ask it.

What is it then that woman so humbly seeks? Would her possession of these rights so long unclaimed work injustice to any of the other members of society? Would man's just rights be endangered, or would it not prove a strong power to secure his rights? Would children fail to receive the care and consideration to which they are entitled? Oh, no, there is no danger from these quarters. Then what is the trouble? My friends, it is the consciousness that when man divides with woman, the care and responsibilities of government that bribery, injustice and corruption must and will cease. It is the consciousness that when woman is in possession of her full citizenship a free and unconditional use of the ballot—that our noblest, truest men and women will be sought after to fill our offices. Those who cannot be bought and will not be sold; men and women who love honor better than silver or gold, and of such we have plenty to fill all offices.

There is no line of honorable business that man engages in that woman cannot as his equal stand by his side. I care not what it is. One of the largest flouring mills in New England has a woman at the head as manager. In Chicago there are fifteen hundred employment offices, Suggestions in the Matter of Laying a Tile Drain—An Adjustable Gate—When Horses Refuse Their Feed—General Live Stock and Dairy Notes.

How to Lay a Tile Drain.

IN constructing a tile drain a good outlet is the first thing to see to; then go to the lowest point to be drained. Here set another stake in such a way that a level (use a long one to be more accurate in sighting) will set perfectly level. Then by sighting to the outlet stake you have a water-mark. By measuring from this to the ground on both stakes and taking the difference you have the fall between the two places. Now measure the distance between the two stakes and see how the fall compares with the distance. Nothing less than two inches to 100 feet will answer, and the more the better. In digging the trench, if there is no water to show the fall, drive stakes in pairs, one on each side every few rods, so that by laying a straight-edge on top perfectly level and measuring to the bottom of the ditch the fall can be obtained. The trenches should go as deep as possible, for the deeper they go the larger surface is drained, as the tile will drain twenty to a hundred feet on each side, according to the soil and fall. Drains are usually dug from three to four feet deep, but drain even if you cannot go deeper than eighteen inches. In digging throw the top soil on one side and the poor on the other, so as to put it back as before. If the bottom is quicksand do not delay laying the tile, but lay and cover immediately, beginning at the outlet and making connections with the back drains as you go along. All of these connections should be made so as to bring the flow of water in as near a parallel course as possible, so as not to obstruct the current.

As quick a way as any to make these connections is to saw a hole in a tile of the main to correspond to the meeting of the branch, which will have to be sawed off on a slant to make allowance for the angle. In this way the joint is as tight as the ends, while silt, etc., do not wash in. In covering be careful not to displace the joints so as to let in the dirt. It is a good plan to cover these joints with tarred paper or sods before filling and then trample some fine soil on both sides with the feet so as not to displace the tile. If the soil is of a quicksand nature put some of the top soil around and over the tile for a few inches, and then any of it will answer. Fill to within six or eight inches of the top and then with a plow backfurrow together. At the end of a chain, or where it draws the water from an open ditch sink a barrel, running the tile into the same at about the center. This will prevent the tile from filling up and the dirt dropping into the barrel, which can be cleaned out as often as necessary. These barrels should be provided with covers and sufficiently covered in the fall to prevent freezing during the winter. If boards are to be used, horseshoe tile will answer as well as any, and there are very few soils in which a board would not benefit by keeping the tile from settling unevenly. Try more tile drain and there will be less cry of hard times.—Market Gardener.

Potters About Meadow Lands.

I would not have manure put in a cellar nor go to the expense of a shed to cover it. I would not have a slat floor, for cattle cannot stand in comfort on one any better than a bare-footed man. I save all the urine and keep it by itself in a cistern. I would not spread a load of manure on a larger surface than two rods square and consider it the right thing to haul out manure in winter as fast as made and spread it then. If left in heaps, the work is retarded in the spring by having to wait for the ground to thaw out where the heaps were. The best, and in the long run the cheapest floor, for a cow stable is stone flagging laid in cement. Fifty years will see it still in good condition while spruce plank will break and leak in four. I pump the urine into the sprinkler, and have some ninety hogsheads to apply in the spring and use ten hogsheads per acre on meadow land. It increases the yield four fold the first year it is applied. I have not seen the benefit I expected from top-dressing meadows with manure, and would prefer plowing it in for a crop of grain. In the days when plaster was extensively used in this country, there was a saying "that it made rich parents and poor children," and I think it will also apply to the present day when commercial fertilizers are being so extensively used. Barnyard manure, and plenty of it, is the only thing that will leave the land in good condition for those who come after us. I use plenty of coarse bone meal—coarse because the effect is not too speedily taken up by the crops and because adulteration is more easily detected. Always plow under manure and not deeper than four inches. I think salt is very beneficial, for where I cut off Canada thistles and put salt on the roots, there is the heaviest timothy in the field.—Mr. Gedney, to the Bedford (N. Y.) Farmers' Club.

Adjustable Gate.

Here is an attachment that can be used on any hinged gate, by means of which the gate may be raised to swing over snowdrifts or other obstructions; also to let small stock run under, writes L. A. Greely in Farm and Home. The hook part of the hinges are screwed into a 3x4 scantling instead of into the post; this scantling is loosely clasped against the post by means of two staples made of half inch round iron; the ends of the staples go through the post and are secured by burrs. A pin through the scantling, and resting on top of the lower staple, holds the gate at any desired height. This attachment will be found to be almost invaluable to a large number of farmers, and will save a great deal of annoyance.

LIVE STOCK AND DAIRY.

When Horses Refuse Their Feed.

Loss of appetite may be caused by overwork or too little exercise, fault with the food, faulty general management, soreness about the mouth or disease of the teeth. When refusal to eat is due to continued overfeeding, short rations for a day or two is all that is required. Food that is not eaten within a reasonable time should be promptly removed from the manger and the next feed correspondingly reduced. Give animal no more than he will eat up clean. It often happens that food is refused for no apparent reason, the animal at the same time becoming thin and weak. In such cases "condimental" foods are useful, not because of any superior nutritive value, but because they do rouse the appetite. The following formula is recommended for the greater number of cases: Ground or crushed oats and corn meal, of each five pounds, oil meal one-fourth of a pound, common table salt two ounces. If the animal seems to need a tonic or is troubled with intestinal worms, mix with each ration as above given, a dessertspoonful of powdered gentian, and a small teaspoonful of the dried sulphate of iron. If the animal then refuses the ration a little starvation is all that will be required to cause him to take it, the dislike ceasing as soon as the animal has once been persuaded to partake of the mixture.

Fall Calves.

The fall calf has as much potential profitableness as has the spring calf, says a writer in the American Agriculturist. But to make it actual, more and better care is required. The most critical part of the animal's life is the first six months. During this period, the spring calf has pasture and favorable weather, but the fall calf has neither and must therefore have better care. My fall calves are generally supposed to be two years old when they are only eighteen months. To make them profitable, they must have extra care, which gives them increased value. I give them full milk until they are a week old. Then I change gradually to skim milk. After two weeks of age as good a calf can be reared upon skim milk, as from whole milk, provided something is added to take the place of the cream. For this nothing is better than oil meal boiled to a thin jelly. Persons not accustomed to its use are more likely to use too much than too little of it.

Dairy Produce for England.

In speaking of dairy produce for England, the London News says: Twenty-one million pounds sterling were paid last year to Continental countries for dairy produce alone. The butter and margarine imported weighed over 3,000,000 hundredweight and the cheese nearly 2,000,000. The immense quantities will probably continue to be imported until inland freight charges become reduced. At present it is cheaper to send packages to London from Belgium than from many parts of Yorkshire.

The Hornless Cow.

I am of the opinion that in ten years from now, or perhaps less, a herd of cattle with horns will be as hard to find as a herd of mooshs has been in the past. The practice of dehorning is growing in favor, and I have yet to find a man who has dehorned a herd who is not pleased with the results.—Waldo F. Brown.

Live Stock and Dairy Notes.

ONE item with cattle is that they will consume much roughness to an advantage.

It is only where pasture is very cheap that it will pay to keep a cow solely for the calf.

A good cow, properly cared for,

should bring a good calf every year, without injury.

MAKE yourself "solid" with every living creature on the farm. Clubbing a bull or kicking a cow will have an opposite tendency.

SOMEBODY asked us not long since how to prevent a horse from pawing in the stall. We see it stated that tying a piece of carpet around the foot to prevent the noise will stop the habit in some cases.

THE POULTRY YARD.

About Breeding.

We read in poultry papers frequently the advice "to not breed in and in," says an experienced raiser of fowls. A certain amount of in and in breeding among our fowls is really necessary to establish certain prominent and desirable characteristics. To this end the breeder wants to turn his attention, giving it thought and testing his ideas by experiment. If you raise this season, any strong and promising specimens, with the characteristics that you wish to perpetuate, put them together for another season in breeding, even though they be brother and sister, and watch the results. But the best plan for in and in breeding is to take the strongest and most vigorous cockerels possessing the qualities you wish, to endure and cross him with the yearling hens favored largely with the same qualities. Or if you have a fine old male, cross him with his best daughters, and follow this plan out through all your live stock breeding. We know of a thoughtful old farmer who followed this course in breeding for eggs and says that after a few years had hens that were half as large again as his original stock and all splendid layers of large eggs. He killed off all the hens that laid small eggs and saved only those that laid large ones, and these qualities were inherited by their progeny.

Notes on Poultry.

RAISE as many chickens as possible, and as early as possible. They represent so much money.

TURNIPS are good green food for the fowls in winter, and a late sown crop will be large enough by fall to be stored for winter use.

BURNT corn is a most excellent thing to feed poultry and it is far superior to wood charcoal, which, however, has a wonderful effect in promoting the health of the fowls.

HOUSEHOLD AND KITCHEN.

A Question About Bread.

I have made bread thousands of times and make it a great many times every year, writes Emma P. Ewing, but I seldom mix a batch of dough without discovering something connected with the subject of bread-making of which I had no previous knowledge; consequently I am not prepared yet to answer with a complete certainty a question that is often put to me:

"Does dough rise better in the daytime than it does at night?"

Most plants, perhaps all, struggle for light and grow more vigorously when they obtain it. Is there any reason why the yeast plant should differ from other plants in this respect? I know of none. And, although only a few hours are necessary for the growth and development of the yeast plant, will it not be healthier and more vigorous and perform its functions better if its brief existence takes place under the most favorable conditions? And are not light and pure air more conducive to such conditions than darkness and impure air?

I believe dough rises better and makes a finer-flavored and more nutritious bread when mixed by daylight than it does when mixed at night. So believing, I shall continue to mix dough and make bread by daylight, although it is contrary to general usage, until it is scientifically demonstrated that my belief is incorrect.

Recipes for Those Who Cook.

SEED CAKES.—One cup of sugar, one-third cup of butter, one-half cup of milk, two cups of flour, one-fourth teaspoonful each of soda and salt and two teaspoonfuls of caraway seed. Rub the butter and flour together, then add the sugar, caraway seed and salt, stir until well mixed. Dissolve the soda in a teaspoonful of boiling water and stir into the milk. Mix all together, roll rather thin and bake in a quick oven. You can omit the caraway seed and use a half cupful of cocoanut.

VANITY CAKE.—Whites of six eggs, one and one-half cup of sugar, one-half cup of butter, one-half cup sweet milk, one-half cup of corn starch, one and one-half cups of flour, one teaspoonful of baking powder and one teaspoonful of essence of lemon.

THE AMERICAN BISON.

Successful Effort to Domesticate the Buffalo in Nebraska.

It is only a few years since vast herds of bison roamed over the plains between the Rocky Mountains and the Mississippi River, feeding on the grass and brushwood. The tread of their hoofs was heard for miles as the rolling of distant thunder, and the dust caused by their motion rose as a typhoon in the desert. But man's desire of gain and his insensate cruelty have changed all this. The noble and inoffensive animals have been almost exterminated, and of the millions that once roamed masters of the prairies, only a few, a very few, remain. First came the Indian who lived upon the bison and dressed in his shaggy skin. Then came the white man, anxious for pelt and pelt, and before the assaults of both the bison was killed by hundreds of thousands and his bones left to whiten the plains. Then came the civilized savage, known as the tourist, who shot down the noble animals for the sport their death afforded. Vast herds were stampeded, and they rushed away only to plunge down precipices to death.

It is pleasurable to turn from this disgusting spectacle to the efforts of Mr. Jones, of Nebraska, to domesticate the bison. Several years ago he began to breed the animals in cap-in captivity, and he has demonstrated that the domesticated animal is one-third larger than when wild. The result of crossing the animal with domestic cattle is satisfactory, and as the meat is the finest in the world and the hide of much importance, the commercial advantage resulting is great, and the prospect of preserving the bison is reassuring.

PATHOS IN A COURT ROOM.

The Touching Illustration of Children's Affection in a Parisian Trial.

A French paper says that Lucille Rome, a pretty girl with blue eyes and fair hair, poorly but neatly clad, was brought before the Sixth Court of Correction under the charge of vagrancy.

"Does anyone claim you?" asked the magistrate.

"Ah! my good sir," said she, "I have no longer friends; my father and mother are dead; I have only my brother James, but he is as young as I am. Oh, sir, what can he do for me?"

"The court must send you to the house of correction."

"Here I am, sister—here I am! do not fear!" cried a childish voice from the other end of the court, and at the same instant a little boy with a lovely countenance started forth from amid the crowd and stood before the judge.

"Who are you?" said he.

"James Rome, and brother of this little girl."

"Your age?"

"Thirteen."

"And what do you want?"

"I come to claim my sister, Lucille."

"But have you the means of providing for her?"

"Yesterday I had not, but now I have. Don't be afraid, Lucille."

"Oh, how good you are, James!"

"Well, let us see, my boy," said the magistrate: "the court is disposed to do all it can for your sister. But you must give us some explanation."

"About a fortnight ago," continued the boy, "my poor mother died of a bad cough, for it was very cold at home. We were in great trouble. Then I said to myself: I will be an artisan, and when I know a good trade I will support my sister. I went apprentice to a brushmaker. Every day I used to carry her half of my dinner, and at night I took her secretly to my room, and she slept in my bed while I slept on the floor. But it appears she had not enough to eat. One day she begged on the boulevard and was taken up."

"When I heard that, I said to myself, 'Come, my boy, things cannot last so; you must find something better.' I soon found a place, where I am lodged, fed and clothed, and have twenty francs a month. I have also found a good woman, who for these twenty francs will take care of Lucille and teach her needlework. I claim my sister."

"My boy," said the judge, "your conduct is very honorable. However, your sister cannot be set at liberty till to-morrow."

"Never mind, Lucille," said the boy; "I will come and fetch you early to-morrow." Then turning to the magistrate, he said, "I may kiss her, may I not, sir?"

He threw himself into the arms of his sister, and both wept tears of affection.—London Daily Telegraph.

CURTIS ON SCHOOL REFORM.

The Scholar's View on Civil Service in the Educational System.

George William Curtis, the Chancellor of the University of the State of New York, in a speech on "The Public School and Civil Service Reform," in Philadelphia the other evening, before the Department of Superintendence of the National Educational Association, showed the exhaustive study which he has made of the subject, and among other things said:

Is not every argument for the appointment of the great body of ministerial officers of the Government by fitness and character wisely ascertained indefinitely stronger when applied to the selection of school teachers? And if the selection of those officers by methods which secure their independence promote their self-respect and stimulate their interest and zeal instead of destroying greatly increases the efficiency of the public service, elevates the tone of public employment, and removes a reproach from the national name, is it to be apprehended that similar care would harm the character and efficiency of the public schools? Teacherships in the schools are not popularly regarded as subjects of patronage. But they are not so practically, and is it wise that they should remain so? To be properly effective, the examinations must be uniform, entirely competent, and wholly independent of the appointing power. The examiners must be sincerely interested in education, familiar with the duties of a teacher, and with the requirements of the art of teaching, and capable of conducting an examination to ascertain both the scholastic attainments and the specific professional fitness of the candidates.

By City Boards of Education and County Commissioners, or Trustees, or Committees, who are appointed by political officers or nominated by party conventions; these are the authorities who examine and certify or license and appoint more than 90 per cent. of the teachers. Is this a reasonable manner of securing public officers qualified for duties so delicate and important as those of teachers in public schools? Is it a method which would be likely to secure the most competent service of any kind? There is, indeed, an examination now, but the examination and certifying board is appointed by political officers or named by a party convention. Is a party caucus generally intent upon competence in the candidates whom it nominates? But as the old English Judge said to the horse-thief: "You are to be hung not because you have stolen a horse, but that horses may not be stolen," so the spoils system should be abolished, not because fitness is never considered by it but because fitness is not its object.

A Cat and Dog Story.

Here is a very charming cat and dog story, for the truth and accuracy of which the proud inhabitants of the Swiss village where it occurred recently are one and all ready to vouch. A troublesome cat in the village had been doomed to a watery death, and the children of the owner had been told off to take it in a sack to the river Aar and there to drown it. The house dog accompanied the party to the execution, which was carried out according to parental instructions. But, much to the surprise of the inmates, a short time after the cat and dog, both soaking wet, reappeared together at their owner's door. The dog on seeing that the sack containing the cat was thrown into the river, jumped after it, seized it with his teeth, dragged it to the bank, tore it with his teeth and restored his friend, the cat, to life and liberty. It goes without saying that the death warrant of the cat was destroyed after that marvelous escape.

Science and Violets.

"Violets while you wait" will be one of the inventions of the near future, and all our pretty, preconceived romances about the modest little flower will vanish like the Pocahontas myth and the William Tell legend, for an unpoetical man in Paris has succeeded by means of electricity in forcing violets, and sent a bunch of his first successes, four hours old, to ex-Empress Eugenie, who was always surrounded by the fragrant blooms in the days of her glory.

Secret of a Courtier's Success.

It was the old Duc de Lauzun who said: "If you want to succeed in court you must treat the Duchess like ladies' maids and the ladies like Duchesses."

and almost without an exception they are managed successfully by women. In the same city the woman's banking company has a capital stock of $250,000. In Indiana they have the Woman's Real Estate association and they are proving themselves fully capable of doing the business entrusted to their care. Women have been chosen as inspectors of meats. The reason given that they would be likely to be more successful in the work as their sense of smell is unimpaired by tobacco. We have women lawyers, doctors and preachers. And what would be done without the women as nurses? Then again, some of our best artists, sculptors and architects are women, and in some of the eastern banks they have women directors; and in one place a woman was chosen as president of the bank, and in many banks you will find our women as cashiers.

I suppose, possibly, the reason for that is that it would take a woman longer to get ready for a trip to Canada than it would a man. So we say there are but very few lines of business, if any, that woman does not lend a helping hand. Even in olden times it was woman's hand that fashioned the work that man's clumsy fingers could not compass. It was to woman the first message was given to proclaim to unbelieving people that the Saviour had risen. And all of these offices women have filled with credit to herself and sex. Talk about a "woman's sphere!"

"It has no limit—
For there's not a place in earth or heaven;
There's not a task to manhood given;
There's not a blessing, weal or woe;
There's not a whisper yes or no.
There's not a life, or death or birth
That has a feather's weight of worth,
Without a woman in it."

And knowing these facts as we all do, is it any wonder that women have risen in their just indignation and demanded their rights? A war on this question between the two sexes, though deplorable, is coming if man insists upon ignoring the just claims of wives and mothers much longer.

Today the women stand united on this issue as never before, and proclaim to the world that they will enforce their liberty and independence. They say to the world that suffrage is a duty that women should desire and demand. There is no republic so slow to the justice and wisdom of woman's suffrage as our own. Conservative England on one hand and youthful New Zealand on the other are more interested in the welfare of women than our own. There is no valid reason why woman should not exercise the right of franchise if they choose. While there are many reasons why they should be permitted to do so, the one thing above all others which menaces free institutions today is the absence of conscience in politics. The ballot in the hands of women means that they would bring in politics the very element above all others which is most imperatively demanded today.

The ballot in woman's hand means a protest against thousands and thousands of women and girls working for starvation wages while their employers are rising to wealth on their wrecked and ruined lives. It means a protest against foreigners by birth and in spirit, throttling the American public schools, as has been done in wealthy New York city, barring the rising generation of America from the free temple of learning.

The New York World tells us that 25,000 children are prevented from attending public schools on account of insufficient room, driving our own children out, filling the factories and workshops with our American infants and filling our school-houses that are built by taxes imposed upon men and women alike, with the uncouth foreigners that are unloaded by the ship load.

The ballot in woman's hands means that our beloved country will be freed from the hands of a ring of politicians. It means that the women of America will help free their husbands from the chains of slavery which they have fastened upon themselves. It means that the noble women of our land will rise as one and enter a protest against the terrible, though new evil that already threatens them, one that if permitted to fasten itself upon the land will work ruin to both sexes (I refer to the introduction of barmaids in the Saloons of N. Y.). No man is worthy the name of husband who will not do all in his power to place in woman's hand that great weapon, the ballot, that she may be able to help suppress these terrible wrongs, and no American woman who is not dead to all the God given motherly instincts within her, will quietly sit with folded hands and say they have all the rights they need and allow this thing to be permitted, but instead they will clasp hands on this one issue, no matter how much they may differ otherwise, and ascertain just how far they are permitted to look after the interests of their sons who are dearer to them than life itself, and for whom they would face even death. The depth and meaning of woman's political freedom can never be fully realized when she has the right of exercising the strong political power which she possesses. It means instead of neglect to the home, the protection that husbands and fathers have failed in giving and never, until woman has her political freedom, will these wrongs be righted. When woman becomes a power in politics then degradation, destitution and crime will be less.

When husbands cease to class their wives and daughters with lunatics, criminals and idiots, then the machine of justice will commence to work. When women have the liberty of using all the faculties with which nature has gifted her, with the same freedom that she has been permitted to use the faculty of suffering, then and not till then will we have reform to any great extent.

Woman is the last remaining disfranchised class to which this nation clings. It is because of this age long disfranchisement of woman's best power that man has yet never seen what is the soul beauty and fragrance of that unborn wonder—"Our coming, American womanhood."

FOR THE FARMER'S WIFE.

Some Things I Did Not Do.

EMMA GHENT CURTIS.

One of the things that lie heavily on my memory is a dinner—a dinner that I did not cook; and the thought of it never rises but what comes with it the wonder whether people ever regret the things they have done so bitterly as they regret the things they have omitted to do.

It was in the autumn of the year 1860, we had cast our lot with the youthful state of Kansas, having located about fifteen miles west of Fort Scott more than a year before. That part of the state was then thinly settled and most of the people were poor. Few of them had pastures enclosed, and it often happened that their stock turned out to graze upon the rich grass, took advantage of their freedom to wander away.

My father and my uncle who lived two miles away, had gone in the morning to Fort Scott for supplies; it was well they went, for the larders at both our houses were well nigh empty. My older sister had gone to keep my aunt company until uncle returned. I was helping mother a little with her washing and trying to keep my little brother and sister out of mischief.

When it was nearly noon my mother told me that I might get dinner. I was proud to be trusted to cook; what little girl of nine years does not glory in cooking a meal all by herself? But what should I cook? That was the question. "What shall I get for dinner, ma?" I asked. She laughed a little and answered that there was not much to get, but that I might look around and cook what ever there was.

Our late garden had proved a failure so I did not visit it. There was a basket of ripe wild grapes which Sister Anna and I had picked the day before; there was some sugar, some sour milk, soda, salt and flour, and a little lard. There was nothing else—nothing at all.

Well, I could have grape sauce and pancakes; that would do very well. It was a short bill of fare, but it was not starvation by any means. I prepared my dinner with care; the sauce was thick and rich and the pancakes were light and toothsome.

When my mother took her seat at the table she rested her head for a moment upon her hands. I knew that she was not strong, and that it was well nigh impossible to get household help. She was so tired that day, and I felt a secret thrill of joy because I had cooked the dinner. I made excellent resolutions for the afternoon and for the future generally. I crowded back memories of times when I had been neither dutiful nor helpful, and resolved that the future should find me a willing and capable housekeeper.

After a little time my mother became more cheerful; she was hungry and confessed that she enjoyed her dinner. We ate it all, the little children scraping the sauce dish for the last drop of thick, sweet juice.

"Cover the table and let it stand till we get the washing out," said my mother. I followed her into the yard to help spread the first finished white clothes upon the long, wild grass.

"Who is that?" she asked presently, looking to the eastward, down the pleasant hill crowned by our house.

A tall, raw-boned, sunburned man was toiling up the hill; from one of his hands swung a rope, from the other a halter. He reached the summit and came over to where we stood. There was no appearance of the tramp or the imposter about him; his bronzed face was open and honest. Having greeted us with awkward civility, he inquired if we had seen any stray horses about. We asked for their description and he said: "A couple o' good sized bay horses, with harness marks on 'em. One o' 'em had a star in his face and one white hind foot."

My mother told him that we had not seen them, and asked where he lived. "Bout twenty miles north o' here," he replied. Then he continued in a half discouraged voice: "The horses strayed off five days ago. I 'lowed mebbe they'd come back but they didn't. I started yistardy mornin'. Didn't have no horse left to ride and couldn't borry one, so I had to strike out afoot."

He stood still and looked wearily about, scanning every point of the horizon. I was looking intently at him and wondering if he had had any dinner, remembering at the same time that all I had cooked had vanished. But well I knew that there was more materials and that I could soon prepare as good a dinner as we had eaten. Even so poor a dinner might prove a blessing to this weary man toiling along under the pitiless sun.

The man stood for a little time, gazing about, then he began to shift his weight from one foot to the other, and make surmises as to whether his team had been stolen or had merely strayed away.

"Well, I guess I'll be movin'," he said finally, starting slowly down the north slope of the hill.

"I—I'm afraid he hasn't had any dinner, ma," I said.

She looked around at me; she was so kind and generous and hospitable, but just now she was so weak and tired. I could see her hands tremble, and there was still much work to be done. "I was just thinking about that," she said. "He probably has no money and so does not like to ask for anything to eat, but I am just too tired to cook for him." She looked at me rather keenly.

"I could cook him some dinner," I said, with a little hesitation. As is usual with children my zeal for industry had cooled after a little exercise of my abilities. I forgot that I would have years and years in which to rest; I only remembered that the day was hot and that frying pancakes over a fire was warm and rather trying task. I stood and looked after him. "Call him back and cook him some dinner if you want to," said my mother. "If he is hungry he will be so thankful." I began to think how much trouble it would be to pick over grapes for a respectable dish full, and stir up a bowl of fresh pancake batter.

"He'll be out of hearing pretty soon," said my mother.

I ran into the house to see if perhaps there was a little of the pancake batter left. There was none. The clothes had been boiled and the fire was going down. Would he put himself out to give me a dinner if I were hungry? Alternately trying to find excuses for myself and giving way to my pity for the wanderer, I went out of the house and looked after the retreating figure of the latter. He had passed out of hearing.

I looked at my mother. There was that in her face that made me turn cold all over. She said not a word, but I crept away where I could not see her. After half an hour I returned to my work, doing with feverish energy whatever I could find to do, in the hope of atoning for my cruelty to one now passed out of my reach and perhaps destined never to cross my path again.

When the wanderer left our house he went down the creek; four miles away were the cabins of two families. I have always hoped he found them kinder and more humane than he found me.

The second memory which has proved so heavy is one of later years. Because of a gradual failure of my health I left my home in Indiana, whither we had moved from Kansas for a residence in Colorado. After a rather tiresome ride across the barren plains, and a charming and exhilarating one up the mountain slope, I reached my destination, a beautiful little highland city. It was half past three in the morning when I alighted from the train, and still quite dark. But the mountain air was cool and delicious as I had never found August air before.

Several persons besides myself left the train, among them a little, weary looking, shabbily dressed woman and her two children, a boy of perhaps three years, and a sickly, fretful babe.

I did not take the hack for the hotel; my means were small, and it being near day I decided to wait for the light and then walk out in search of a boarding place suited to my means. I went in the little waiting room and found the woman and her two children there—the only occupants. We had travelled upon the same train but a short distance, having crossed the plains by different routes. But now that we were alone together we entered into conversation.

I learned that the little woman had travelled nearly as far as I had, and that she had come to meet her husband, who had sent for her to join him in the far West.

"Is he to come for you here?" I asked. "Here at the depot?"

"Yes."

"I do not expect him," she answered. "I couldn't let him know just when I would start, because I didn't know, myself. Baby was sick and I had to wait several days after I intended to start. So I wrote and told him that I'd come when I could, and send him word after I got here. He lives fifteen miles out of town, and it would be too bad to have him leave his work to come till he knew I was here. When daylight comes I'll get a hack and go to a hotel."

While we talked I wrote upon a postal card notice of my safe arrival to friends in the far away eastern home. As I finished writing she inquired if I had another card, saying that if she could get one she would write at once to her husband. She wrote a few lines upon the card I gave her; then I put both mis- sives in the box.

"He will be apt to get it to-day," she said, with a smile that made her thin face almost pretty. "He said in his letter that some of the boys round where

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

A CHOICE SELECTION OF INTERESTING ITEMS.

Comments and Criticisms Based Upon the Happenings of the Day.

WHEN a man begins by saying "I'm no kicker" just make up your mind to a prolonged and irascible zick.

THE homicidal cranks discharged as cured from the asylums need a good deal more pickling in common sense.

NEW YORK will hereafter permit newspaper reporters to witness the execution of the death sentence in the prisons of the State, and the reports of executions will not be so graphic nor so voluminous as hitherto.

By putting a well-displayed, well-constructed advertisement in the local papers, you can bring your goods to the notice of nearly every buyer in town. Then if you have something which the public need, good results will be forthcoming.

You must be sure of two things. You must love your work, and not be always looking over the edge of it, wanting your play to begin; and the other is, you must not be ashamed of your work, and think it would be more honorable to you to be doing something else.

THE carnival of King Cotton III. was appropriately celebrated in Augusta, Ga., and at the same time the planters of that State arranged to plant more tobacco and less cotton. What Southern farmers should do is to follow the course advised at the Memphis convention, and raise more grain. Cotton at present is a collapsed specimen of royalty.

A KENTUCKY jury has established a valuable precedent for lovers, which will also be a warning to them. Mr. Pritchell brought suit to recover from Miss Harrison the presents he bestowed upon her during a courtship which did not result in marriage. The jury returned to him two diamond rings, but on the one he most coveted he had in a moment of enthusiasm had engraved the young lady's initials, and the jury concluded that it was her property.

THE school-book trust is now supplemented by the school furniture trust. The success of the former organization in throttling competition in the school-book trade has led many States to embark in the business of publishing books for use in their schools. While this appears to be apart from the legitimate sphere of action for the State it still possesses that plausible justification implied in the old saying concerning the propriety of fighting the devil with fire.

WHETHER the ground was well taken in the particular case of the Chicago manufacturer who was arrested for criminal negligence resulting in the death of five of his workmen, who were killed by a boiler explosion, it is of course not possible to say until the evidence is taken; but it may be said that the principle involved is a good one. There is no likelihood that the enforcing of the responsibility of employers for the safety of their workmen will be pushed too far, and, as it is at present, there is need of a good many cases of this sort to bring home to manufacturers the fact that it is not to be tolerated that they shall needlessly and carelessly expose their employes to danger.

THE course of justice in the silvery State of Colorado is quite as erratic as in other commonwealths. A few weeks ago Dr. Graves was convicted of murder in the first degree on a very faulty chain of purely circumstantial evidence. The verdict was a shock to the community, and public sentiment, which had been strongly against him, veered around to his side. Now the Supreme Court of the State has granted him a supersedeas, which was proper enough, but it appears that owing to the crowded state of the docket it will be two or three years before his case can be taken up again. There doesn't seem to be any golden mean in Colorado procedure between extreme haste and extreme delay.

IN Yellow Medicine and several other counties in Minnesota there is trouble between the county boards and the local newspapers over the official publications. In the county named the three papers made common cause and insisted on the same rate for the work, which was lower than individuals are charged. But the narrow-minded officials were indignant that the publishers would not cut each other's throats, and sent the work out of the county so far as possible. The fact is that county boards have too often the absurd idea that the local publishers are in danger of becoming plutocrats and should be kept lean and lank, whatever the liberality of other expenditures. The weekly papers in a county do well to combine and insist on fair treatment and decent prices at the hands of the officials. They make a mistake when they sacrifice their business interests in a foolish rivalry.

AN illusion that required only the test of honor to dispel it is dispelled. Our flag will be saluted now wherever it appears as the emblem of a nation addicted to arts and refinement, to peace and plodding, but sensitive as Great Britain or Germany to stain on its scutcheon; hereafter to enjoy in the person and property of its people wherever they may be, its agents or its citizens in private pursuit, immunities known only to powers first-class in physical strength. First in moral character among the nations of the earth the republic of the United States professes to be. Unjust war her people will never wage, no matter what the pretext, how plausible the plea for precipitating it. Chili remained insolent and undaunted until the President submitted to the conscience of its people an issue they were bound to meet solely on its merits. Had war been the last resort they would have fought it. They will not hereafter be called on to fight.

It was long ago remarked that after having passed through the different metallic ages in succession mankind was about entering on the age of paper. According to certain statistics presented to the National Board of Trade "we are there ready." The production of paper for the last year (in the United States?) was estimated to have been about 1,500,000 tons, having a commercial value of $175,000,000, while the pig-iron produced in 1890 amounted to 9,600,000 tons, having a value of $170,000,000. In the last forty years the increase in the production of pig-iron has been 1,600 per cent. in quantity and 1,250 per cent. in value, while the paper production has increased 2,000 per cent. in quantity and 800 per cent. in value. According to these statistics the average value of all kinds of paper produced last year in this country was five and five-sixths cents per pound.

NO NEED to fear that the American people shall hereafter engage in war. Fatuity of Chili has been for us a national blessing. It has demonstrated that we have energy and resources adequate to preparing forthwith for fight when necessary for national self-respect. It has reunited all sections. The first distinct note of duty summoned to the President of the United States the maimed and crippled South, eager to prove its right to unquestionable place in the republic South and North had built. It drew from every part of the country, from every division of its industry, from its wealth, from its labor, overwhelming proof of the solidarity of American sentiment, the bravery or American manhood. It has given us in three months a fleet ready for battle that but for this incident we should not have equipped in three years. No power, great or small, will venture in the future to insult our flag, assail our uniform or deery our citizenship.

JAPAN has appropriated half a million dollars for an exhibit at our World's Fair of '93; but the Empire State of the Union is still holding back over $300,000, a sum which is obviously inadequate. There is no doubt that the prestige of States and Nations is largely rated, in these days, by the figure which they cut at Universal International Exhibitions. These great affairs are not picnics, nor jollifications, but serious industrial and pacific contests, and all participants are supposed to do their best. If New York makes a poor exhibit at Chicago, New York alone will be the loser. It is for this reason, says the New York Journal, rather than for any sentimental regard for the city which got up a competition for the Fair when none was intended, and smuggled it away from the metropolis, that we would like to see New York making preparations for an exhibit worthy of her grand industries and her commanding position in commerce.

MUST SAVE THE COUNTRY.

From the Western Watchman.

The old game of fusing the democratic and republican parties against the reformers will be attempted on a more gigantic scale than ever this fall. It is wonderful how that racket works. Republicans hold their men back from joining the reform move by claiming that their services and votes are necessary to save the country from the rascally democrats. The democrats hold their men by representing that by supporting the democratic party is the only show of saving the country from the thieving republicans. But when the independent move gets so strong that it gives good promise of being the first instead of the third party, then it is that the democrat and republican run together as naturally as a duck takes to water, in order to save the country! In the meantime the people who compose the alliance, the people's party, are already on the war path to save their homes! When the homes of American producers are safe, "the country" will be doubly safe.

SIMPSON'S CHALLENGE.

From the Winfield, Kan., Free Press.

When Jerry Simpson, on the floor of congress challenged both democratic and republican congressmen to point out a single law that had been enacted for the wealth-producers in the past twenty years, there was not one who had sand enough in his old political gizzard to accept the challenge. Yet Jerry is dubbed by the old party papers of Kansas an "illiterate chump." There must have been two or three hundred "chumps" in congress about the time that challenge was made.

ADDRESS AND PLATFORM.

Of the National Industrial Conference Assembled at St. Louis February 22, 1892.

THE ADDRESS.

This, the first great labor conference of the United States, and of the world, representing all divisions of urban and rural organized industry assembled in national congress, invoking upon its action the blessing and protection of Almighty God, puts forth, to and for the producers of the nation this declaration of union and independence.

The conditions which surround us best justify our co-operation.

We meet in the midst of a nation brought to the verge of moral, political and material ruin. Corruption dominates the ballot-box, the legislatures, the congress, and touches even the ermine of the bench. The people are demoralized. Many of the states have been compelled to isolate the voters at the polling places in order to prevent universal intimidation or bribery. The newspapers are subsidized or muzzled, public opinion is silenced, business prostrated, our homes covered with mortgages, labor impoverished, and the land concentrating in the hands of capitalists. The urban workmen are denied the right of organization for self-protection; importuned, pauperized, standard army, unrecognized by our laws, is established to shoot them down, and they are rapidly degenerating to European conditions. The fruits of the toil of millions are boldly stolen to build up colossal fortunes, unprecedented in the history of the world, while their possessors despise the republic and endanger liberty. From the same prolific womb of governmental injustice we breed the two great classes—paupers and millionaires. The national power to create money is appropriated to enrich bondholders; silver, which has been accepted as coin since the dawn of history, has been demonetized to add to the purchasing power of gold by decreasing the value of all forms of property as well as human labor; and the supply of currency is purposely abridged to fatten usurers, and bankrupt enterprise and enslave industry. A vast conspiracy against mankind has been organized on two continents and is taking possession of the world. If not met and overthrown at once, it forbodes terrible social convulsions, the destruction or the establishment of an absolute despotism.

In this crisis of human affairs the intelligent working people and producers of the United States have come together, in the name of peace, order and society, to defend liberty, prosperity and justice.

We declare our union and independence. We assert our purpose to vote with that political organization which represents our principles.

We charge that the controlling influences dominating the old political parties have allowed the existing dreadful conditions to develop without serious effort to restrain or prevent them. Neither do they now intend to accomplish reform. They have agreed together to ignore, in the coming campaign, every issue but one. They propose to drown the outcries of a plundered people with the uproar of a sham battle over the tariff, so that corporations, national banks, rings, trusts, "watered stocks," the demonetization of silver, and the oppressions of usurers may all be lost sight of. They propose to sacrifice our homes and children upon the altar of Mammon; to destroy the hopes of the multitude in order to secure corruption funds for the great lords of plunder. We assert that a political organization representing the political principles herein stated is necessary to redress the grievances of which we complain.

Assembled on the anniversary of the birth of the illustrious man who led the first great revolt on this continent against oppression, filled with the sentiments which actuated that grand generation, we seek to restore the government of the republic to the hands of the "plain people" with whom it originated. Our door stands open to all points of the compass. We ask all honest men to join with and help us.

In order to restrain the extortions of aggregated capital, to drive the money changers out of the temple, "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity," we do ordain and establish the following platform of principles:

First—We declare the union of labor forces of the United States this day accomplished, permanent and perpetual. May its spirit enter into all hearts for the salvation of the republic and the uplifting of mankind.

Second—Wealth belongs to him who creates it. Every dollar taken from industry without an equivalent is robbery. "If any will not work, neither shall he eat." The interests of rural and urban labor are the same; their enemies are identical.

Third—We recommend a national currency, safe, sound and flexible, issued by the general government only, a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, and that without the use of banking corporations, a just, equitable and efficient means of circulation, direct to the people, at a tax not to exceed 2 per cent., as set forth in the sub-treasury plan of the farmers' alliance, or some better system. Also by payments in discharge of its obligations for public improvements.

Fourth—We demand that postal savings banks be established by the government for the safe deposit of the earnings of the people and to facilitate exchange.

Fifth—We demand that the amount of the circulating medium be speedily increased to not less than $50 per capita.

Sixth—We demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

Seventh—We believe that the money of the country should be kept as much as possible in the hands of the people, and hence we demand that all national and state revenues shall be limited to the necessary expenses of the government, economically and honestly administered.

Eighth—We demand a graduated income tax.

Ninth—The land, including all the natural resources of wealth, is the heritage of all the people and should not be monopolized for speculative purposes, and alien ownership of land should be prohibited. All lands now held by railroads and other corporations in excess of their actual needs and all lands now owned by aliens should be reclaimed by the government and held for actual settlers only.

Tenth—Transportation being the means of exchange and a public necessity, the government should own and operate the railroads in the interest of the people.

Eleventh—The telegraph and telephone, like the postoffice system, being a necessity for the transmission of news, should be owned and operated by the government in the interest of the people.

ADDITIONAL RESOLUTIONS.

We demand that the question of woman suffrage be submitted to the state and territorial legislatures for favorable action.

We demand that the government issue legal tender notes and pay the union soldier the difference between the price of the depreciated money in which he was paid, and gold.

WHEREAS, The present practice of dealing or gambling in so-called "options and futures," on the various farm products and necessities of life is of national importance, and involves not only a moral principle but an economic question, being disastrous and pernicious to producers and consumers alike, in comparison to which lottery gambling sinks into insignificance; and

WHEREAS, Our respectful memorials to congress have so far been entirely disregarded, now therefore, be it

Resolved, That we most solemnly protest against this infamous evil, and demand the passage of such laws as will eradicate all gambling or dealing in options and futures.

Resolved, That we hail this conference as the consummation of a perfect union of hearts and hands of all sections of our common country. The men who wore the gray and the men who wore the blue meet here to extinguish the last smouldering embers of civil war in the tears of joy of a united and happy people, and we agree to carry the stars and stripes forward forever to the highest point of national greatness.

IT WILL NOT DO.

From the Southern Alliance Farmer.

The present congress cannot come back to their people and tell them that "we could do nothing." This old song will not satisfy the people any more. It is the same excuse that has been given for twenty-five years, and it will not pan out any more. The people all know that the senate is republican and that Harrison with his veto power is in the chair, but this is no excuse for the house, with a hundred and fifty-seven majority, to neglect its duty. Put the responsibility where it belongs, and then the people can credit those who deserve it. It is no time for our members in congress to listen to the Wall street howlers who are saying, "do not agitate; win the victory first." These are the men who are looking out for the good of the party and not the interest of the people. The people are getting tired of all the attention being paid to the interest of the party, while the people suffer. We do not elect men to look out for party interest or campaign funds. They are elected to legislate in the interest of the people; and when the party interest occupies all their time they should be asked to come home.

This is one of the times that all such characters will be left at home. The people will see to it that party bucksters are not honored any more at the expense of the people.

"Public office is a public trust" and those who accept them must realize the truth of this expression and carry it out in the future.

SILVER AND A VETO.

From the Mt. Vernon, Ill., Farmer.

The single gold standard advocates, while they are compelled to admit that a free coinage bill will likely pass both the house and senate, are felicitating themselves on what they claim to be an assurance that President Harrison will veto the bill. He may do so. But he and the gold bugs should remember that in the last congress free silver was twice defeated in the house after having passed the senate. They should then bear in mind that the very first opportunity the people got, they reversed the majority of the house and gave it an overwhelming majority the other way, so that there could be no question of the defeat of silver there again. What the people did a little more than a year ago they can do in less than a year hence. The mass of

United States voters are determined to have silver as well as gold coinage, and is Mr. Harrison is willing to interpose his veto against the popular will so plainly expressed he must take the responsibility, remembering that the same votes that made such an overwhelming change in the house of representatives, are able to make a change in the white house.

The president is the servant of the people, and he has no right to interpose his veto against their will so plainly expressed as it was at the congressional election of a little more than a year ago.

LET THEM BE TRIED.

From the Beebe, Ark., Index.

The cry of overproduction is now being raised to explain the stringency in the money market, and the low prices in farm products. A philosopher has said, "there can be no overproduction of necessities so long as any human being is in need of food or clothing." It is a fact apparent to the most superficial observer that, at the present time, there are many men in our midst who are in almost actual need of both food and clothing, and who would enter the markets as buyers if they could sell their labor or products for money. Our protective tariffs have been instrumental in producing the present condition, by driving commerce from our shores, and fostering trusts and combines in the interests of monopolies and money power. Relief lies in the power of congress, by removing the tariff from all necessities and coining money in sufficient quantity to transact the business of the country, prosperity would take the place of depression. The money should be distributed to the people at a low rate of interest when the security is ample. The sub-treasury and land loan schemes are offered as a means to that end. Let them be tried.

STILL THE GOLD GOES.

From Modern Light.

Where is that flood of gold that was coming back from Europe? Is it possible that the subsidized press has been mistaken in its persistent declarations that it would surely return? It would seem that they were certainly mistaken when we realize that Europe's demand for the products of our farms has practically been supplied, and still we continue to send them large shipments of gold. Half a million dollars in gold coin was started on a voyage to England Saturday, February 20. Is it possible that the millions of bushels of wheat and corn and millions upon millions of pounds of pork, beef and cotton that we have shipped them this year has failed to pay the dividends and interest on the $11,000,000 we owe them? It looks that way. They have drawn on the products of our farms the amount of many millions of dollars worth. They still hold the $60,000,000 of gold we shipped them last summer, and are still demanding more gold. Oh Americans, when will you free yourselves from this English money power? When will you free yourselves once more and forever from this monstrous taxation without representation?

CHASE IS HAPPY.

From the Topeka Alliance Tribune.

Chairman Chase is one of the happiest men in the state. His plan of organizing the state by precincts is working to a charm and his mail indicates a general enthusiasm throughout the state that is very gratifying. Lecturer Scott is out in the western counties holding one county meeting every day and growing up with the country. Mr. Chase laid out a double set of appointments for President Biddle, thinking to take advantage of the grand size of our chief by dividing him up. Mr. Biddle objected, however, on the general principle of co-operation and National Lecturer Willits has filled one set of appointments in southeastern Kansas. Mr. Willits reports a general awakening among the people and an active determination to hold the state out of the hands of the plutocrats.

The enemies of the farmers' protective movement are very fond of prophesying that it is dead, but we notice that congress is making the pretence of trying to do something, whereas for several years they have not made any pretenses. After a while we will get a congress that will do something, if the people are only true to themselves.

SENATOR PEPPER of Kansas, has done more good work on behalf of the people in ten days in the United States senate than Ingalls did in any one year of his long senatorial career.—Farmer's Friend.

HOW THEY CARRIED OUT THEIR PROMISES.

From the Almond, N. Y., New Era.

They refunded the debt, that is, doubled it. They changed the bonds from circulating money and made them higher denomination. They sold the people's money in a day of peace for half price. They called in all option bonds and made them run a longer time. They paid premium enough on bonds to have built a railroad from New York to San Francisco. They discounted the trade dollar in the hands of the people and made it of full value to bankers. They raised their own salaries and withdrew the people's money so that prices and wages were decreased more than one-half. They loaned to themselves for nothing and legislated the people into the hands of Shylock to pay at the rate of 10 per cent interest. Thus they legislated twenty billion dollars of debt. They called the farmer intelligent, and as soon as he began to comprehend, called him an anarchist. They demonetized silver. Through boughten control of the finance they gambled in the stocks of the entire nation. They refused the people money in order to subject and control the nation. They bought over half the newspapers of the United States and sold American blood, bone and sinew to England in order to gather in the wreck. They declared a boycott against a newspaper that dared to publish the truth. They have sent against justice their hirelings of the grog shop and of the money power, and in less than thirty years made millions of paupers and degraded the church.

THE CALAMITY HOWLERS AND CRANKS.

From the La Veta, Col., Times.

Trying to laugh down what cannot be denied or controverted is an old trick of corrupt majorities. As a writer in the Chicago Express well says: "It is no answer to a man's argument to sneer and say 'he is a crank—a calamity howler.'" This is an enlightened age for this sort of thing. It has been tried too many times in the world's history with scant success.

Noah was a calamity howler, but the flood came.

Daniel, standing before Belshazzar, was a calamity howler; so, too, were Jonah and Lot, but Babylon, Nineveh, and the cities of the plains all perished. Christ would now be called a calamity howler for weeping over the fate of the Holy City, and a crank for driving the money changers from the house of the Lord.

Columbus, the crank, discovered a new world. Luther, the calamity howler, shook Rome to its center. The Pilgrim fathers were cranks, and the signers of the Declaration of Independence were calamity howlers, every one of them. To the list must be added the fiery Henry, the skeptic Paine, the philosophic Franklin and the noble Washington.

What were Garrison, Phillips, and other abolitionists but calamity howlers of the deepest dye? And the republican party's first presidential candidate was cranky; so was Greeley, whom the democrats once supported. Lincoln, to let his opponent tell the story, was an ungainly, awkward and unconventional crank. Sherman, who marched to the sea, was a "crazy" crank, and fighting "Stonewall" Jackson was a religious crank.

So you see it is too late in the day to call a man hard names because he has honest convictions and will think as he pleases: it is a method which, when pursued toward the man who is determined to vote as he chooses, simply won't work worth a cent.

NO WONDER, INDEED.

From the Westington, S. D., Sieve.

Taking seventy cents for wheat worth a dollar, and paying 12 per cent interest on their debts is the very tempting situation of the Dakota farmers. It is no wonder that mortgaged indebtedness increases and foreclosures by the thousands continue in this land of ours. But Shylock is greedy and his capacity is unlimited, and he will continue to rob industry just as long as our laws give him all the advantage in the world over the men who produce wealth but receive very few of its benefits.

THE ALLIANCE AND POLITICS.

From the Raleigh, N. C., Progressive Farmer.

It is always a difficult matter to keep any organization quiet during a campaign. No matter what its nature, some of the members feel that because they happen to think a certain way or favor a certain party that all the members should think and act just as he does. Politics even are carried into churches, and members of a church think all the male members should vote for a certain party or candidate. All this is more or less unfortunate.

The alliance has had some trouble every two years on this account. Everybody cannot think alike. We should not expect it. As the approaching campaign warms up, a good deal of caution will be necessary.

The number of people who think the alliance should become a political party is small. But there are quite a number who think it should vote solidly with the people's party. Still another large crowd thinks every alliance man should vote the democratic ticket. Not a few think the same in regard to the republican ticket. This feeling is not confined to alliance membership. Party papers, speakers and organizers cling to the idea that alliance members should all vote with their party. There are members of the alliance who will vote nothing but the democratic ticket. Others will only vote the republican ticket. Others want to go to a new party.

We will not attempt to indicate how any man shall vote. But taking the constitution as a guide, will try to define its meaning. Alliance membership does not interfere with your political or religious views. That is plain to all. The constitution says that partisan politics must not be discussed in alliance meetings. That should be sufficient to keep out all partisanship, and every president should see to it that partisan stuff is not brought in a meeting. No president who does his duty will permit it.

As an educational organization our speakers and organs have urged our membership to stand by our principles and vote only for men and parties that agree to carry out the same. This is the only way they can do and there can be no reasonable objection to such a course. If all could think alike, naturally all would vote for one party. But this cannot be expected. Hence there should be no quarrel among members.

The only safe course to pursue is to educate the people, keep them informed and then they are likely to vote intelligently. Above all things keep partisanship out of the order. Presidents can do this if they will. They must if they mean to do right. The enemies of our order would be glad to see it disrupted by partisanship. Above all things they would like to see the alliance emerge into a party. They could then have a picnic. It would lose all that has been gained and would have no further influence as an educational organization. Be cool, be conservative. Keep your eyes open and be ready to act the best way at the proper time. Don't let partisanship drown out everything else. Let the organization be first, parties second. Don't let party or neighborhood differences estrange you. We will continue to do all we can to keep things right on this line and suggest that all other papers do the same.

IT IS UNDER CONSUMPTION.

From the Southern Alliance Farmer.

Hon. Benjamin Butterworth, in a speech in congress May 16, 1888, gave the following as the income of farmers in the different states named, embracing a wide area of the country:

	Per year.	Per day.
Ohio.....	$284.00	$1.08
Georgia.....	155.00	.42
Mississippi.....	279.00	.74
Illinois.....	476.00	1.30
Alabama.....	149.00	.41
Wisconsin.....	375.00	1.02

From similar compilations it appears that the average income of farmers for the entire United States is less than a dollar a day. Mr. Butterworth also gave the average income of mechanics and laborers in some of the principal cities, as follows:

	Per year.	Per day.
Cincinnati.....	$258.00	$.89
Lowell.....	234.00	.80
Chicago.....	436.00	1.20
St. Louis.....	424.00
Philadelphia.....	340.75	.95
Lawrence.....	321.75	.90
Richmond.....	244.00	.69
Augusta.....	267.00	.73
Louisville.....	334.90	.90

This is the source of consumption for the farmers' products, and the farmer is almost as much interested in the income of the city wage worker as he is in his own; for, unless the wage worker has an income he cannot buy the farmer produce, and it must stagnate upon the market, whether crops be good or bad, except the scantiest and cheapest portion that will sustain life. The above figures preach their own sermon and settle the question of over-production. It is under-consumption—the consumers are unable to buy. The above are quoted as government statistics, and no amount of talking should be permitted to overcome them.

ONLY THROUGH LEGISLATION.

From the Pendleton, Ore., Herald.

From the first the farmer has been told "not to undertake to regulate his troubles himself; trust us lawyers and bankers and educated gentlemen; we will make just the laws you need." We did trust them and never got two per cent on the investment in return. There never was a more patient, trusting people in the world than the farmers and laborers of America have been. They have had all power at their control, but have backed down and submitted until politics has become a science in the hands of a few, and common men have almost felt it a greatest privilege to walk up in line and vote a straight party ticket just as directed. They have been told that this would bring relief, but relief would not come. The plain man knows that he is not getting along as well as he ought to. He sees that the speculator, the banker and the manufacturer and railroad men have the benefit of law to help them along, but when he asks for law it is "unconstitutional" and he is called a "wild-eyed anarchist," a "calamity howler." He is the most patient man in the world, and if he could only get relief he would stay inside party lines till doomsday. But he is tired of broken promises from both republicans and democrats alike; and now he wants several things, and wants them bad. His very long suffering will make him terrible when he does reach out after what he wants. And the plaintive wail goes on, "Don't go, farmer, don't go; we will give you what you want!" A page of history is worth a volume of prophecy. An ounce of fact is better than a pound of promises. The situation is easily stated so far as the Farmers' Alliance is concerned; it has clear and emphatic demands which can be accomplished only through legislation.

HIDES FROM THE ASSESSOR.

From the Rush Hill, Mo., Banner.

The farmer pays the taxes. If he lies his neighbors will tell the assessor, and he is caught up with, but his brother in the city is sent a blank to fill out, and he writes as much or as little as he pleases and swears to it and returns it. If he has a palace home with costly furniture and elegantly furnished from cellar to garret, worth $25,000, he gives it in at about from $3,000 to $5,000. If he has cash and bonds to the amount of $10,000, he will not return a cent. Should he have a large sum of money deposited in the banks he draws it out, takes a certificate check and has the cashier hide it away in his vaults till the assessment is taken. Hence the burden of taxation falls upon the farmer who can't well evade the law, if he is so disposed, or upon the poorer classes in the city who have houses and lots that can't be covered up.

THOSE HUNGRY FELLOWS.

From the Christian Advocate.

It is said that a notorious millionaire, when asked why he did not build a palatial mansion said: "I don't want a house that will be so easily found when the hungry fellows break loose." This is the most fearful sentence we have heard uttered since the outbreak of the civil war. As certain as the earth continues, and things go on as they have for twenty years, the "hungry fellows will break loose." Nothing hastens it like men of vast wealth who buy up legislators, disregard private rights, live in luxury and say, "What are you going to do about it?" "The public be—" and about the hungry fellows "breaking loose." He who looks ahead and sees no breakers, is either blind or has some glass that those who judge the future by the past cannot get access to.

WILL MEET AT TOPEKA.

Atchinson.—Robert Thompkins, who publishes a labor paper in Atchinson, says joint committees from the State Federation of Labor and the Railroad Trainmen's Federation will meet in session at Topeka at the time of the meeting of the state convention, and present their claims for legislation. Among the things they want is additional legislation for the enforcement of the eight hour law, the child labor law, and the railroad men want the railroads to adopt a self-coupler for freight cars.

THE EVOLUTION OF A NAME.

Changes That Take Place from Callow Youth to Ripe Old Age.

Do you know that your name changes from year to year? If you imagine that the name given you by a proud father and a happy mother at the baptismal font is a fixed and changeless appendix you are sadly mistaken. Here, for instance, are a few familiar metamorphoses of a very plebeian name—William Jones.

Who would think of calling this youngster any other name than "Willie?" There is only one exception: When the young hopeful transgresses some rule of strict propriety and his mother finds it necessary to correct him, she no longer calls him "Willie," but strikes terror into his soul by saying in sepulchral tones: "Will-yum!"

And this young fellow of 20—everybody knows him. He is "Billy"—plain, informal, convivial "Billy." He has learned to part his hair in the middle with great care, is particular about the shade of his necktie, doesn't care if cigarettes are deadly, and wonders whether his mustache will be brown or red. If any man desires to be assassinated on the spot let him call this young man "Willie."

What a change ten years has brought! "Billy" has shed his red neckties, his cigarettes, and his name, as a snake sheds its skin. He now emerges as "Will." He can give you the latest story about anyone in his set; he delights in the german; he has taken a few flyers in wheat and doesn't care who knows it; everybody refers to him as a very promising young chap.

Ten years more brings another change. This time it is one of the most important in his career. He is married now, and his wife teaches her little ones to call him "papa," while she herself calls him "William." Now, for the first time he comes into rightful possession of the name "WILLIAM."

He took at his baptism, but which hitherto has been abbreviated and mangled and distorted by his friends.

And this is "Bill." Who doesn't know "Bill?" He is the jolliest old chap in town; his shining pate is crammed full of sixty years of experience, and the wisdom it has brought with it. His is the age of advice and counsel. He always is ready and willing to tell the young folks just what to do, because he knows how he managed those things himself years ago. Seventy years produces "Old Bill Jones," a term of respect only when used by thoughtless and inconsiderate youngsters; a term of endearment when used by the multitude of those he has befriended. The story of a life is comprehended in the changes which make "Willie" become "Billy," and "Billy" "Will," then "William" "Bill" and "Old Bill Jones."—Los Angeles Mail.

Photographing Inside the Body. Phrenologists have long claimed to be able to ascertain the character of an individual by observing the conformation of his brain, but new photography in conjunction with the electric light, has rendered it possible for a man to know by ocular demonstration the state of his own inside. Inclosed in a cylindrical case, provided with two hemispherical shutters, and contained in an india-rubber tube, is a small cylindrical camera. In front of the lens are two tiny incandescent lamps, the wires to which, as well as a short pipe from the camera, are carried in an outside casing tube. Simple pressure on a pneumatic ball drives the camera forward in the incasing cylinder, and at the same instant makes the contact for the electric lamps and opens the shutters. By removing the pressure on the ball the camera returns to its place, the lamps go out, and the shutters close.—Philadelphia Times.

Why the Third Finger Was Chosen.

How many women who fondly love the golden symbol of their wedding vow know why they wear it on the third finger of the left hand. That particular digit was chosen because it was believed by the Egyptians to be directly connected by a slender nerve to the heart itself. And these ancient worshippers of Isis held this finger sacred to Apollo and the sun, and therefore gold was the metal chosen for the ring.

RUGGED GRANDEUR.

Glorious Views in the Sierras, the Alps of America.

The long ridges of the Sierras, stretching through California south-east from Mount Shasta to the Table Mountains, have been called the American Alps on account of their grandeur and beauty. The whole range is sharply indented, forming numerous passes, all lofty, the average height being not less than 11,000 feet. The scenery of all these passes is of the wildest and grandest description. Lofly peaks, laden with snow, rising abruptly, are seen, and again chains of glacier lakes, streams dashing down from beetling bluffs, made the picture. Glorious views suddenly open over masses of rock like a sea frozen magically into stone or gray and ashy plains.

The glaciers, which move irresistibly down the mountain, are the makers of the passes. Grinding their course on, they wear away a path which man uses for his own needs. All who have occasion to cross the mountains, even the animals, have to use these passes, since on account of the height any other way would be impracticable. Bears and wild sheep in their journeys employ the same passes as do men. Here and there, in the midst of the passes, vegetation flourishes luxuriantly, with the wild rose, aster and poppy. Delicate ferns bloom about the rocks and, with groups of most fragrant flowers, combine somewhat to relieve the too great severity of the mountains.

MRS. LIVINGSTONE'S GRAVE.

Body of the Explorer's Wife Buried in an African Wilderness.

English people want the body of Mrs. Livingstone, wife of the explorer, brought back to their country. For more than thirty years it has lain in a lonely grave in the African wilderness. The body of the Doctor rests among the greatest of the great in old Westminster Abbey.

MRS. LIVINGSTONE'S GRAVE.

The two should be together, and it is very probable that the ashes of "Poor Mary" will be brought from the African jungles and placed beside those of her husband.

The Champion Grape-Vine.

Portugal is said to have the honor of possessing the largest grape-vine in the world. It is growing at Oys in that kingdom, and must be a prolific old patriarch if it be true as represented that it has been bearing since 1802, a period of nearly ninety years. Its largest yield was in 1884, when 165 gallons of wine was made from its product.

Religious Work.

The British Foreign Bible Society has distributed 124,000,000 copies of religious writings in eighty-seven years.

Cheap Money.

The Burmese, Karens, Hangers, and Ghans use lead and silver in bullion for currency.

The word "preface," used in the beginning of books, was originally a word of welcome to a meal, and was equivalent to "Much good may it do you."

FORMERLY CITY & FARM RECORD.

TOPEKA, KANSAS, APRIL, 1892.

NINTH YEAR. VOL. X. NO. 10.

For the FARMER'S WIFE.

Unite For Industrial Emancipation.

[Supposed reply of the colored brother entitled "Look Back,"]

BY MRS. L. T. KELLY.

Yes, I stood boldly up at St. Louis
While the whole labor world bent to hear;
I admitted the justice of woman
To a right to the ballot was clear,
But I could not feel that her voting
Any grave wrong of labor would right,
And I knew 'gainst the wrongs that oppress us
The whole labor world should unite.

Yes, I stood boldly up at St. Louis
And I wished every woman could hear
Who think with the right to the ballot
Their day of redemption is near,
For I stood there a living example
Of wrongs years of votes failed to right,
And long years to come yet will fail to,
Unless all the toilers unite.

I knew that we owe much to woman,
That we are what men have called free,
Yet once we had a mistress
As cruel and proud as could be;
She was willing to live by our labor,
To take wealth that we owned by right,
And to-day many women rob labor,
And they will till all toilers unite.

For years I have honored the party
Which hounded their platform for me,
I found that I never knew slavery
Until I was taught I was free;
I would rather again be a chattel,
With hard work and a home mine by right,
Than to take my chance as a freeman,
Unless all the toilers unite.

Don't frown so and say I am shocking,
But answer me this I implore,
Why, if our lot now is better,
Tire die when but two died before?
Some few whom kind fortune has favored,
Have advanced, but the darkness of night
Broods o'er the robbed mass and degrades us,
And it must until all toilers unite.

The day that we went to St. Louis,
Our wives and our daughters so true,
Said "Mind now all hope of the freedom
Of labor abides now with you,
Not all of our wrongs can be righted
At once, but you can make them light
If you seek out wrongs which rob all labor,
And against those wrongs strongly unite."

So we picked out the wrongs universal,
And which equal justice demands—
To right them would help every toiler
In this and in all foreign lands;
It would aid every person who labors
To keep the wealth which is theirs by right,
Regardless of sex, creed or color
All labor's true friends will unite.

SNOW STORM.

Snow Flakes—Snow Fantasy—A Crystal Thought—Wreath From Snow Clouds.

BY FANNY FENTRILL, FOR HER GENTLE FRIEND,

For the FARMER'S WIFE.

March 16, 1892.

"An angel is flying over the house!
Here, in this goblet, fragrant as the honey of Hymettus, fragrant as the wild flowers in the angel's meadow, I drink to the divinity of thy dreams."

—From Hyperion.

I like such a storm as this! It is enrapturing! It is inspiring! It is soul-refreshing! This silent, swiftly-falling snow! These gales so cool, so sweet; how grateful to my heated brow, how soothing to my troubled spirits! I am not sure but that they are the odorous breaths from the hills of eternal snows.

O, those airy, downy flakes! Whirling, swirling, floating, falling—falling from where? O tell me, ye poets, ye sages; for I don't believe that story of their home in cloud-land. It isn't true. They are sprays of frozen foam from the ocean of
—oh, give me a name worthy of them!

[O, you rusty, stupid, old pen! At every stroke you exhibit your depth of poverty—your barrenness of material, your puny weakness,—halt!]

You must not imagine that I have reared for myself a little artificial crystal palace from which to write this sermon and song of snow eloquence. That trusty burden-bearer, "Natural Phenomena" is responsible for the subject and substance of this letter. A snow storm is raging furiously, and already the hills and high-ways "are heaped with silence, deep and white."

This bids fair to be one of the March snows for the gray-beards of the summer south land to talk about when they gather their grand-children within the tropic zone of fireside warmth and glow, and tell the magic tales of long ago.

Strange, what potent power the elements exert on the human heart! What a heaven of inspiration comes with these storms of white blossoms blown from—from—(O, you stubborn pen! I'll teach you discipline! I would not live in a world where I could know everything!)

The storm king is the Epis Muse of nature, and he never fails to draw forth the poetry of humanity. It excites men as well as dogs—which one man says are next in the animal scale to man—to accomplish deed of daring. I once saw a rough farmer give ample evidence of the sunny side of his nature by wading out into great snow-drifts and rescue his hens from an untimely death. But this farmer loves an old hen better than he loves his wife.

This falling snow will recall to the mind of many women, the poorer circumstances of some other woman, and the happy Christmas-tide will come again to many a cold hearth-stone; and this aftermath of winter harvest, the fruit gleanings from the rich fields of charity, feasting the souls of both Ruth and Naomi, and sow anew the seeds of peace and good will to bear their fruit at the great day of the gleaming of souls. O, the majestic mission of these time-deeds of charity falling silently, softly, like the snow-flakes has never been fully understood. The woman whose name is never seen heading the lists of great charities, and who is never made a guzing stock for a hypocritical world, and yet who goes silently about through the highways and by-ways of sin and suffering, with the rustle of angel's wings in her soft robes, and the sound of the Saviour's tones in her sympathetic voice, is doing a great deal more than one thinks towards ushering in the millennium so loudly prayed for in public places. When will Nature's wary children ever learn from her the only true and complete science of life? I would not have less of the prominent religion, at least that part that says unmistakably it comes from the heart, and that it is done for love of the Great Heart, but I do wish for more of the snow-flakes of religion, the sweet little deeds of love and tenderness that every one can give. How like the sympathy of a gentle friend is that cool breeze on my cheek; how like the music of the storm-tossed soul is that mournful, majestic harmony that the Winter King is playing on that wonderful organ of nature.

Divine inspiration is not confined strictly to the age of apostles. No, no!
It's voice is heard in the snow storm!
God yet passes by in the wind; but we smother our ears so that we may not hear—we hide and remain hidden in the cleft of the rock, that's all. Did I not catch a sound of the voice as it passed me in the roar of the tempest? Why, I feel as if I could start right out without either gold or silver for my purse, (that's the way that I should be obliged to go if I should start at all) without extra coat or shoes (!) and tramp to the utter-most parts of the earth on the mission of snow-flake preaching; that is, from every cross road, street corner, and house-top, should be heard the sermon:

"Little deeds of kindness,
Little words of love,
Make our earth an Eden!
Like the heaven above!"

That's all that I would say, too; because I should want my hearers to remember every word of it. Won't you try?

So this same subtle power inspired me to talk to "my gentle friend," and bathed in this sea of exhilarating influence, I endeavor to imprison some of the thought-flowers that come floating along with this deluge of winter's white blossoms and crystallize them into word-wreaths for the benefit of those who have missed this paradise of the old king's farewell kiss shower. But the fairest of them elude my silver lasso, they go whirling by with the rollicking, frolicking snow elves.

One of the first brain-fairies that comes trooping along with the snow flakes, is a memory elfin and she takes me by the hand and whisks me back to childhood, the beautiful, snow-time innocence of life, where a mother's warm kisses heal all of my hurts, and a father's strong arms bear me over all of the rough places in my road. Here is a lesson for you, a parent! So live that, though your children may not, according to Pestalozzi's idea, transfer their love from you to God, the Father and God, the mother, they may know beyond the shadow of doubt, that the road you travel ends at the gates of heaven. For,
O father, steeped in business cares, O mother, lost in frivolous folly, they are tracing your footsteps.

The surest guides that these little pilgrims have on the journey of life, are your foot-prints; and whether they lead over the unsullied snow of a christian life, or through the burning desert of worldly strife, 'tis your choice. Have a care whether you lead these tender, delicate feet!

Looking Back.

BY H. C. MARTIN.

This poem is the jewel of jewels. Yes, it was a woman that struck the first blow to break the chains of slavery, and was the beginning of the end. Many women are helpless widows, many children are orphans by this war to set the bond men free. Now they ought to strike for the suffragist—the female slaves—and join the ranks of the labor party! I think they will if the white brethren will tell them how and why. Now they are free and are the fifteenth amendment, the suffragist would like to be the sixteenth amendment.

One woman struck the blow of freedom for them. Now let us look back a little. Julius Caesar conquered the world and then a woman conquered him. But look back. The book tells of Joel, the patriot, a woman of courage; of Esther, the beautiful diplomat, who, by her self-sacrifice and faith, was able to countervail even the unalterable laws of the Medes and Persians. There are thousands of women to-day that I fully understand all of the workings of our government and its laws. They must abide by the laws, and why should they not help make them? Our constitution says no taxation without representation; yet widows must pay taxes, but can't vote. I believe every tax-payer should vote regardless of sex. I believe in the near future they will have equal rights with the men.

Let the suffragist's watchword ever be "Excelsior." The cause is gaining. There are more avenues open for women to work than in the p st, and they are improving the opportunity. Our daughters will have to be taught something besides to just sit and fold their hands.

The Industrial Conference.

The National Industrial conference was, in my opinion, made up of 600 men and women, the majority of whom were loyal to prohibition and woman's suffrage. Its leaders were men of marked ability and much political experience.
Most of them would have been glad to see these planks put in, but there was

FRANCIS E. WILLARD.

an irreconcilable element headed by Robert Schilling, the Milwaukee German, and S. F. Norton, both representing the liquor interests, Dr. C. W. Macune, of Washington; Ben Terrill, of Texas, and delegates of North Carolina, representing southern conservatism on the woman question, and a delegate judge of Kansas who inveighed against prohibition, with others of their order who exhausted political tactics and dilatory motions to down the whole question. On a fair vote, we should have carried both planks of the minority report; and I cannot express my regret that such men as Col.
Polk, Gen. Weaver, Terrence V. Powderly, Dr. De La Matry, A. J. Streeter, Ignatius Donnelly, all of whom are personally with us, as I know by their own expressions to me, should allow their convictions and intelligence to be surmounted by the craft of the liquor wing and the conservatism of our southern brethren in the People's party. This wing is as thoroughly opposed to woman's ballot as its branch is to the principle of prohibition of the liquor power, and women have little to hope should this wing become dominant.

The woman's suffrage resolution offered by Mrs. Anna L. Diggs, of Kansas, and adopted by eight to two in the subcommittee and by 55 to 25 in the platform committee, was rescinded after an all-night session by the junto of recalci-trants which remained after the session, and which in a committee of 100 members represented less than one-fourth.—
Francis E. Willard.

Robert Schilling's Defense in the Milwaukee Advance.

The Advance is aware that it assumes a herculean task, when it attempts to set a woman right, and that woman one of such great power and influence as Francis Willard. But it believes in "equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

And in the light of that axiom it declares Miss Willard's statement grossly and wilfully untrue.

Miss Willard was present in the committee room when Robert Schilling on roll call voted "aye" to put woman suffrage in the platform, and thanked him in a speech for doing so.

How does that agree with her present statement? Instead of Schilling, Norton, Macune and Terrell "exhausting political tactics and dilatory motions to down the whole question," not one of them made a motion or used any tactics.

When the southern delegates learned the action of the committee they entered a vigorous protest, and another meeting of the committee was called by open and public announcement from the stage at the conference. Of course, you not being present at the hall did not know this,
and for that reason I do not blame you for making a statement at variance with the facts. But your friends who did know it, might have told you.

At this meeting Geo. Weaver, with apparently great regret, moved to strike out the woman's suffrage plank, stating that the ladies, naming Mrs. Diggs and Mrs. Lease, after mature consideration had given their consent to this action.
If he had not made that statement I assure you I should have voted to retain the plank, but what could be done when the women themselves wanted it that way? I am an individualist, and as such I must concede to every individual the same right I claim for myself. My friends tell me that woman suffrage will be followed by prohibition. Suppose it is? Does that justify me in debarring women from a right that I claim for myself? For exactly and identically the same reason do I oppose prohibition.

Drinking to excess is wrong, but that does not justify another wrong.

Yours very respectfully,

ROBERT SCHILLING.

For the FARMER'S WIFE.

Women's Franchise.

BY SARAH THOMPSON.

The social and religious duties of woman's life are a boundless sea of turbulant and restless waves rolling onward and upward as the days, weeks, months and years pass swiftly by, without scarcely realizing the great responsibilities to her country as an American citizen. When once awakened to the astounding truth that she is not alone, that thousands of others are treading
the same road of ignorance and injustice, she is first led to think, then to act, and no longer is she willing to trudge this downward road to slavery and pauperism. The situation that a multitude of unmistakable wrongs is too plainly before us. Many a heart-broken and dispondent mother would gladly pass from the scenes of her tired and wretched life, if it were not for leaving her loved and innocent children in a cold and unfriendly world of sin and wickedness.
And many times when a father or husband has been taken away by death, an ignorant and dependent mother has had to part with a pleasant and comfortable home, and sometimes the little children, all because she does not understand business transactions of every day life, or duty to home and country.

To-day is the dawning of an eventful period that will elevate the intelligent, educate the ignorant, enthuse the despondent, and give hope to the hopeless.
Intelligent and virtuous women are becoming more able to protect themselves every day, and many are sufficiently clothed with the power of a practical and political education to equal any man at the ballot. The more level-headed scientific and decent-minded men of today are willing to work to elevate their sisters to a higher and purer life by giving them the right of franchise.

If the educated women of America are capable of solving the poorly constructed financial and political questions of to-day, and taking the responsible occupation of physician and nurse for the sick and afflicted, and last, but not least, the accountable duties of mother, is she not more worthy her right of franchise—her own birthright—than the illiterate foreign criminals who are brought to our country by the millions, and allowed to vote against the respectable, moral, and religious sentiments of enlightened and christianized women.

The sisters of our nation who are already organized for reform are numbered by the thousands. Any man, or imitation of a man, who would dare vote against the rights and privileges of this great army of reform workers, would demonstrate to us a mind too insignificant indifferent and wicked, to merit the name of father, husband or brother.

To talk of reform without giving women the right to vote is saying we don't want any reform.

The Almighty has allowed these trials of sin and wickedness to come upon us to try our faith, and we should hope and pray and be patient and suffer, so that our happiness may be more complete in the world to come. But faith without work is dead, and our hope is that in the near future the Almighty will be pleased to give us our right of franchise, because we are asking for what is right in every sense of the word. And the Almighty don't want us to pray for him to do what he intends for us to do for ourselves to his glory and honor.

He also commands us to watch as well as pray, which means for us to watch and work, and pray, and vote, to rescue a fallen nation.

For the FARMER'S WIFE.

After-Thoughts.

BY AUNT LOUISA.

In the first years of our married life, when the babies persisted in coming every two or three years, I used to think how nice it would be when the last baby was old enough to go to school. Now do not one of you dare imagine my babies were not welcome, but I had never been "used to babies," and I had been brought up to think a home not kept in perfect order was disorderly, or slipshod, as my foster-mother would have expressed it. So I would plan it all out, to myself, how nicely I would keep the house in order, and what quiet times Tom and I would have when the play-things could be kept in their place five days out of each week. Well, the last 5-year-old has donned his mittens and muffer and gone with the older ones over the hill to the school house—and if any of you young mothers think this a pleasant experience I just wish you could peep in on me at this moment.
The house is in perfect order. I lingered about it, putting things in their places carefully. I did not need to hurry, you know, and now the dinner is over and I sit down to my sewing and the perfect order and quiet give me the horrors.
And that dinner! Tom took his with him to the field, preferring a cold dinner to one so utterly lonesome. Of course he didn't say so; he had some good excuse. (By the way, did you ever think how full our old world is of "good excuses?")

The old yellow cat came in, looked round, uttered a disconsolate "meow," and went out instead of taking her favorite place by the stove, in the sun.
Even the bird knows there is not a child about the house, for he refuses to utter a note.

Dear sisters there are a number of things which look so all important to us, when climbing life's hill, but which we think of as quite insignificant when viewed from the western slope. Neatness and order are beautiful to see, and are almost a necessity in any home, but they are not so essential as the good health and good temper of the mother.
I place the two side by side, for we all know the one depends upon the other.
"Billious and irritable" has become a proverb, and yet the crosslest woman I ever knew, and one of the most perfect housekeepers, was never sick; while, on the other hand, one of the sweetest dispositions I have ever met, whose home was never in order in the three years of our acquaintance, was never well in all that time. The family of the one lived in constant fear lest a speck of dirt, or some trifle misplaced, should arouse the mother's tongue or lash, while the other was a happy, jolly lot, whose love for the frail little mother was beautiful to see. She was just at that age when we women must take care of our health
if we are to be spared to our families.
She knew this, and had the discretion to "act according." And, just here, let me tell you, there is nothing that will so help us to forget the things we have not the strength to do ourselves, and others do not see to do as a quiet reliance on Him "who knoweth our weakness." "It is this alone that has kept me alive," this sweet little woman said to me one day.
"Naturally I am very orderly, and relying on my own strength I positively could not let things go as I do." This—with the good sense to remember that these romping girls would, in such a little while, grow into sweet womanly women, order-loving and neat—made for them all a happy home, blessed by the presence of a mother, whose faith never faltered, and whose counsel was never at fault.

We all begin our days of motherhood with grand dreams of how our babies are to be brought up. Now, if they are not "easily molded" into the children you want them to be, never mind. It does not necessarily follow that they are "spoiled." If you study their little misdeeds carefully, you will find that which looked at first as "pure mischief," was but thoughtlessness, or, what is more common, a desire to "help mamma." Of course at first the helping is all backward, but be patient, chide gently. It will be such a little while until the tiny hands will be as large and helpful as your own; the little brain, whose planning now taxes both your time and temper, be filled with plans for the adorning and comfort of the home which will prove a blessing to you all. Into all our lives there must creep some mistakes, some regrets. Blest, indeed, is that mother whose children speak of "mother's cooking" and "mother's housekeeping" as being above reproach, but whose tenderest memory of her is,
"Our ever gentle counselor and friend."

ACTORS are often egged off instead of on in their profession.

TASCOTT has been caught in Indian Territory. Samoa and Zanzibar are about the only spots remaining in which he has not been found.

THERE is a growing conviction that while Jerry Simpson may have less in his boots than many of his associates in Congress, he has more in his head.

SENATOR PEPPER says he hopes to see forty-story buildings in Chicago some day. The Senator's architectural ideas are as extravagant as his beard.

NICARAGUA is to have the Louisiana lottery. This will give the people of the United States a choice between two ditches in Nicaragua into which to dump their money.

If Mr. Rockefeller purposes giving the Chicago University $1,000,000 every time he gets over an illness it might be well to inoculate him with hay fever or some other recurrent ailment.

WHY destroy present happiness by a distant misery, which may never come at all, or you may never live to see it? For every substantial grief has twenty shadows, and most of them shadows of your own making.

THE clergyman who just totters on the edge of heresy and the actress who has been the heroine of a divorce suit draw great throngs of admirers. The least suspicion of infidelity is relished alike by those who sit before the pulpit and before the footlights.

A SENIOR in Columbia College has won fame by sending $2,000 worth of flowers in one night to a comic opera divinity. There is no use of the Chicago University trying to compete with these Eastern institutions of learning by hiring $7,000 professors.

THE Chicago Herald has convicted Col. Ingersoll of clap-trap and plagiarism in his speech on Abraham Lincoln. It would seem from the evidence produced by the Herald that the Colonel is in the habit of gathering telling sayings and bright paradoxes from famous authors and fling them off as his own on good occasion. The speech in question seems to be a collection of such stolen goods slightly disguised.

THE Czar has granted an annual subsidy of $360,000 to a Russian steamship company which contracts to build vessels of a type that will be suitable for cruisers and transports in time of war. No doubt the Russian Government cherishes feelings of the utmost gratitude to those foreign nations which have contributed freely to alleviate the sufferings of its famine-stricken people, thus enabling the resources of the imperial treasury to be employed in the purchase of war material.

A NUMBER of shop-keepers in Boston's suburbs have been swindled by a couple of clever rascals who have worked the old coin dodge. The advance agent in this game calls at a store in the guise of a numismatist, interests the merchant in his calling, and leaves a coin catalogue for reference. In a day or two his companion in the game calls, makes a trifling purchase and offers a coin in payment. Almost immediately he snatches it up again, explaining that it is a pocket piece and one that he would not care to part with. The store-keeper, remembering the first caller, asks to see the coin, and a consultation of the catalogue shows that it is valued at $25. After some haggling the owner consents to part with the coin for $15. Of course the coin is worth its face value and the party of the first part never calls again. The store-keepers naturally objected to accumulating old silver at this premium.

THE typhus epidemic in New York emphasizes the demand made long since for a more rigid enforcement of the restrictions on immigration. It is a glorious thing on the Fourth of July and other patriotic occasions to think and speak of this country as "a refuge for the oppressed of every land," but it is a very dangerous thing to make it a refuge for the fever-stricken, the pauper and the criminal. As a matter of fact the "refuge" business in all its aspects has been greatly overdone in the past. It is time to take more care for the safety and well-being of those now here.

A TRUTHFUL correspondent of the St. Paul Pioneer-Press at Hamilton, Mont., describes a meteor that fell in his vicinity. It drove itself 200 feet into the ground but still sticks up 100 feet to the air, and emits sulphurous fumes. That poison the air for miles around. In its fall it buried from sight forever a cattle-shed containing forty cows and two Chinamen. It gives off great streams of molten metal that run down into the bed of "an extinct lake in which was recently found a petrified sea-serpent sixty feet in length, and is only a short distance from the great cave in the mountains in which were found the band of hibernating Indians, the last of the cliff dwellers." Persecution cannot keep Joe Mulhatton down. Genius crushed to earth will rise and assert itself in a while.

It is proverbial that the amount of skill, ingenuity and industry exercised by many of the so-called confidence men would produce far more satisfactory results, even in dollars and cents, if applied in legitimate channels. An emphatic instance of the trouble a smart man will take to secure a small amount of money fraudulently was furnished in Chicago recently. A well-dressed man entered one of the large dry goods stores and represented that he wished to purchase $5,000 worth of goods for cash, to be shipped to a Western town, where he was to open a new business. For two days he worked assiduously making selections, exhibiting throughout a knowledge of the business and much perspicacity as a buyer. Finally he hired one of the clerks who had been waiting on him to accompany him to the Western town to take charge of a department in the new store. He demanded of this clerk $17 preliminary for the securing of a guaranty bond. The clerk's salary was to be $2,000 a year, and he put up the $17 without a murmur. Then the sharper vanished, leaving the goods unpaid for and practically unbought, and the clerk whistling for his money. Counting the two days which the confidence man spent in the feint of purchasing a stock and the time it took him to concoct and perfect the scheme he must have employed at least a week in securing that $17. Thousands of honest men with a tenth of his talent are earning twice that amount every week of their lives.

ENGLAND is aroused as to the wisdom and need of making a great display of her resources at the World's Fair, and her colonies are besieging her with requests for large allowances of space. Indeed, New South Wales, according to Sir Henry Trueman Wood, asks for 300,000 feet of space in the building erected by Great Britain, and other colonies for 200,000. "What," asks Sir Henry, "are we to do? Is the mother to be crowded out altogether?" It is not likely that she will be. But, while on this subject, we learn from 'The Australian Manufacturer, of December last, that delegates from the Chamber of Manufacturers, the Artists' Society, the Wool Growers' Association, and the Central Australian Wine Association, have assembled in Melbourne and passed resolutions calling on the Prime Minister of the colony to urge the legislature "to make a proper appropriation for the erection of an Australian building on the World's Fair grounds, and also to appoint a colonial commission for the proper carrying out of the object." The embryo empire of the Southern Pacific should be, and doubtless will be, more fitly represented than would be possible in the space allotted to Great Britain. From England, as from all European countries, comes promises of a particularly interesting electrical display, and the selection of Sir Frederick Leighton, President of the Royal Academy, as Chairman of the Fine Arts Exhibition is a sufficient assurance of a liberal display of British sculpture and painting. Agriculture, mines, and manufacturers, almost from necessity, will be amply represented, and what the British women can do will be shown fully to her sisters of other nations, the Woman's Work Committee being composed of some of the most practical as well as some of the highest-born of the realm. Britannia will come in great state to visit Columbia in 1893.

AN INTERVIEW WITH SENATOR PEPPER.

Senator Pepper says that the mention of his name in connection with a presidential nomination is merest gossip and without any foundation. "A man who aspires to be the chief executive of this great country," said the senator in discussing the rumor about himself, "and the man who is named as a presidential candidate by any party, even though that party has just been organized, should be a man of long experience in public affairs. He should be thoroughly acquainted with the resources and needs of the whole country, with every department of government, with every great issue before the people, in fact he should have that knowledge of the business of the nation which no man can gain without years and years of experience in public life. I would not, therefore, under any circumstances consent to have my name presented to the Omaha convention as a candidate for that high honor."

When asked for his opinion as to the ticket which the people's party would name, he said: "It is quite likely to be General Weaver for president and Colonel L. L. Polk for vice president. Of the various names which have been mentioned it seems to me Weaver is the most acceptable. He is a man of national prominence and has had wide experience in public life." "I know there are a great many alliance men in Stanford's state," said Senator Pepper, "who favor the nomination of Senator Stanford for president, and there are many others who are decidedly against it, so that even his own state could not unite upon him. I regard Senator Stanford as sincere and earnest in his advocacy of cheap money for the people. His land loan bill, however, would meet with severe criticism even from our own people. For instance, under that bill, the great corporations which own large tracts of land could, under Mr. Stanford's bill, borrow immense sums of money at 2 per cent. Mr. Stanford, himself, with his thousands of acres, could, under his bill as it now is, borrow probably a million dollars—anyway a very large sum—at 2 per cent."

GOVERNMENT PAYS GOLD FOR SILVER.

From the Denver The Road.

Not one dollar in ten thousand dollars' worth of treasury notes has gone into circulation; and if we can take the word of President Harrison the regular purchases of silver every month represent the reduction of the gold surplus. This sort of thing has gone on until scarcely anything now remains in the United States treasury in gold but the $100,000,000 held for the redemption of the $346,000,000 of old legal tender treasury notes now supposed to be in circulation, but which are in fact mostly lost or destroyed.

The last purchase of silver bullion nearly exhausted every available dollar of gold reserve in the United States treasury, and next month the railroads will have to dip into the one hundred millions of gold held for greenback redemption in order to get the gold to satisfy the English bondholders. The next scheme the European money power puts up to invest their idle money will be the passage of a bill through our congress authorizing the issue of another $200,000,000 gold bonds to replenish the United States treasury with material upon which the railroads can again draw to get gold to pay interest. While this sort of thing exists the railroads will remain the chief buyers of silver bullion, for, under the present compulsory bullion-buying legislation, they are enabled to draw treasury notes out of one window of the United States treasury and immediately convert them into gold at the next window. The railroads must have gold to pay interest, and while that interest amounts annually to more than the total product of silver and gold they must depend upon cheap silver bullion to secure gold. That means competition between railroads and other owners of bullion to see who can bid the lowest in order to induce the government to buy the bullion and thus enable them to get United States treasury notes to convert into gold.

NEVER GREATER—NEVER LESS.

Money juggling should stop. The alternate contraction and expansion of the volume of circulation every twenty-five years simply enables the gambling shysters to depress and enhance the price of wheat, corn, pork or labor to suit their purposes. The government should take charge of the money question and issue enough from time to time to keep the circulation per capita at a fixed figure. Then the prices of commodities would not fluctuate only so far as the law of supply and demand would cause decrease and increase in values. As conditions now exist, the law of supply and demand (the true cause for fluctuating prices) has mighty little to do with prices, money contraction and monopoly corners being at the bottom of varying markets twenty times where the law of supply and demand is once. The great bulk of our government, state, county and city debts were made when gold, silver and greenbacks represented a circulation per capita of over $50. The government should restore the circulation to that figure and keep it there—never greater or never less.

ENEMIES OF THE REPUBLIC.

By Walter Q. Gresham.

Men who contribute money to buy votes and to bribe the people's representatives, as well as those who disburse it, are deadly enemies of the republic. Their greed and love of power are greater than their love of country. They impair popular respect for law, which is the only safeguard for life and property; and it will be an evil day for the nation when its preservation depends upon their patriotism and courage. They may masquerade in the garb of righteousness and address the people in the language of patriotism, but their virtues are assumed; they are hypocrites and assassins of liberty, and would welcome a dynasty rather than shed their blood in defense of popular government. Their shameless and insidious attacks on free institutions are infinitely more dangerous than the revolutionary teachings and practices of a comparatively few visionary and misguided men and women in our large cities.

It is not such men as these, but the great multitude, engaged in active and hardy pursuits, who constitute the real strength of the nation. They are not enemies of law and order; they do not envy or hate those who have acquired property by honest methods. They bear their full share of the public burdens, and so long as the powers of the nation are not perverted to their injury for the enrichment of a few, they will rally to its defense with unselfish and devoted patriotism. Their energy and courage have not been deadened by ease and luxury.

There can be no prosperity without public tranquility, and the people will not remain tranquil long under a well-founded belief that the corrupt use of money prevents a free and honest expression of their choice of men and measures. If public opinion cannot be honestly expressed in authorized ways our elections will become expensive and useless mockeries and free government will exist only in name.

Let us not be deceived by mere forms. Radical changes in government may be effected without perceptible change in the mode of administration. Some of the worst tyrannies the world has ever known were maintained under popular forms.

WHO ARE DEMOCRATS NOW?

"Congress has no power to charter national banks. We believe that such institutions are deadly hostile to the best interests of the country, dangerous to our republican institutions, and the liberties of the people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated money power, and above the laws and will of the people; that the separation of the money of the government from banking institutions is indispensable for the safety of the funds, and the rights of the people." Reader, the above is a part of the national democratic platform of 1856.

AMONG EXCHANGES.

Gainesville (Texas) Signal: What are alliance men fit for, any how, who won't vote to sustain alliance principles?

Columbia (S. C.) Cotton Plant: All honor to the man who will not sell his manhood for money! And let all the people say, "amen!"

Milton (W. Va.) Star: The alliance stands for principles alone, while the old parties are willing to sacrifice any and all principles for power.

Gainesville (Texas) Signal: It is not what you raise how much you raise, or where you raise it, that is troubling you. It is the price you get.

Lincoln (Neb.) Farmers' Alliance: The old parties are sectional, selfish, and class legislating. Let the new party, therefore, be named the national party.

Clarendon (Texas) Traveler: People can never pay their debts with a contracted currency except in a comparatively few instances of exceptionally good fortune.

Abilene (Kans.) Monitor: "The year of jubilee am coming" in the year of '92. The prayers of thousands of anxious hearts are being answered by the grand work done at the St. Louis meeting.

Montrose (Cal.) Industrial Union: Reformers to the front; all are now united and stand on a common ground. Put your shoulder to the wheel and start in motion once more the machine of human progress.

Des Moines (Ia.) Tribune: With a proper system of finance in operation the dark veil which covers the homes of this country can be lifted and the people allowed to breathe the free air of heaven once more. Vote for it.

Los Angeles (Cal.) Porcupine: It is not hatred against capital, but hatred against its oppression, that is the saving watchword of the toilers who are preparing to do away with the present oppressive system of industry.

Des Moines (Iowa) Tribune: National bank notes are based on the national debt, which draws interest. The bank notes also draw interest whenever in circulation. Like Ben Franklin's whistle, the system is a dear luxury.

Little Rock (Ark.) Farmer: Congress is pottering along, squabbling over trifles, and doing nothing because afraid to do anything looking to the relief of the country, and yet we are asked to continue these men as our law-makers.

Des Moines (Ia.) Tribune: Under the national bank law the bankers draw orders on the people bearing interest, and the people are obliged to cash over. Best system for the bankers the world ever saw.

Cincinnati (Ohio) Herald: The two old parties have been settling the tariff question ever since their existence, and it is no nearer settled to-day than it was fifty years ago. Now the proper thing to do is to settle the two old parties.

Jacksonville (Fla.) Visitor: Sons of toil, may we ask you to lay aside your spectacles of party prejudice and look matters squarely in the face. Ninety per cent of interest and profit goes into the hands of non-producers. Is it right? Can it be right?

Little Rock (Ark.) Farmer: Nothing can be gained by indecision. Positive, decided and unalterable action, controlled in moderation and guided in the interests of the masses, will touch a popular chord of sympathy and awaken the applause of the people.

Des Moines (Iowa) Tribune: Men who can be trusted to make laws in the interest of the people upon land, money and transportation, can be depended on to legislate wisely on other great questions. Allow the enemy to create no division on the minor issues.

Meadville (Pa.) Farmer: At St. Louis a platform was laid that no honest and enlightened patriot can refuse to stand on. It was laid by representatives of every branch of labor. It is a grand declaration of independence, issuing from those who feed clothe and sustain the nation.

Columbus (S. C.) cotton Plant: Do not let your interests in local questions and individual candidates this year lead you to ignore or subordinate the great relief measures urged for consideration by the alliance. Keep the demands prominently before your own mind and the minds of your neighbors during this year.

Spokane (Wash.) World: The doing nothing policy of the democrats is strikingly illustrated on the tariff question. They propose to take up one article at a time and discuss it for weeks, and thus take up the time of congress and discuss it for weeks, and thus take up the time of congress with two or three articles. This will leave the present congress practically having done nothing.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

A CHOICE SELECTION OF INTERESTING ITEMS.

Comments and Criticisms Based Upon the Happenings of the Day.

LONDON now has every theater fumigated as soon as the performance closes. London is tired of the grip.

THE statement of a clergyman in New York that one-eighth of the population of that city goes to church seems wildly extravagant.

IN spite of the vast sums the Government has spent in narrowing the mouth of the Mississippi the capacity of the noble old stream for swallowing money is increasing all the time.

THE steamship Indiana has sailed from Philadelphia with 3,300 tons of food for the Russian sufferers. This will enable the Czar to defer unlocking his strong-box a week or two longer.

EDISON is a famous inventor, but he hasn't discovered a device which will make it safe for an honest man to commit his property to Wall street stock jobbers. The "Wizard" has been frozen out of his own companies.

ACCORDING to statistics there were nearly 3,000,000 more girls born last year than boys. There must have been some reason for it. Possibly the modern boy has not been panning out well and the supply is to be reduced. Let us hope not.

THE young Emperor of Germany would like to attend the World's Fair but thinks that the state of European politics will not permit of his absence. Come over and see us, kaiser. There is no one thing that would do European politics so much good as your absence.

THE ravages of grip have undoubtedly been very great among the American people, but we have reason to be thankful that we are not afflicted by the descriptive names given to the malady in Germany, such as "blitz catarrh" (lightning catarrh), "schaafshusten" (sheep cough), "huehuenziep" (crowing), "modefleber" (fashionable fever), etc.

A THRILL of sorrow pervades New York City. Caliph, the estimable hippopotamus at Central Park, is suffering from biliousness and low spirits, while Smiles, the amiable and accomplished rhinoceros, is afflicted with rheumatism. The hopelessness of curing Smiles by external applications of oil or liniment is so apparent that his friends are in despair. Why don't they try the faith cure?

IT is said that in Algeria there is a small river of genuine ink. It represents the union of two streams, one strongly impregnated with iron and the other a strong solution of gallic acid, due to flowing through peat moss bogs. The natives can not drink it, and as they do not write its waters run to waste. Now for some genius that will turn it into paper channels and spread the news of the World's Fair through Africa.

EVEN news is relative. For instance, the newspapers find it valuable to chronicle the first natural death which has occurred in Hope, Idaho. The victim was a bartender and he perished with the comparatively sensational disease of consumption. Seventy-five persons have crossed the divide from Hope during the past year, but they have been prosaically murdered and the only advertisement of their demise consists of illegible inscriptions on shingle tombstones. Somebody made a slight mistake in naming Hope. It ought to be Whoop.

THE death of the Duke of Clarence gave an opportunity to the various contestants for the post of Poet Laureate which they were not slow to use. Mr. Alfred Austin communicated his ode on the death of the Duke to the Times and got it into print on the morning after the death of the subject—a business-like celerity which must have sent cold shivers down the spines of his rivals. Three days later Lewis Morris had his ode before the world; but the delay had not improved the quality of the verse, which is said to have been quite as bad as that of his rival. The third ode was from Sir Edwin Arnold, who is confessedly a candidate, but he was not on the spot as he was ill; so that in this instance popular expectation was not gratified. Of course, the present incumbent of the office for which the indecent scribbling is going on is able to take his own time and deliver his official rhymes when he gets ready.

THE editor of the English Horticultural Times, London, is evidently not destitute of imagination. He endeavors in a recent number to warn his readers against the American apple, which is proving so dangerous a rival to the native fruit in England; and he does it by assuring his readers that the delicate tint of the American apple is due to the use of arsenic as an insecticide. "We assert," it says, "that the delicate and unnatural tint referred to is produced by the arsenic which is absorbed through the skin. Medical men inform us that, when arsenic is administered in small doses, it stimulates the action of the skin and gives clearness to the complexion and it is for these reasons, especially in America, that it has been extensively used by the fairer sex for years." For a Britisher this is doing pretty well! And the chances are even that the readers are stupid enough to receive this rubbish seriously.

RECENT dispatches from New Orleans in the daily papers afforded an edifying picture of the state of the law and society down there. Two famous specimens of the healthy brute were making scientific preparations to batter each other into unconsciousness, and the Crescent City fairly outdid itself in the magnificence of its preparations for the event. An arena seating 3,200 people was erected. Patti prices were charged—$5 for ordinary seats and $7 for seats in the boxes. The ring was declared to be "the most perfect in the world," floored with "river sand, closely packed." United States engineers surveyed the model butcher-shop, thus insuring its exact correspondence to the principles laid down by the Marquis of Queensberry. Yet science was not allowed to wholly replace the aesthetic. "The stakes are very heavily padded, as well as the ropes, by a very soft substance, with red silk on the outside. One can easily imagine the neat and pretty effects these combinations of colors have—the blue sand and red silk ropes and stakes when lit up by a large number of electric lights." It may occur to the people of New Orleans that the enthusiasm of prize-fighters and their patrons is not the best possible foundation upon which to build a reputation for good order. And such a reputation is in the highest degree essential to the city's prosperity.

JUDGE LYNCH has many crimes charged against him, but the one, committed at Texarkana, has no peer for hellish conception, fiendish execution, and downright savagery exhibited among the perpetrators and onlookers. Ed Coy, a negro, committed an assault on a Mrs. Jewell. He was captured by a mob who prevented rescue by the authorities. It was evident from the moment of his capture that Coy was not destined to be tried by a legal court. The only question which arose was the manner in which he should be put to death. Somebody in the crowd mentioned hanging, and he narrowly escaped being lynched himself so intense was the feeling. Burning at the stake was suggested, and in an instant the mob, with the victim, was rushing madly toward the outskirts of the town. A tree was found, to which the negro was bound with bands of iron. Coal oil in liberal quantities was poured over him. A moment of deep, awful silence followed. Then a shout went up. It was: "Let Mrs. Jewell apply the match! Let Mrs. Jewell set him off!" Mrs. Jewell accepted the invitation. In an instant the negro's body was enveloped in flames. The crowd looked on and jeered and joked at the victim's agony. In twenty minutes a few ashes lay at the foot of the tree and justice had been vindicated. All of this occurred in the United States and in the dawn of the twentieth century. If there is any such thing in this country as justice it should be meted out to the members of that Texarkana mob. If it requires the entire regular army to do it it should be done. There is not a mitigating circumstance which can be advanced in favor of flends who will deliberately submit a human being to the torture which Coy, the negro, suffered. If ever there was an occasion for the State of Arkansas to prove to the world that law and justice still exist there, and that its citizens are not a band of savages, that occasion is at hand. It should rise to it.

HOPEFUL OF THE FUTURE.

A Letter to the Members of the Order of Patrons of Husbandry.

THE National, State, Pomona and subordinate granges of our country have repeatedly indorsed the policy of electing United States senators by a direct vote of the people. The amendment providing for it will be submitted to the various state legislatures in the near future, and be ratified by those bodies, if the people do their duty.

But why wait for this change in the constitution? We need this reform now! The people should have more live men in the senate, who are in close touch with them. There are several members of that body who should be retired to enjoy the wealth which was the means of their elevations to an important position, for which they had no especial fitness.

These men never would have been chosen by popular vote. We should do the next best thing to a direct vote under an amended constitution, which is to insist upon the nomination of candidates for United States senator, in states which will elect this year, by the various political parties with which our members are connected.

If we will agitate this matter sufficiently at once, political parties will hardly disregard the wishes of the people. If we move, others will join us, and the movement will become irresistible. The farmer fills a larger space in the eye of the shrewd politician than ever before, and now is the time for action. A few weeks more and it will be too late for this year.

We should also take a lively interest in the nomination and election of representatives. It is of no use to petition to men who turn a deaf ear to our cries. Nominate friendly men in your party conventions. Elect friendly men at the polls, and then all your reasonable demands will be granted. Retire every "people-be-damned" man, in convention if you can, at the polls if you fail in the convention. Ballots are even more effective than bullets. If the people fail to make proper use of the former, the time may come when the latter must be used to "keep the Jewel of Liberty and the Family of Freedom."

No more important campaign was ever entered upon by a patriotic people than the one just before us. The people must learn to distinguish between sound argument and sophistry. They must not mistake the railing of the demagogue for the inspired eloquence of the true patriot and honest citizen. No order or organization has done more to qualify farmers to make wise use of their political power than that of the patrons of husbandry. We are proud of our past, intensely earnest at the present, very hopeful of the future.

Fraternally yours,
J. H. BRIGHAM,
Master of National Grange.

LABOR ORGANIZATIONS NOT IN VAIN.

From the National View.

IT is quite true that labor organizations have failed to accomplish all that labor reformers have desired or expected; but that does not argue against their necessity or expediency. They have certainly elevated the laboring classes and placed them on a higher plane than they ever occupied before. They have enlarged their power and influence in all social, economic and political affairs.

Herein they can report progress on the laboring question. Organization has been a sword and a shield in advance. Reforms have been accomplished through its tactics and the pressure of its manipulations.

This vindicates the movement and argues for its continuance and spread.

Whatever imperfections may have retarded its progress, they are not conclusive.

Time and patience and a resolute disposition to reach the highest attainable point of success, "will make all things right," and conduct wage-earners and industrialists generally, to victory at last.

THE MACHINE AND BOSSES.

From the Southern Mercury.

There are many who do not understand the conditions of to-day. For many years both north and south have been "boss" ridden, have done the bidding of the "machine." Many who declare themselves democrats or republicans cannot give an intelligent reason why. They vote the ticket because of association, prompted mainly by prejudice and mistaken fealty to the Southland or the Union. This is as applicable to the republican partisan north as to our democrat partisan south. Both are blinded by prejudice. Both have failed to give the matter honest thought. Like the average southern man, both allow someone else to do their thinking.

The people have not all learned that there is no difference between the republican machine "bosses" and the democratic machine "bosses." They have not learned that they mean the same results; that there is absolutely very little difference in their utterances. One thing, however, every man, no matter where he lives or to what he gives his vote, knows that both want office; and in truth, that is all there is in it.

The word "bosses" means the agents of the party machine. The National Economist makes the matter plain in saying that the "party machine is the secret force in the great money centers that donates eight or ten millions of dollars for each presidential campaign, for the purpose of controlling the legislative and executive branches of the government after they have been chosen. They can well afford to pay each party ten millions of dollars campaign fund once in four years, or twenty millions in all, which would be five millions a year, because for that sum they succeed in perpetuating conditions that enable them to take unjustly from the pockets of the people hundreds of millions of dollars each year. Of course they do not buy congress and the president with this money; they simply pay the expenses of the party machine," buy whisky, pay "workers," hire hacks, pay speakers, subsidize newspapers, "and the machine, through a system of party bosses, controls and operates the party organization. There is the national ring of the party, the state ring, the district ring, and in every county the county ring. The party machine always wants such legislation on the part of congress, and such an administration by the president as will not offend and alienate the men who donate the funds to keep the machine going. A congressman soon learns that when he has the machine behind him all the rings, big and little, do the whipping in so effectually that he has a walk-over in his re-election. He need not be dishonest; he need not be corrupt; he need not sell out and get rich; he need not oppose the wishes of his people, except an occasional vote or failure to vote; in fact, he need not exert himself, or do anything but obey the wishes of the machine, to be kept in the office until he dries up from old age. And yet there are some men so corrupt and shameless in their zeal for machine methods that they openly advocate a complete surrender to New York and New England on the money question, in order to hold them in the party, by saying nothing upon that subject."

SKINNING THE CANDIDATE.

From the Meadville, Pa., Farmer.

Every one knows how to "skin the cat," and the proverb says there are many ways to do it; but the methods of skinning the candidate beat the former out of sight. In fact, this thing has passed the bounds of safety. Men will face the guns of the enemies of their country in the field and protect their liberties with their lives, and yet go into the field of politics and hew away at the very foundations of liberty until the whole temple totters to its fall.

Is this thoughtlessness, or selfishness, or is it something worse? Let us look at it for a moment.

The pernicious practice of "skinning" a candidate is most reprehensible and demoralizing. The county committee first demand a fat fee for the privilege of "running;" then the newspapers take four times regular advertising rates for "announcing." The expense up to this point is not less than $225. Next, the district must be "canvassed," which means that the candidate must show himself in every bailiwick with plenty of "sugar," in convenient packages of 5, 10, and 20 to encourage the "bell-weather" to keep the boys in line. This takes several hundred more, and before election is over the whole term's salary has gone into forced circulation.

Now this is all wrong. The county committee tax is subversive of good government. It tends to demoralize everyone concerned. The newspaper squeeze is ditto. The practice of charging a fee of ten to twenty dollars for a two to five dollar ad., is not only reprehensible, but it is high-handed robbery. Then the idea of men having to be paid to exercise a patriotic interest in doing their duty as citizens attending election, is a stigma on our character as a liberty-loving people.

Let this all be changed by dealing fairly and honestly with our candidates. Let the newspaper that will extort exorbitant fees for announcing be ignored. Whoever dares to ignore popular demand on this line, let him feel the weight of popular indignation. Let the committee appeal to the people frankly for money to pay the legitimate expenses of the campaign; and, finally, let every citizen worthy of the name turn out to shut the doors of the legislature on thieves and plunderers and open them to patriots. For what are our granges, alliances and assemblies organized but to protect the morality of our people, foster our liberty, and perpetuate the institutions handed down to us by our fathers?

Let the voice of warning ring in every assembly hall. Take for discussion at your next meeting, "How shall we clear the path to the legislature for honest men?" then formulate a plan and carry it out. If the patriotism of our people can be crystalized, we shall preserve our heritage; if we fail to do it we shall go down in disgrace, and the story of our shame will blot the pages of history to the end of time.

DEMOCRATIC MAJORITY IS N. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Representative Watson, the leader of the people's party, said: "This action in the house on the silver bill is the death knell of the old democratic organization. Hundreds of thousands of voters in the southern states felt that if financial relief could be had, the democracy, as now organized, would give that relief if it had a chance. With a majority of 148 in the house, it certainly had the chance to pass the free silver bill. It failed to do it. It was only by the help of nine of the people's party members and eleven republicans that this immense democratic majority escaped a Waterloo. Consequently, the most conservative democrat in the south knows now that the democratic majorities wielded under the present organization, mean absolutely nothing, so far as practical legislation was concerned. No power on earth can now keep Georgia from going into the electoral college with the people's party candidate. I confidently believe that the same is true of several other southern states. What the democrats may do with the silver bill hereafter is comparatively unimportant. They have had their opportunity. With the help of nineteen outside votes they were absolutely unable to pass such a mild measure of reform as Bland's silver bill. I will never cease to claim that the alliance demands, upon which the people's party is founded, were the true Jeffersonian principles. Let it never be forgotten that Mr. Boutelle, a republican, asked the Tammany democrats to stop filibustering on the bill, and challenged the democrats of the house to come at once to a direct vote on the bill itself. That challenge was refused by the democrats. We who swung loose from the democratic party claimed that northern and eastern democrats had no real sympathy with our people, but were as much under domination of the money power as the republicans of the north and east. After the vote last Thursday night no man will ever be able to successfully deny that proposition."

MRS. LEASE AT WASHINGTON.

From the New York Review of Reviews.

Of all the speakers in the remarkable series of women's conventions recently held in Washington, it is probably within the truth to say that none made so marked an impression as Mrs. Mary E. Lease, of Kansas. If any man would know the manner of the woman reformer who hails from the broad prairies of temperance and humanity loving sunny Kansas, let him read Mrs. Lease's speech at Washington in defense of the farmers' alliance movement. If the reader is not thrilled by the throbbing eloquence and rhetorical beauty as well as the moral intensity of that address he may never hope to be moved by noble speech. Mr. Ingalls is eloquent too, but his eloquence is in telling and felicitous phrases, and of polished wit. It was no match for the prophetic enthusiasm of Mrs. Lease, who is the Joan of Arc of the farmers and workmen of Kansas, and who has an army of women of like spirit at her back.

Those who are dissatisfied because labor is organized should remember that the combination of capitalists has made the combination of producers necessary. It is a clear case of self-defense.

Mrs. Mary M. Clardy is lecturing in eastern Kansas this month.

Honesty is the best policy, but the policy men don't think so.

Charming women never grow older in years, only in looks.

The people who are always in deep water are generally shallow themselves.

No girl is allowed to marry in Norway until she has been taught to bake bread.

The policy of individuals popping up as candidates for public office long before the conventions are to be held is demonstrated to a queen's taste in all parties at the present time.

There is but one money, the making of one dollar issued by the same government above that of another, should be considered a felony punishable by imprisonment.

It is our earnest request that every one of our subscribers make an effort to get us a club in their neighborhood. Remember our low offer, only 25 cents from now till November.

The Devotion of the Women.

While agitating the farm and labor question in the interest of the farmers and the laborers, we do not lose sight of the rights of their wives and daughters. If there is a class in the land that deserves credit for fidelity to principle and unshrinking devotion to duty, it is that of the women who cheer the homes and share the burdens of the toilers of the land.

In speaking of the farmer and the laborer, it is with the implied supposition of the minister who supposed that "the burden embraced the sisters," and, of course, anything which affects the prosperity of the farming and laboring classes, affect them individually. They have toiled with the self-denying devotion that amounts to heroism. It has been said that "at set of sun the work of man is always done, but patient woman never can say her work is done till judgment day." She has not the time for the operas, the musicales, the matinees, the "progressive euchre parties" croquet and lawn tennis of some of her more favored sisters of the town. Her recreation is mostly to work and to manage to make her two hands do the work of six. While she endeavors to give her daughters a chance to obtain a good education, and also to acquire some of the accomplishments in music and art, she does not neglect their education in the essential duties of housekeeping—that makes them the best of help-mates to those who are honored with their choice. All honor to our noble women! then we say, she is with us heart and soul in the cause which means so much for her and those that she loves.

The "Farmer's Wife"

An organ of the National Woman's Alliance auxiliary to the N. F. A. and I. U., will furnish information as follows:

3. Will have directions for home and neighborhood societies.
4. Subjects explained for Bible readings concerning woman's influence in government.
5. Aids for mother's meetings.
6. Helps for school house public meetings.
7. Brief news from alliances and local state and national lectures.

A Mothers' Meeting.

"Truth," had been chosen as the topic.

The scripture passages were from Genesis, 27-28, "Rebecca Deceit," then I Kings, 21, "Jezebel's Falsehoods," and lastly Acts 5, 1-11, "The lie of Sapphira and Annanias."

The motives of these falsehoods were the love of money. Other motives should be taken up, such as vanity, envy, hatred. Exaggeration should be defined and illustrated. The solemnity of a promise should be maintained by all the elders in a household. Goodness of heart is the beginning of truthfulness.

In holding a mothers' meeting, every lady present should be encouraged to give her views.

BOOK NOTES.

"A Kansas Farm, and the Promised Land," by Mrs. Fannie McCormick, is the title of a well-written story portraying the experiences of a young couple, from the sod house in Kansas to the mansion. Then came drought, grasshoppers, the calls of the sheriff, the ejection from the precious home. It contains a well-written account of the rise, and the methods of the farmer's alliance movement. Pp 164, price 50 cents. Address Fannie McCormick, Great Bend, Kas., or to this office.

"Bond-Holders and Bread-Winners," 25 cents, by S. S. King, Esq., Kansas City, Kas. This is a brief compilation from the latest census reports, of the rates at which wealth is accumulated, in nine northeast Atlantic states as compared with the western, central and southern states. It is brief and suited to busy women and to laboring men. It is for sale by the author, or by the Arena, Boston, Mass., and for sale at this office.

"Call to Action," by J. B. Weaver, of Iowa. Price $1.50. This book will furnish our sisters with lessons on our government and its needed reforms, for every month from now until November 8. Its style is so clear so simple that all sensible people can understand it. The mother can explain it to her children. It ought to be in the loan library of every district school in our country. Alliances should own it and have it read at their public assemblies. Address this office.

For the FARMER'S WIFE.

A Communication.

We hear some farmer's wives say that we, the farmers, live too extravagantly.

We wear too costly clothes, our houses too well furnished, and even carriages to ride in.

We should live as our grandparents did. Wear calico or home-made dresses, have no carpets on our soft pine floors, since they had none on their puncheon floors.

Ride on horse-back as they did over the hills and through the timber.

We hear farmer's wives say they work so hard and feel so tired and worn out that if it were not for their children death would be a relief.

At the same time we have preachers in our town who wear broadcloth clothes, a silk hat, gold spectacles, and carry a gold watch, get up and say to the people: "If you don't come and join the church, obey God's commands, pay the preacher, pay off the mortgage on the church," and stamping their feet, draw themselves up as if seized with cramp colic, shake their fists, they close with these words, "You will go to hell."

Another preacher who was called out in the country to preach a funeral, said the poverty and distress he witnessed was terrible. At the same time he stood up in the pulpit in his broadcloth and demanded his $1,200 per year. Now I believe in Christianity with all my heart, but if we, the farmer's, must live as our grandparents did, then our preachers must do as the preachers did in their day. Wear a colored shirt, a home-made suit of clothes, get a $10 or $12 pony—sold perhaps under mortgage from some farmer who had mortgaged it to get money to buy feed for it—get a saddle, if he can, if not strap a blanket on it, ride over the prairie, preach in our pine or sod shanties, partake of our bacon, bread and water, for the farmers are economizing. They can't pay the preacher, can't help the church, and with this condition of things what man dare stand up and say "We are a prosperous nation."

Who dare say women have no voice in this reform movement? We have in our town fourteen or more men who buy the farmers' produce and deal out groceries to them. They tell us what they will allow us for our produce and what we must pay for theirs, and if anyone comes along and offers to do any better by us they spot us and arrest the person.

How many of our townsmen would want to live in a town twenty miles distant from any farmer? At the same time their sentiment seems to be any thing to defeat the will of the farmer. Preachers, townsmen, don't you see that our interests are your interests?

We hear so much said about our beautiful cities and Kansas' wonderful intellect. What about farmers and our country homes? Should not the country make the city? If all Kansas' intellect is centered in the cities we think it high time some of it would get out on the beautiful prairies and improve and make beautiful country homes.

I for one do not enjoy riding ten miles in a lumber wagon with a calico dress to be seated in the back part of an aristocratic congregation. But perhaps I am a naughty farmer's wife.

We of middle age have been taught from early childhood to set our mark high and strive to reach it. We now believe it to be right. Give us the reforms which are demanded by the People's party and we will first pay off the mortgage on our homes, for "He that provideth not for his own household is worse than an infidel." Then we will pay our preachers, build churches and once more be a happy and prosperous people.

With success to the FARMER'S WIFE. I am truly,

A FARMER'S WIFE.

WOMAN'S ALLIANCE.

Report of the Work Done in Chicago. Abuses Investigated—The Condition of the Laboring Man Examined—Child Labor in the City—Children Made to Lie About Their Ages—Older Employees Do the Same Thing, Feeking the Anger of the Boss or the Foreman.

The following report of the activity of the Illinois Woman's alliance for the past year, is submitted by Mrs. T. J. Morgan:

The Woman's alliance was organized in November, 1888, by the Woman's Federal Labor Union, and with the exception of the Trades Assembly, the bodies represented therein are exclusively women's organizations, of which there are twenty-three at the present time in the alliance. The special work of the alliance is the protection of women and children in the various relations of industrial and social life, and in this work the activities of the alliance include the school, the tenement house, the factory, the store, the hospital, the asylum, the poor house, the police stations, the justice courts, the bridewell, the jail, the state legislature, the county board, the board of education, the city council and the various departments of the city government. During the past three years, the members of the alliance with unselfish and unflagging zeal, have given their best energies to the good work, for which the alliance was organized.

The members of the Woman's Federal Labor union, including your delegates, have been especially active in important committees and official work of the organization. In addition to the very important work of stimulating public opinion in favor of justice to women and children many abuses in our public institutions have been laid bare to the public gaze, the consequent agitation resulting in their abatement or abolition. In regard to education and child labor the Woman's alliance has proved itself far more active and effective than the trade and labor unions.

Through the efforts of the alliance the educational laws of the state have been improved and the laws more strictly enforced. Truant officers have taken thousands of children from the streets and placed them in the schools.

Female factory inspectors have been appointed at the request of the alliance, and their work promises to bring about valuable and permanent improvements in the environment of the wage-workers of Chicago, and tends to render the employment of children under 14 years of age unprofitable, if not wholly impossible. Moreover, through the organization and activity of the alliance, a more intimate knowledge of the conditions under which females and children are forced to work in the industrial and commercial hives of the city has not only been obtained by its members, but through them the organization they represent and the general public have derived a clearer comprehension of that greatest of all questions, the labor question.

The investigations of the alliance have also added further proof that low wages and the general unfavorable conditions of employment are the primal cause of prostitution and crime, and that out of the very helplessness of the victims of industrial conditions. The police force and justice courts have become so corrupted that instead of protective forces the representatives of the majesty of the law grow rich on the earnings of those forced into prostitution by low wages.

The chairman of your delegation during the past week visited several industrial establishments in company with Mrs. Owens, a recently appointed factory inspector, whose special duty it is to prevent the employment of children under 14 years of age. The visit of the inspectors are resented by the employers as a trespass upon their vested rights, and it was plainly manifest that this very respectable class, who shudder at the mere name of anarchists, have no respect whatever for the law which interferes with their financial interests, even though the law be to protect the mental and physical health of little children. One of the common methods adopted to violate the law being to teach the children to lie respecting their age, the condition of their parents, and their attendance at school. The efforts of the children to carry out their instructions, in some instances, being comical in the extreme, while the effect upon their moral character is a matter of very painful reflection. The same deplorable influence was made manifest in our efforts to secure information from older employees regarding wages, hours of labor, and especially as to accidents to children and other employees. Our inquiries were met with silence or evasion, the displeasure of the master or foreman being more feared than falsehood or physical injury.

The debasing effect on our industrial system upon both employers and workers, is brought out with startling distinctness by the efforts made to enforce the laws passed for the protection of the wage class. The greatest good could be done by the Woman's alliance if workmen and workingwomen would furnish its members with information regarding the conditions in their respected places of employment, and by the persistent demand of the labor unions for the enforcement of the laws.

Mrs. T. J. Morgan holds a peculiar position in Chicago as the champion of the rights of women and children. She is an Englishwoman and has always belonged to the ranks of the toilers. In addition to being a model housekeeper and rearing a family, she finds time every week to visit factories and shops where women and children are employed. To record the reforms she has secured would fill a closely printed column. She does this work without compensation, and holds no official position, preferring to work as a private individual. She is a very unassuming woman, and can seldom be persuaded to speak in public. Yet her deeds speak for themselves and entitle her to a place among the progressive women of our time.

What Can American Women Do for the People's Party?

BY MRS. MARY M. CLARDY.

When the English and Irish people, half a century since, were dying of starvation, and manufacturers were crippled by the high tariff—most especially the tariff on breadstuffs—then arose Richard Cobden and John Bright, the mighty captains of the free trade army. To their help came the British maids and matrons, under the leadership of Margaret Bright. After years of struggle the corn laws were repealed, to the prosperity of all interests in the United Kingdom. Pauperism and crime have greatly decreased. British commerce since '42 has increased by leaps and bounds. The amount in 1840 of exports and imports was £123,312,000. In 1890, the amount was £748,000,000, over six hundred per cent increase. The wages of operatives have been doubled, and the number of incomes less than $500 a year, has been very largely increased, proving the tendency of free trade to equalize the distribution of wealth.

But the glorious free trade doctrines had to be learned by English women, taught at the English fireside, to the youthful voter at his mother's knee, before it could hold a permanent place in English law.

So, in America, the anti-usury doctrines, the necessity of governmental ownership of railroads and telegraphs, and the world-wide justice of free trade, must be taught by our American mothers, at American firesides, before the present unrighteous decrees restricting trade, can be purged from our national law, and be replaced by the statutes of impartial justice, written in golden letters, for the prosperity of generations to come.

The National Woman's alliance proposes to do just this very work. These ladies propose the most thorough self-culture concerning political economy. Then they propose to hold neighborhood meetings at their school houses and churches, with music, dialogues and debates. County gatherings will follow, for the instruction of the people on the questions to be settled at the ballot-box next November.

In defence of the home and child, these ladies propose to teach the doctrines of the People's party, and labor for such a victorious expression at the polls as will forever bury usury and unjust taxation.

The National Woman's alliance was chartered at Topeka, Kas., in September, 1891.

Its officers are: Mrs. Fannie McCormick, of Great Bend, Kas., president; Mrs. Emma D. Pack, of Topeka, secretary; Mrs. Bina G. Otis, Washington, D. C., treasurer. Amongst its vice presidents there may be mentioned Mrs. S. E. V. Emery, of Michigan; Mrs. A. L. Diggs, of District of Columbia; Mrs. Eleonora Goodrich, of Des Moines, Ia.; Mrs. Marion Todd, of Illinois; Mrs. Mary E. Lease, of Kansas.

Mrs. Senator Peffer is a member of its executive committee.

Mrs. Mary M. Clardy, of Texas, has been appointed as its national organizer and lecturer.

During April, May and June, all applications for her services should be addressed to the secretary, Mrs. Emma D. Pack, at Topeka, Kas.

A constitution and by-laws for local alliances can be had of the secretary. Two copies for five cents, and five copies for ten cents, forty copies for fifty cents.

THE FARMER'S WIFE has been chosen as the organ of the Woman's alliance. It is an eight-page monthly, at 50 cents a year, or 25 cents for sixth months. It is printed at Topeka, Kas. Mrs. Emma D. Pack is its editress.

Closes April 30th.

The offer of the publishers of the Weekly Missouri World to send that excellent People's party newspaper and educator for three months (13 issues) for ten cents, will close April 30th. Send for it for yourself and do a little missionary work by getting others to take it. It will in a short time re-publish Senator Peffer's grand speech in the senate on the land loan bill. Stamps taken. Silver dime may be sent. Sample copy free. Address The Missouri World, Chillicothe, Mo.

We shall be glad to receive accounts of Woman's alliance work at all times. We hope that hundreds of ladies will order copies of our constitution and by-laws for local alliances. Organize at once and begin the work of educating public opinion aright on political economy. In another column you will find out, "What American women can now do to help the People's party."

Men who itch for office are always badly scratched when voting time comes around.

For severe cold on the lungs use the following excellent remedy: A teaspoonful of strained honey, and half teaspoonful of olive oil and the juice of one lemon. Cook all together and take one teaspoonful every two hours.

Never wash your rolling pin. Scrape off the dough that adheres and wipe with a dry towel.

The Bondholder.

Michigan Patriot.

I am an honest shlyook and with the shlyooks stand.
My bonds are in my pocket, my scissors in my hand.
I live in princely fashion, with nothing else to do
But cut my little coupons as fast as they are due.
Go on ye stupid farmers, who labor while we sleep,
Who grow the golden harvest that we may crop and reap.
Go on and on your taxes, in storm, and heat, and cold,
And Uncle Sam will give us the lion's share in gold.
You have no time from labor, at labor's wrong to glance,
You've no right to meddle with questions of finance;
Twas yours to do the fighting and now to pay the tax,
'Tis yours to keep the burden forever on your backs.
You should not be ambitious and ever keep in view,
That it's a lowly station that God has called you to.
Go do our will, and guard you from aspirations rash,
We'll fill each public office, and take your surplus cash.
Don't leave that good old party beneath whose rule so long,
We've the right to dictate, join not the Alliance throng,
For they are vile communists, our fund they fain would share,
And make too much paper money, of all their schemes beware.
We have made it lawful, such vermin to destroy;
As we destroy the money, so I will be peace and joy,
An empire soon shall follow, and all in our grand ring
Shall wear lordly titles and gold shall be our king.

STILL THEY COME.

Congressman Thomas E. Winn, of the Ninth Georgia District, Joins the People's Party.

People's Party Paper.

The Hon. Thomas E. Winn, member of congress from the Ninth district, has declared for the People's party, and gives his reason as follows:

"I deem it my duty as the representative of the people of the Ninth district of Georgia who have delegated the duty to me for the time being of representing them in the house of representatives, to state to them candidly and unreservedly the situation of affairs with regard to remedial legislation, which they have demanded at the hands of congress. As a faithful watchman and guardian of their interests, I deem it necessary to give them a candid statement of the situation, and what can be reasonably expected at the hands of congress.

"I state to you now, as I have on previous occasions, that in my opinion the financial question is the great and overshadowing question before the American people, and through its rightful solution the people look for that relief which they so much need, and in which they are so deeply interested. The first measure reported to congress looking to financial reform, and which has been discussed, was the bill for remonetization or free coinage of silver, known as the Bland bill. To that bill I gave my hearty support in a speech delivered on the 22d of March. I favored the bill not as a remedy, by any means, for the evils which effect the people, but because I consider it a step in the right direction, and would indicate the purpose of the democratic party to meet the demands of the people in the line of financial reform.

"I had confidently expected that the great democratic majority—amounting to about 150—could be confidently looked to to fulfill its promises to the people to successfully and satisfactorily grapple with all these great questions and solve them in the interest of the people, but I am compelled to state to you candidly that from their action on this bill, the people cannot expect any relief on the line of reform.

"If the present house, with its overwhelming majority, ignores the great financial questions, which it has done by the defeat of the Bland silver bill, with its slightest concessions towards financial reform, it can well be imagined what its action will be on the demand of the people for the abolition of national banks and the issue of treasury notes sufficient to raise the per capita circulation to $50, as our people are demanding. What favorable action can be expected on our subtreasury bill, or the loan of money by the government on farm products?

I must confess to you I see no indication on the part of the house of representatives to make a single concession to the people on the line of their demands, and it is with sorrow that I have to admit the fact, because I have believed that all the needed reforms would come through the democratic party in time.

"I did not expect that all our demands would be obtained at once, because all reform in our national legislation moves slowly. In the light of recent developments, I cannot close my eyes to the fact that the money power of this country absolutely controls both political parties of the east, and there is no possible hope of that wing of the party giving the people any relief. Indeed, I can see no difference between the eastern democrats and the eastern republicans on this financial issue.

"In view of these facts, if our people decide that it is necessary for us to act independently of the national democratic party in order to obtain those demands, I stand ready to go with my people, and say in the language of Ruth to Naomi, 'Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee. For whither thou goest I will go; and where thou lodgest I will lodge. Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried. The Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part me and thee.'"

SCRIPTURE LESSON

For May for the Local Woman's Alliance.

Psalms 72, 1-20, "Christ's Kingdom." This Psalm was written more than a thousand years before the birth of Christ. It clearly describes the Carpenter of Nazareth with his humble associates. In seven different phrases, as a judge, he is represented as delivering the children of the needy and the poor. Also, it is declared that "he shall break in pieces the oppressor," and "redeem the soul of the poor and needy from deceit and violence."

All nations are to call Him blessed. Nothing can better tend to unite the different sections of our country, and bind us with cords of love to foreign nations, than the putting away of usury. The opening of the highways of travel and freight to the widest use of our people, and the giving of our farmers free trade, or a right to sell and buy in any market of the entire world.

The golden rule "shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth."

Please read this Psalm over each day for one week and compare it with the planks of the People's party.

At your weekly meeting please make it a study. M. M. CLARKE, Nat'l Organ'r Woman's Alliance. Topeka, Kas.

Editor's Association.

The editors of the reform papers of the Third Congressional district met at Cherryvale, last Saturday, and organized a district association. H. C. Sourbeer, of Parsons, was elected president, and W. H. Nation, of Erie, secretary. The congressional outlook was fully discussed and the reports from the several counties in the district showed conclusively that the next congressman from that district will be a People's party man.

The names of the papers represented were the Free Press, Winfield; Dispatch, Arkansas City; Fair Play, Arkansas City; Lance, Sedan; Broad Acre, Coffeyville; Herald, Fredonia; World, Parsons; Statesman, Oswego; Sentinel, Erie; Western Herald, Girard; Kansas, Pittsburg; Modern Light, Columbus; Citizen, Howard.

FOGHORN FUNSTON

Creates an Awful Uproar in the House.

CLEARING HIS OWN RECORD.

At the Expense of the United States—A Bull in a China Shop.

WASHINGTON, April 8.—When the house met yesterday, Mr. Cobb, of Alabama, from the committee on elections, submitted the minority report on the Noyes-Rockwell contested election case, and it was ordered printed.

Mr. Wilson, of West Virginia, then took the floor to close the debate on the free wool bill.

At the close of Mr. Wilson's speech the free wool bill was put on final passage, and was passed, 192 to 60—a strict party vote.

Mr. Funston, of Kansas, rising to a question of privilege, sent to the clerk's desk, and had read, an article published in the New York Voice, which for ten minutes kept the house in a whirlwind of laughter and merriment. The article, which is headed, "A Few of the Congressional Tipplers," goes on to mention the names of a dozen or more senators, and an equal number of representatives who at the senate and house restaurants have been seen indulging in intoxicating liquors. His (Mr. Funston's) name was one of those mentioned, and he believed that the article was intended to affect the primaries and his district. [Laughter.] Thousand of copies were circulated in his district, and it was intended to greatly injure him. He desired to brand the article, so far as it concerned him, as an infamous lie. He had never taken anything at the capitol bar-room that would intoxicate even a child.

He then read an affidavit from the proprietor of the restaurant and bar-room that Funston had never taken intoxicants of any kind in his place.

The democrats, who look upon Mr. Funston as a little cranky upon the prohibition question, were inclined to look upon the whole matter as a good joke, and interrupted him a number of times with funny remarks. The reading of the affidavit from the proprietor of the bar was greeted with cheers and roars of laughter, and Mr. Day, of Ohio, suggested that Mr. Funston be given leave to print 5,000 copies of this certificate of character for distribution in his district.

But Mr. Funston gave them to understand that it was no laughter with him. "I denounce the correspondent of the Voice as a liar, a slanderer, and a destroyer of character," continued Mr. Funston, "and no gentleman would for a few dollars loan himself to any newspaper for the purpose of defaming honorable men."

When Mr. Funston had finished, at least half a dozen other men mentioned in the article were on their feet asking for recognition.

"Take them in alphabetical order," exclaimed Mr. Boutelle, of Maine. But by this time the confusion had grown so great that the speaker was powerless to preserve order. A dozen members were yelling to the speaker at the top of their voices. On the democratic side, where the whole affair was regarded as a huge joke, the members were doing their best to laugh it off, and without any effort to obtain recognition from the speaker, continued to direct mirthful and insulting remarks at Mr. Funston.

Finally Amos Cummings, of New York, who had been mentioned in the article, got the floor and said he had no memory of the circumstances related in the Voice and that he was at that time sick in his room.

Mr. Scott, of Illinois, another member mentioned by the Voice, said that the article was a lie so far as he was concerned. Mr. Cochran, of New York, and Mr. Milliken, of Maine, also denied it.

Mr. Fellows, of New York, also mentioned, said that in behalf of the correspondent of the Voice, he would say that the article was true, for he was built that way.

Mr. Hatch, of Missouri, said that several senators and members mentioned in the article did not have an opportunity to defend themselves, and he moved that all names in the article, except Mr. Funston's, be expunged from the record. Mr. Caruth, of Kentucky, favored this because the other members had not had a chance to get affidavits.

Mr. Burrows, of Michigan, moved as an amendment to exclude the entire article from the record.

This brought Mr. Funston to his feet, and in an excited manner he demanded that he be heard. Notwithstanding his repeated calls, and in a voice that could have been heard almost half a mile away, the speaker refused to notice him.

The previous question was moved and ordered, while Mr. Funston pranced excitedly up and down the aisle, screaming to be heard. The democratic members yelled to him to sit down, but Mr. Funston would not be downed, and continued to demand recognition of the speaker.

After the previous question had been ordered, and all debate cut off, Mr. Burrows asked unanimous consent for Mr. Funston to have five minutes to address the house, but Mr. Seely, of Connecticut, objected.

The motion to expunge the article from the records was then adopted, and Mr. Burrows again asked the unanimous consent for Mr. Funston to speak, but objection was again raised.

Mr. Funston was determined, however, to have his say, and again rose to a question of privilege. He said: "I want to say that in striking out this paragraph you leave me suspended with my remarks having no possible basis upon which to stand. I ask if this house has no rights, and its members no privileges, no personal character, no honor which is to be respected by some foul thing called the correspondent of an obscene paper? That is a question to be decided here to-day. Here is a paper holding itself up as a great moralist of the country. It is a representative of what is called the prohibition party, a great temperance advocate, and yet it hires a low down, dirty skunk to come here and falsely represent men as down in the saloon in the basement of this house."

Mr. McMillen, of Tennessee: "I think that the gentleman from Kansas has no right to make the records of this house the sewer through which to carry his vituperative language."

Mr. Funston continuing: "I think that paper has been made to serve as a sewer to carry the filth that has been gathered by a miserable sneak and liar, here in the capital of the nation, and it is in defense of myself, who have been chucked into these sewers, that I am making a defense. [Laughter.] I say to you that I have not a word to say against newspaper men personally. As a rule they are honorable men, but here is a dishonorable man, who abuses his privilege as correspondent, and correspondents ought to kick him down the back stairs out of Washington for their own credit."

Mr. Lomis, of Georgia: "Do you know whether this was a woman who wrote this article, or not?" [Laughter.]

Mr. Funston: "It makes no difference whether she is a lady or anybody else, as far as I am concerned. I am standing here to-day in defense of my character and the defense of my own family."

With this remark the discussion was brought to a close.

The hair coming out can be obviated by a mixture of bay rum, cantharides castor oil and carbonate of ammonia rubbed into the roots twice a week.

SOME RECENT EVENTS

OTSEGO'S FAIR FORTY.

HOW MICHIGAN WOMEN BUILT A LIBRARY.

Having Exhausted All Commercial Means, and Being Still in Arrears, They Resort to Schemes Picturesque and Unique and Square the Account.

Woman's Way.

According to Otsego, Mich., correspondence in the Chicago Tribune, the town of Otsego the other night took a step in putting on metropolitan airs. For some time past there have been intimations that Otsego is not the slow-going, every-day town through which travelers pass and forget.

Up to date whatever heights the town has reached is due to the unique energies of the women. The climax of these energies was reached when the forty women who went into schemes a short time ago to raise money to pay for the library building that is just completed met their husbands, sisters, cousins, and neighbors in the town hall and told them how each did her work.

To go back to the beginning. A year ago the women of Otsego concluded to build a library building, where they could go and read or get books to take home. Their husbands and brothers took the newspapers, and were contented with that channel of information. The women of Otsego are credited with being a little more literary in their tastes than the women of any other town of its size. It is said that most of them write for the papers and magazines and paint and sing, while a few of them are linguists.

The town contains 2,000 people. It has two big paper mills, a chair factory, and is 150 miles from Ann Arbor; within an hour's run of Kalamazoo, and about the same distance from Grand Rapids. It has more rich men who do nothing for their town than any two-thousand town in the West.

The women moved to the front and raised the money to build a pretty $2,000 structure which is known as the Ladies' Library Association of Otsego.

The money, or the big end of it, was raised by various methods.

There were socials, and dances, and festivals, and concerts, and lawn parties, and church committees, and citizens' committees, and so on until nearly enough was in bank to pay for the little building which is now complete and furnished, but which as yet has not a volume in it. All this was done by the efforts of Otsego women. Of course (?) some of the money was paid by the men folks.

When the last of the furnishings of the L. L. A. were put in the association found that they lacked just $40 to cancel all obligations. But where were they to get it? They had planned and carried out every scheme known to the ingenuity of the sex.

One day two of the members, unmarried, and out of their teens, were in the store of Mr. Mills, whose wife, by the way, is President of the Library Association, and they were talking about the arrears of $40. Mr. Mills has probably heard as much about the Library Association as any man in town, and being of a sunny temperament he said to the two ladies referred to that he guessed the society would have to raise the residue of money by organizing kissing societies.

One of the ladies asked him how much he would give to every woman who would kiss him for the library fund. Mills said he would give five cents for each osculation. The offer was not cold before two lips were puckered before him, and he came to time and paid in his nickel. "Next!" responded Miss Maggie Smith, the woman who had been kissed, and her friend advanced with lips aglow, received an impression and a nickel and backed out.

This sort of news travels faster than electric currents. In less than an hour it was all over town.

The man who owns the two paper mills in Otsego is a Mr. Bardeen. He is one of the millionaires of the place. As soon as he heard what Mills was doing he raised him, with the amendment that Mills was doing it for advertising his store, and that he, Bardeen, would pay 50 cents to every woman who would come to the paper factory and be kissed by him.

The tide was turned from Mills' store Bardeen's factory. Mills put up the cry of "foul" on the ground that Bardeen was a citizen of Kalamazoo, but Bardeen's money overcame the cry. In all probability Bardeen would have soon contributed, as per agreement, the necessary amount had not a protest come up from Kalamazoo, to which were added several protests from Otsego. Some of the young men of this place saw their sweethearts going to the paper factory, and it is said they informed him that he had better confine his kisses to Kalamazoo society.

Then several of the women of the city came down to business. Mrs. Mills, Mrs. H. L. Miller, Mrs. P. W. Travis, Miss Maggie White, Miss Hattie Mitchell, Mrs. George Easton, Miss Alice Creyant, Mrs. C. W. Edsell, Mrs. A. D. Baker, Mrs. C. E. Drew, Mrs. Frank Lindsey, and Miss Matie Beard said they would be so many of a party of forty to raise $1 each to pay off the last indebtedness on the building.

Forty Otsego women reported for duty and went to work, and each earned her dollar, and the jubilee the other night was for the purpose of giving each one of the forty an opportunity of telling to the audience her experience in making a dollar. Some of these schemes were unique. Miss Maggie Smith, Secretary of the association and editor of the Otsego Union, bandaged the arm of a young law student who had been stabbed with a pair of shears. She described her treatment and the effect.

Mrs. Mills, wife of the merchant who kissed at 5 cents per kiss, took a mop and step-ladder and washed windows at 20 cents a window.

Mrs. P. W. Travis, Treasurer, and Mrs. H. L. Miller hired a hand-organ and stood on the corners, one playing while the other passed the tin cup, the collections ranging from a penny up to ten cents. Their success would have been quicker if the organ had not been one of the "Annie Rooney" vintage.

Miss Hattie Mitchell made her dollar splitting kindling wood. Mrs. George Easton blacked boots. Miss Creyant sold a spring poem to the editor for a dollar. She probably had harder work than any of her sisters. Mrs. Edsell and Mrs. Baker sold shoe strings and doughnuts from house to house, and Miss Beard, dressed as an Irish peasant girl, sold green emblems on the streets on St. Patrick's Day. Miss Smith also went out as a beggar, and Mrs. Drew and Mrs. Lindsey "played the organ," also, on the back streets. Mrs. Miller put the trimmings on a coffin. A bevy of young ladies went around doing odd jobs, one washing a milk wagon in the old-fashioned way, while two others went to the hotel to sew buttons on the clothes of any travelers whose raiment needed anything of the kind. One pulled a splinter out of a commercial drummer's finger, for which he paid $1.

These experiences were all vividly related by the ladies at an entertainment in the town hall, when all Otsego and many from Kalamazoo and other surrounding towns were present.

The Otsego women have given many valuable pointers to their sisters throughout the country, and it is possible that the church festival oyster may now go into innocuous desuetude, while more unique if not pleasing methods are employed to entice the slippery dime.

TRIUMPH OF ENGINEERING.

Magnificent New Railroad Bridge Over the Pecos River, in Texas.

The great high bridge of the Southern Pacific Railroad over the Pecos River, near Shumla, Texas, is now practically completed, the work yet to be done being the driving of about two thousand rivets. It is the third highest bridge in the world, and is by several feet the highest in the United States, being twenty-six feet higher than the great Kinzua viaduct on the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railway. The Pecos bridge, or viaduct, is 2,180 feet long and 328 feet above the surface of the stream. It consists of forty-eight spans in all. They are nearly all iron-plate girders, alternately thirty-five feet and sixty-five feet long. In the center of the bridge, immediately above the bed of the river, is a cantilever span 185 feet long. The high structure is supported by towers, which rest upon stone ledges or rock piers. The dimension of the towers at their base is 35 by 100 feet, but they narrow down to 10 by 35 feet at the top.

The lightness of the structure gives it a spider-web appearance, but it is pronounced by practical engineers and railroad men as being one of the most substantial bridges in the country. The flooring is twenty-one feet wide, giving room for a single track and two narrow footways. The bridge was thoroughly tested as the work progressed, and it is claimed the short spans will carry two and a half tons to the lineal foot, and the longer ones two tons to the lineal foot.

THE CITY OF THE FLOOD.

The Cemetery and the Flood Monument at Johnstown.

Two representatives of an Eastern newspaper spent a day in flood-famed Johnstown, Pa., recently, and were amazed at the wonderful progress made toward restoration since the terrible devastating flood, on May 31, 1889, three years ago. New residences, new stores, new hotels, and new or restored manufactories meet the eye everywhere. Perhaps the most realistic reminder of the disaster which wiped out nearly 4,000 lives in a single afternoon is the Grand View Cemetery. One may read on hundreds of stones and monuments the familiar words: "Died May 31, 1889," and it is not uncommon to find the graves of whole families side by side, the monument telling the sad story of that day of wholesale death. A large section of Grand View is given up to the graves of the unknown dead, to whose memory nearly 800 headstones are erected. In the cemetery is also being erected a handsome monument, surmounted by figures representing Faith, Hope and Charity. The monument will be 23 feet high; cost about $6,000, and is built from the residue of the relief fund, which a sympathetic world poured upon the afflicted city during those awful days succeeding the flood.

is one of the wealthiest men in the United States, although still young in the years of middle life and a poor man not many years ago. His residence, which is in New York, is under the observation of one of a corps of private policemen every moment of the day and night, to protect him from the attention of "cranks." He is an earnest member of the Baptist denomination, and gives liberally to struggling churches belonging to it.

A Fine Prisoner.

Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, was arrested at Munich recently, for the first time in his life, while visiting his daughter, Archduchess Gisela, who is married to Prince Leopold of Bavaria, and who resides in that city. His Majesty, who was not in uniform, happened to walk on the grass while crossing the garden to the palace, when he heard a gruff voice cry:

"Are you going to get off of that or not?"

The Emperor, not supposing that the remark was addressed to him, walked on until he was roughly seized by the arm by a one-armed park guard.

"Am I to speak twice?" the guard demanded furiously. "You're arrested. Come right along to the guard-house!"

The Emperor, with an inward smile, accompanied his captor. As they passed along, the spectators, astonished at the extraordinary spectacle, uncovered their heads; but the old guard was too angry to notice this, and it was not until they met Baron Malsen, one of the dignitaries of the Bavarian Court, that the stubborn old fellow realized what he had done.

"Your Majesty," exclaimed the Baron, "what does this mean?"

On hearing the word "majesty," the guard dropped the Emperor's arm and began to tremble from head to foot.

"That's all right," said the Emperor, laughing. "You have only done your duty, though not in a very gentle way. Have you been a soldier?"

"For forty years, Your Majesty," stammered the guard, "and I have been wounded in three campaigns."

"You are too old for a park guard," rejoined the Emperor. "If you will present yourself to the master of the household to-morrow, I will see that you receive a more comfortable berth as one of the doorkeepers of the palace."

The old fellow's eyes filled with tears as he saluted and withdrew, muttering:

"Mercy, what a fine prisoner!"

IS NOT ALWAYS HAPPY.

THE LOT OF THE FASHIONABLE WOMAN.

Prevailing Modes Are Often Not Adapted to Her Figure—A Few Charming Indoor Toilets—The Bengaline Reception Dress.

New York Letter.

FASHIONABLE woman's lot is not always a happy one by any means, though, as Hamlet says, by your smiling you seem to say so, writes Shirley Dare, from New York. For instance, she may have a luxuriant growth of hair, and by the prevailing mode be obliged to wear it tight to her head; she may have a dumpy little figure, and therefore see herself forced to forego the pleasure of wearing the princess gown—such a thing of grace on a tall slender woman; or she may have a charming little figure and yet suffer the mortification of seeing it lost in one of the very modish loose jackets made up in coaching style, and which are so extremely becoming to the tall and robust woman of the English type. But what is she to do? One of these jackets, which are made up with whole hacks, adjusted across the shoulders but falling in a species of wide box-pleat below, is now indispensable to the woman of fashion. Of course they must be tailor-made in every sense of the word, and they usually run in drab, fawn, or tan box cloth, with large horn buttons and facings of velvet of a somewhat deeper hue. But the woman who looks well on the street is not always so fortunate in the drawing-room, and vice versa. In fact, many women are too tall and too stout for the pinched-up packing-box affair called a modern home. She has the appearance of a grand piano in a small flat, and now it is that her slight and more gracefully built sister comes in for her triumph.

BENGALINE RECEPTION DRESS.

I have some charming indoor toilets to show you. Take the one in my initial illustration; nothing could be more suggestive of that repose and ease so necessary to the drawing-room. Its material is a golden-yellow bengaline, trimmed with ribbons and lace. The dress is princess form and hooks down the front, the first dart being only in the lining and the second in both lining and stuff. The sleeves are made up on fitted linings and the deep cuffs are of lace. The side and back pieces are also cut princess and the latter must have fullness enough to produce the cascading pleat of silk shown on the left, and reaching up to the neck.

My second illustration presents another view of this charming reception gown. The collarette in Venetian point is gathered at the neck. It is pointed over the bust and diminishes toward the shoulders and then forms the Watteau folds at the back. On the right the lace is separated from the shoulder by a rosette bunch of black ribbon, a continuation of the straight collar from the back of which it descends to the slope of the waist cascade-wise. The centre is sewed on one side and hooked on the other.

I should draw your attention to the fact that all soft and clinging materials will be made up this season without gorges, and either be drawn to the figure by bias cutting or also strained across the bust to fit plainly and then pinched into the figure at the waist. That is, the fit will be attained by making use of very small and tightly drawn pleats.

MAUVE PRINCESS, SILVER-TRIMMED.

Velvet promises to be very modish for trimming, both as appliques and also for narrow borders edged with fine silk guimp, and velvet corsages are likewise much affected for reception gowns. In my third illustration I set before you one of these stylish garments in Russian green, with a centre set off with gold spangles. This fancy waist has crenelated basques at the back and double fronts hooking in the middle. The under front is in light-green satin mervilleux, or you may make use of surah, pleated very fine in the style of undergarments, and above this there is a chemisette of guimp or lace made up on silk lining, sewed on one side and fastened on the other with small gold pins stuck into the gold galloon which serves as trimming for the top and bottom of the corselet and for the collar and revers. The guimp front is run with a silk cord, which is tied in the middle, and the galloon is also set off with bows of fringed gold in the middle. The revers are faced with light-green silk. The back and sides are slit up to within four inches below the waist and lined with light-green silk. The sleeves are of the silk material covered with silk muslin of the same color and caught in front with passementerie agraffes, like those which ornament the corselet.

In my fourth illustration you will find pictured a very pretty indoor toilet, suitable for dinner or reception, made up in mauve crepe de chine, mauve being one of the most modish colors of the season. This gown is trimmed with silver galloon, producing a lovely effect, and should be made princess over a mauve mervilleux.

WHITE SILK DINNER DRESS.

leux. The crepe de chine is simply stretched over the back and side pieces, but the center seam of the back must be very bias, so as to make the trail fall gracefully, and the other parts of the skirt must also be cut bias. The bottom of the train should be lined with muslin laid between the silk lining and the mervilleux. For the left side you cut the bust gorges in the material and the lining, but you simply bring the right over and drape it on a form. On this side the gore is only cut in the lining. The front of the skirt has three rows of the silver galloon, and the cascade drapery and the bottom of the skirt is bordered with small silver fringe. The sleeves are draped as indicated, rounded at the bottom with fringed border and caught up with an ornament in silver passementerie.

In my last illustration you will find portrayed an exquisite dinner gown in white silk, ornamented with bows of moss velvet. It consists of an embroidered front and a redingote with train, made princess style. The corsage is pointed in front, from which the redingote is cut flaringly away. The sleeves of the embroidery are in gold and the berries in silver. The embroidered front is ornamented with a white silk muslin ruffle, garnished with bows of moss velvet connected together. The front is gored over the hips and made full enough so as not to be visible under the redingote. The sleeves are made up over fitted linings and are very full at the top, so as to form folds. The revers are embroidered. The cut-out is set off with a bertha of silk muslin gathered and ornamented on the shoulders with flat bows of green ribbon,

HOME AND THE FARM.

A DEPARTMENT MADE UP FOR OUR RURAL FRIENDS.

Disadvantage of Trying to Accomplish Too Much—Device for Loading and Unloading Grain—Stunted Pigs Not Worth Feeding—Orchard and Garden.

Too Many Irons in the Fire.

Webb Donnell, in the American Agriculturist.

The farm was taken in a run-down condition, with buildings small and poor, and fields so poor that they only yielded some twenty-five tons of hay. At the present time the place cuts about one hundred and twenty-five tons of first-class hay. The fields are a delight to the eye in their fertility and smoothness. The barn has been enlarged to probably four times its former size, with comfortable and convenient quarters for about thirty to forty hogs and pigs, twenty cows, and eight or ten horses. A silo of eighty tons capacity was put in last year. Butter is made from the herd of grade and full-blood Jerseys, which sells at quite an advance on market rate. A large orchard has been planted, which calls for a great expenditure of care and time. Quite a large area is sowed to grain which, with the other crops that are raised, calls for a still further expenditure of labor. A saw-mill near at hand has been leased, and business is being carried on here. A beginning has been made in raising heavy draft horses, by crossing a pure-bred Percheron on heavy mares. I found the proprietor in a very gloomy frame of mind, but hard at work. He had about come to the conclusion that farming does not pay—that he had to work like a slave, but received nothing for it. Even as he spoke, however, he would sandwich in the remark, as the conversation turned to various things, that he intended soon to build a new barn, and go into sheep-raising, or that he should soon build another silo. It was easy to understand why the man was discouraged. I wonder that he did not see it himself. He has too many irons in the fire, and is trying to do too much on a small capital. His dairy product must pay well, but every cent that comes from it as profit is put into some new scheme, or spent in enlarging an old one. This keeps the farmer cramped for money all the time, and also keeps him worked to the verge of desperation. There is something very attractive about doing business on a large scale, and it may be profitable in certain cases where capital is abundant so that advantage can be taken in buying and selling, but it is simply suicide for the average farmer, of limited means, to spread himself all over a 400-acre farm here in the East.

The man of whom I write could probably make a good thing by dairying if he would attend to that solely, and he would moreover then have time to breathe and to inquire of himself whether it pays to make a beast of burden of one's self through life, getting only a living out of it, simply for the sake of doing a large business. He would much better mark out a particular line of work for which his farm is suited, and which he knows will pay a fair profit, and let his work all count for something. The merchant who, with limited means, tries to run a dry goods store, a grocery stand, a book store, and a boot and shoe emporium, usually goes into bankruptcy. Farming will stand a pretty serious kind of mismanagement, and still give a family a living, such as it is, but the business won't admit too much foolishness. The man who tries to carry on sheep-raising, horse-raising, orcharding, hog-raising, cattle-raising, dairying, and the growing of field crops, in addition to various outside schemes of money-making, attempting to do a large part of the actual work by employing his own waking hours and those of his wife and children, is making a serious mistake. He may keep from going under with all his schemes, and in some cases may even increase the value of his stock, farm, and buildings, but he does it at the expense of his own and his family's well-being. No man has a right, unless he is peculiarly situated so that he is forced by necessity, to work to such an extent as to deprive himself of so many of the civilizing enjoyments of life, much less has he the right to deprive his family of them.

Of all people in the world the farmer and his family ought to lead comfortable lives, but a good many come far short of it, and too often through their own folly. They either farm ignorantly, or are striving all the time to do more than their capital, or their strength, will admit. It would be a good deal better in such cases as the last mentioned to take in some of the sail and pay more attention to the steering apparatus, so that the craft won't "wobble" about so, and thus lose headway, to use a figurative expression. Attention to details is a matter of very great importance in agriculture as well as elsewhere, and this cannot be given when one has too many irons in the fire.

Spout for Handling Grain.

Take a board 10 inches wide and four feet long for bottom of spout and part of hopper; also, two pieces, 10 inches wide and 18 inches long, to complete bottom of hopper. Then fasten together well by nailing cross-pieces to bottom. This leaves 1½ feet for hopper, and 2½ feet for spout. Put on end piece, then side piece, 3 inches wide at small end, then 7 inches wide at large end. The middle piece to which spout is fastened, is 14 by 30 inches. For unloading, fasten chains to hopper, 8 inches from end, and drive nails to hook upper end to. As bin fills up, move up by putting boards in place under the hopper, and shortening chains. For loading wagon, put hopper inside of bin and fasten up with stick or board. Use heavy tin pail instead of scoop and you will find that you can handle a load of grain in less time, with less waste and less muscle than any way you ever tried. Hopper can be used at any ordinary granary door.—Will Zimmerman, in Practical Farmer.

Spout for Handling Grain.

Live stock and dairy.

Stunted Pigs.

A pig that is stunted while young is not worth feeding to maturity. This is especially true of pigs farrowed late in the fall, and with which sufficient care has not been taken to give them a good start before cold weather. The feed that will be required to keep such until spring will be worth more than the pigs. Much the best practice, and one that is being more generally adopted every year, is to breed the sows in the fall so as to start the pigs off on green food in the spring. This is much more economical, and the pigs are pretty sure to do better; but if you are in for the winter feeding of a lot now, try and do it well. It is best to give some slop or ensilage, instead of an entire grain ration. A slop made of bran with skim milk will be good for the youngsters. As they get a little larger give them some soaked oats. Small potatoes, boiled and mixed with bran, will also give them a variety of food, and such as will promote growth rather than fattening. There is money in pigs, but it requires good care to get it all out.—Wisconsin Agriculturist.

The Secret of Success.

If butter makers had taken pains to avoid the economics of butter making they could not have succeeded much better than they are doing now. In using large milk cans to set milk in for the creamery there is an additional loss of 2 per cent., as compared with smaller vessels. The breeds that give the largest fat globules leave the smallest amount of fat in the skim milk and they are the Guernseys, Jerseys. By setting the milk of cows that have been in milk nine months, the best way possible, it is impossible to get more than two-thirds of the cream. The only way to get it is by the centrifugal system, which ought not to leave more than one-tenth of 1 per cent. of butter fat in the skim milk. By churning sweet cream between 7 and 23 per cent. is lost. Unpleasant odors in milk can be taken out by heating the milk to 160 degrees, but it is better to heat the cream than the milk and then cool it down to 50 degrees. If the butter will not come raise the cream to 70 degrees by stirring it, placing the can in a vessel containing hot water. But never add water in any form to cream, as you lose in quality and quantity. As a rule you cannot increase the percentage of fat in the cow's milk by feeding fat-forming foods, but the quantity can be increased.—Prof. J. W. Robertson in Farm and Home.

Shorthorns.

A good shorthorn is valuable wherever it may be placed—in the dairy for milk, or to feed for beef, but its most important characteristic, and that which makes it of exceptional value to the general farmer, is adaptation for the improvement of other breeds by crossing. The mixture of its blood with common or unimproved stock is quick to show good results, and it is in that way it has proven of such great value to the cattle interests of Great Britain. While other breeds may take the palm for special purpose, a farmer cannot go far wrong if he introduces some good shorthorn blood into his herd.

THE POULTRY-YARD.

Breed and Weight.

Although the Brahmas and Cochins are considered heavier than the Plymouth Rocks, yet the latter are but little less in weight than the Asiatics; the Plymouth Rocks, as a rule, always weigh heavier than they appear; we have known crosses of the Plymouth Rock and Brahmas to weigh as much as twelve pounds, which is a weight not easily attained by any class of fowls; just here we will say to our readers that weight does not indicate merit in a fowl always; for instance, it takes time to make heavy growth and size, which, of course, is a bar to early laying. There is some advantage in having a pullet to come in early for laying, as she will often lay enough eggs to compensate for lack of weight and if she begins in the fall the eggs will come at a time when prices are up. Plymouth Rocks fatten very rapidly after they are matured, and should be carefully fed with a view to avoid such condition, as an over-fat fowl will not lay well, and, besides, they begin to set after laying only a small number.—Exchange.

Poultry Pickings.

A HALF dozen small "hen coops" are much more useful than one massive structure affording an equal area. We all know that a coop of ten or twelve hens is usually profitable whereas multiples of the same are rarely satisfactory. This is the great secret of running a large poultry farm. Divide up so that each individual bird may have "as good a show" and as much room as upon the ordinary farm, where not more than a score or two of fowls are usually bred.

ORCHARD AND GARDEN.

Care of the Orchard.

Do not be too rash in methods of trimming. Nature makes fewer mistakes than orchard doctors give her credit for. Confine the trimming to the lower branches—those that seem to have served their purpose, and to a few that appear crippled and weak. The tree will indicate which it can spare is trying to kill off by the lack of vigor in the branch out at any time. Also establish a kind of mutual understanding between yourself and the orchard by frequent walks through it. The trees will point out their needs and you will get to understand their language, which is a safer guide than all the orthodox rules found in the books. If the soil lacks nutriment and the trees are hungry the little yellow leaves tell it plainly. Sun scald and borers are both afflictions readily noticed. Scraping the bark and washing with lye and soap is foolishness. If the tree is vigorous it can probably stand it, but if it is not you cannot supplement the lack by any such nonsense. The scurvy apple tree and the scurvy pig are not common terms, and they cannot be treated alike. The cause may be similar—inadequate nutrition, but while the pig gets a little sympathy and the big feed of milk after the washing, the tree must stand the scraping without protest and without a corresponding dose of fertility. Some of the potash might possibly percolate out to the feeding roots and be taken up into the circulation, but it is doubtful if vegetable diseases respond to an application of liniment, ointment or salve. An apple tree does not shed its coat as it does its leaves. Last year's jacket gets too small and cracks open for the new one growing under it, the tatters hanging to the body over the new suit. Whether the tree is thankful for this scraping service I much doubt. Indeed, it is possible, and quite probable, that it needs just this tattered mantle to protect itself from the sun. The tree needs just ordinary common sense and the exercise of it upon the young orchard is needed to make a success of such an undertaking.

Pruning Lormant Growth.

All pruning done before the buds start into growth stimulates those that remain so that they grow all the more vigorously. Pruning trees when in leaf is on the contrary, a check to the whole plant, and does not stimulate what is left. It is quite apt, however, with very vigorous trees, to cause fruit buds to start, and may thus be sometimes advisable to bring young orchards more quickly into bearing.

Political Pointers.

The Concordia Blade has lately said "good bye, old party" and come into the People's fold.

It has just been made public that Roswell P. Flower's campaign in New York last year cost him $240,000 in hard cash.

In the Seventh district the republicans seem to have left the field to Chester I. Long and a man named Taylor, whoever he is.

The People's Defender is the name of a new paper at St. Francis, and its first issue indicates that things are coming "our way" in that part of Kansas.

The republicans carried Rhode Island by a majority of 196 on governor and that party has a majority in the legislature of 14. So much for Cleveland's speech and the anti-silver break.

Chairman Harper, of the Texas state democratic central committee, has resigned his position and publicly announced himself a People's party man. There is no use trying to stop them; they are bound to come.

The gang of speculators that are lobbying for Perkins' Cherokee strip land steal have turned their attention to writing letters to the papers in the border counties. But they have not as yet succeeded in convincing any one that it is anything else but a steal.

The Crawford county People's party held a convention at Fine's Springs on April 2, with 51 delegates present.

W. M. Sutton, of Alma, was elected chairman and W. C. Gentry, secretary. After endorsing the action of the St. Louis conference a full county ticket was nominated.

H. F. Barnes, chairman of the Ohio People's party committee and editor of the Plow and Hammer published at Tiffin, that state, is under arrest, charged with sending obscene literature through the mails. The article which caused the trouble was published during last fall's campaign and it scored a republican editor of the town. The complainant could get no lawyer to take hold of the prosecution until the president appointed a new attorney for that district and it naturally looks as if he was appointed for this special purpose. The case will amount to nothing.

EQUAL RIGHTS TO ALL, SPECIAL PRIVILEGE TO NONE.

FORMERLY CITY & FARM RECORD.

TOPEKA, KANSAS, JULY, 1892.

NINTH YEAR, VOL. X. NO. 12.

For the FARMER'S WIFE, Toilers Unite, Organize and Educate Women.

TO EMMA GHENT CURTIS.

Dear sister, none would be more grateful
Than I if my sex were set free;
Yet I do not think that her voting,
Labor's penance would be.

Ignorance is the King which enslaves us;
Were we wise, none would ever be slaves;
From the gold power which now robs all labor,
Knowledge is the sole weapon which saves.

If woman's vote then would aid labor,
She must be far wiser than man;
I once really thought that she was so,
But believe it no longer I can;
For how quickly do men when they see that
They are slaves to unjust money powers,
Organize to have strength for the battle
Yet such wisdom has never been ours.

Our sex has to learn the advantage
Which an organized body can yield.
We always have stood well in numbers,
Yet always surrender the field;
Though large number of men gladly aid us,
To gain the powers which are our right;
Yet we long have been robbed of the ballot,
By the sloth of our sex to unite.

I have lived in the vilest of cities,
Where were woman, the toil of whose hand,
Could never suffice to provide them
The things to fill nature's demand.
But I know there the women had power.
Would the rich sisters unite with the poor
They could give work women more justice,
And good wages for all could secure.

We need Christian love more than the ballots;
Sisters with their hands soft and white,
Should refuse to adorn their proud persons
With lost souls, but to save them unite,
Yet I find that the ladies of learning,
Little aid to their poor sisters give,
Save as charity, seeming to rather Prepare them to die than to live.

Let us think of the things which the women
Had they been so disposed might have done
And then we can see if her voting
Will soon serve to right labor's wrong.
She might have raised sons who loved freedom,
Who would scorn fellow men to oppress;
Had she taught them 'twas crime to rob labor
The sin of our nation were less.

She might have raised daughters too noble,
The robbers and thieves to have wed;
Preparing to live by their own toil
Than by industrial slaves to be fed.
Let us cast a brief glance at the churches
Of women so greatly composed.
If she would vote right just by instinct
Why do they not injustice oppose?

And that body of organized women
The great W. C. T. U.
Did it not employ ill paid labor
Might some good to humanity do.
Ah! sister I fear that the women
Are human as well as the men;
The more I have studied their actions,
The less of their motives I ken.

Let us seek then to elevate women,
Educate her on causes of wrong
And when she once understands causes,
For the power to right them she'll long.
She will find that that power is the ballot,
Then sisters both black, brown and white;
Rich and poor, high and low 'gainst injustice
In aid of their sex will unite.

But dear sister that day is not present,
I would that it were yet 'tis not.
Yet we who abhor all injustice
Can do work which our brothers can not.
The fact that we cannot hold office
Oft gives to our pleadings more weight,
For men do not say "she is working For office in nation or state."

I belong to the Knights and Alliance,
And did woman her wrongs understand,
Those orders would long ago numbered
Every laboring girl in our land.
And I feel no fear but the men who Have taught us what rights should be ours,
Will hasten to give us full freedom
As soon as they have needed powers.

But I do not wish that the party to come
Which could bring such grand good times
Which would aid every toiler to freedom,
Save for millions of sisters a home
Should be burdened at starting by platform
Which would not aid their cause, although
Let us first better educate women
Against her own wrongs to unite.

Mrs. J. T. Kellie.

SEWARD, Neb., July 9th 1892.

EDITOR FARMER'S WIFE:

Will you kindly send me a sample copy of your paper. I have seen it advertised and as I am a farmer's wife, I think I should like to commune with my downtrodden much abused sister; not but what the brother, also have my sincere sympathy, but they put themselves in their present condition and have the means of redress if they will use it, but women, who have such odds to contend against,
every step she makes upward, in the social and political world shall have, not only my sympathy, but all the aid I can give financially, intellectually, etc.

Mrs. C. E. BEDFORD.

Over throw the Money Changers.

Editor of the FARMER'S WIFE.

Mr. Rockefeller, the president of the largest corporation in world, namely, "the Oil Trust," on account of his recent be-nificent acts, is heralded through the partisan press as the great benefactor of the human race. His "magnificent donation to the University of Chicago" is the topic of conversation in plutocratic circles, and is the theme dwelt upon in the partisan press until the "laudation is truly disgusting."

While Rockefeller is donating $2,000, 000 to the Chicago University, (the last million was delivered on March 1st) the cry goes up for bread all over the land.

Why are not these cries heard and heeded?
Why does not this "earnest Baptist"
feed the hungry and clothe the naked?
Why does he not do as he prays? Does he expect God to do what he has commanded him to do? Does he expect the Lord of heaven will come down and "feed the hungry and clothe the naked," that He will feed the starving millions he has robbed.

Does he expect his formal "Baptist" prayers will loosen the shackles and break the chains which he, his associate millionaires and their tools, have placed upon the people?

Pray on, O thou Rockefeller, the "earnest Baptist," pray on, and a just God will not hear your petitions while you hold in your grasp the hard-earned of the producers of the wealth of the world; for,
"Brother Rockefeller," the "utmost farthing will have to be paid," thus saith the scripture. Your beneficent acts in "Endowing Universities and church institutions" under your system of wrong may serve to ease your conscience; but will not give you a "though ticket to Heaven" neither through it, can you evade the "fires of Hades." The Golden rule does not figure in your platform.

Pray on, O thou "earnest Baptist" and Christian gentlemen; "thou philanthropist and dispenser of other peoples money" do you think you will be all right when the God calls you to account for your stewardship." It is no wonder that you dream dreams, and see visions. It is no wonder that when you was suffering with gripe, you thought it was the chief fire tender in Hades, "who has the grip on you, and was foreclosing a mortgage on your carcass." It is no wonder that when you awoke, you took the Bible and read from the following chapters: Timothy 6-10-17.
Haggai 2-8. Psalms 50-10-11. Deut. 8-18-19. It is no wonder that after pondering over these verses, together with your dream, you donated that "magnificent" sum of stolen wealth to the Chicago University as a "thanksgiving offering," as you call it, to ease your conscience, and "try to swindle the Lord, and cheat the fellow below out of a little more time."

Why is it that Mr. Rockefeller twenty-seven years ago was worth only five thousand, and is now worth $150,000,000?
Why is it that the toiling millions are suffering for the want of necessary food to sustain their bodies? Why the great gulf between the producer and would be royalty? Toiling poorly paid, starving millions crying for bread in the greatest wealth producing country in the world.
Now where is all this wealth? Tell me farmer, tell me wage worker. It is aggregated in the hands of few, as Lincoln said it would be. This aggregated wealth is in the hands of a few men.
Through their control of legislation, have caused laws to be made in their interest, to the detriment of the masses, and have combined and formed trusts upon almost every thing even to the caskets in which you will be buried, so that a casket cannot be bought, or any part of it free from a trust.

Now what are the people asking for?
Is it charity? No, it is simply justice.
If "justice were done there would be no occasion for charity." The present outlook is the result of unjust legislation forced on an unsuspecting, over credulous people.

If justice were done there would be no need of a return of the spoils. Poverty necessitates a return of the spoils, for "charity and robbery are twins born of the same unjust system." First rob the the people, and then in charity return a small part of the stolen goods. The world to-day clamors for "deeds not creeds," for "bread, not dogma," but most of all the world clamors for is "justice in the sphere of bread and butter." The people need the light of intellect turned upon the causes of hunger and want in this "boasted land of liberty," bought by the blood of our fore-fathers which have been bartered away for gold. Wall street is enthroned at the head of this nation.
The people should be the government, but they now have no voice in the laws that govern their destinies.

Wall street, with its associate millionaires, and tools, runs this government.
The partisan press being bought up by the money power, is deceiving the people, and the people reading nothing outside of the partisan press are being "hoodwinked." Many never see a reform paper and are not being educated in the economic questions of to-day which are to decide their destinies.

While wall street has the grasp on the wealth the people have grown gray in producing. The producers are listening to the songs sung to them by the plutocracy. The songs are soothing and the soft lullaby sinks them into the sweetest repose. Keep on, O farmer and you will be clothed in rags.

As sure as effort follows cause, unless you arouse from your long dreams and look into the causes, and apply the remedy, you are doomed and in the end can thank yourselves for it.

Work on ye toilers, ye wealth producers, and as you work and sweat, be sure and listen to everything except justice. It is no wonder you are afraid of it you have been a stranger to its administration for many long years. Work on then for the further enrichment of the millionaires who have made you and your children wage slaves.

Work on then, don't listen to the voice of justice, nor inquire into the causes of your poverty, but cling to party, out of which principal has departed, and let you will be your own assassins. Work on ye farmers and wage workers until your bent backs and stiffened limbs are buried in a casket on which is a trust, thus doubling the cost to your bereaved family; but remember the curse will fall upon your children for you knew your duty and did it not. It is in your power to hurl oppression from its throne, but if you will not investigate for yourselves, and learn the truth; if you will not be freemen and use your God given powers in the direction of right, you alone are to blame and the curse will rest on suffering humanity for generations to come.
Unless you heroically stand up like men and battle for freedom and justice in this great struggle for human rights, throw off the political shackles which bind you, and work for justice to your fellow men, your blood bought liberties will be lost.

If you will investigate with an unprejudiced mind, you will find that the causes herein mentioned are true. You will also find that "the total amount of property in the United States, is sixty billion dollars; using in large numbers again you will find that forty billion dollars is in the hands of non-producers."
It is "gathering into the hands of a few the wealth which others have produced," and they "get the income from forty billion dollars" which they have wrestled from the hands of industry.

Now here comes John D. Rockefeller the "earnest Baptist," the "Christian gentlemen" who owns and controls the Standard Oil works of the world. Carnegie the iron trust, then the coal king and almost unnumbered other trusts, until there is a vast combination which control the prices of products, and steals the necessities of life. These men, these great "benefactors," these "Christian gentlemen" will not simply cut down the wages of their employees to starvation prices, until the wail of distress is echoing from north to south, and from ocean to ocean, but then, if they revolt, or strike, they are in many instances shot down like dogs, by a police force hired and sworn in for that purpose and the government has no power to prevent it, and does not interfere to stop the murderous work, and the money power which is the government says amen; but if a starving child helps himself to a loaf of bread, he is thrown into jail and has to serve out the penalty of the law.
Great God? has it come to this; that in a free country, men who style themselves
"Christian gentlemen" will push the police force on to commit these atrocious crimes, in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, and this government looks on complacently and does nothing.

If these men wrap their hypocritical cloaks around them, these "Christian men and benefactors," and make a show of what does not dwell within, and their fel-lowmen.

It is no wonder that we hear the distant mutterings of discontent throughout the length and breadth of this land.

Farmers and wage workers, where are your boasted liberties, and whence are your freedoms? Can you not see that when a few more own the wealth of a country they can control it? Can you not see that with all that wealth in their hands; it is capital against labor, and that you are drifting into surfdom? Do you not know that England has laid her avaricious hands on the wealth which rightfully belongs to you, and is reveling in royal splendor across the sea? Do you not know that the vice president of the United States is a London banker and todies to the interests of the British Lords? Do you not know that the money power here has combined with the money power in England to dethrone justice to mankind and make you slaves?
By all that is sacred in Heaven, and upon earth, by the sweat of the brow of industry, by the burdens placed upon the men who go down in the mines and dig out the hidden wealth, by the emaciated bloodless forms of thousands of spinning girls in the factories, by the lives of millions of women and children in the cities out of work, or on starvation wages, suffering with hunger and cold, in vain cry-for bread, how can you longer cling to a system which has brought so much dis-rter to the human family. Is this patriotism? Is it Christian? Why do you not drive the money changers out of the temple as Christ did. He called it a den of thieves. It was the money power that crucified Christ, and with his commands and example for a guide, how can you longer uphold the money changers in the temple of liberty to day? Why do you not go into the temple as he did, and overthrow the tables of the money changers?

Why do you not assist in breaking up the den of thieves who are crucifying you every day and thus bring in an era of equity. Mrs. Doctor Howard, Muscotah, Kas.

Illinois Woman's Alliance.

The Illinois Woman's alliance of Chicago, a delegated body of woman composed of three representatives from each of 34 clubs and societies of women recently appointed a committee to formulate reasons other than the question of wages which would justify a strike on the part of women employees.

The committee presented a report at the meeting of July 1, which was adopted as expressing the sentiments of the Alliance. The report was as follows:

A strike is a concerted refusal to work by a number of employees, until some existing or supposed cause of dissatisfaction is righted.

The necessity of a concerted refusal is the result of the present system of industry, by which a large number of persons work under and for one person or boss.
The refusal to work on the part of one employee would have no effect on the employer because of the large number of unemployed ready to take the vacant place, therefore to render their protests against real or fancied injustice, effectual, it has become necessary for the workers to unite and make a common against the injustice and so inaugurate that savory move, a strike.

All disagreeable developments in society are the result of two causes, injustice and ignorance; and your committee recognizes that employers and employees may be equally unjust and ignorant.

But organized society admits the liability of the worker to be imposed upon and by legislation has declared that they may lawfully demand certain conditions necessary to life and happiness from their employers. According to city ordinances or state law they may demand:

1. Five hundred cubic feet of air space to each worker.
2. Such ventilation as will secure a complete change of air every twenty minutes.
3. Seating provision for all women employees.
4. A toilet room for every twenty employees and separate ones for women.
5. Safeguards around dangerous machinery.
6. All sewers and drains to be kept clean and free from noxious odors detrimental to health.
7. The state provides that "it shall be unlawful for any person, company, corporation or association to make deductions from the wages of his, its or their workmen except for lawful money advanced to them."

(This last is to provide against the system of fines.)

These regulations are continually violated and it is the opinion of your committee that an organized protest even to the length of a strike would be justifiable to obtain such rights as are guaranteed by law. It is further our opinion that when employees have been forced to attain their rights by such organized effort the employer should be responsible in damages for time lost by employees during the strike and until the legal rights of the employees have been accorded to them and they re-employed. Why should not the law justify a strike organized to maintain the law?

The opinions cited apply to men as well as women; but your committee feels that owing to the accepted moral code for women they occupy a peculiar position in industry; and they are subjected to abuses because of their sex which must also be presented collectively to be of any avail. For instance:

They are often forced to hear and listen to lewd jests and remarks while their sensitiveness is ridiculed by men and boys.

Dressing rooms are not provided where the work requires change of dress and women and young girls are required to make the change at the risk of intrusion by the other sex.

Their rightful privacy in the toilet room is frequently and rudely violated by coarse, low-minded foremen and super-

Their chastity is continually attacked that all unprotected women are legiti-

Therefore your committee believes that all women and especially the members of the Illinois Woman's Alliance should recognize these dangers which beset should be ready to extend help in any unfortunately true abuses.

A Complimentary Notice.

Emma D. Pack, of Kansas, is at the Millard. Mrs. Pack is a slight woman, of medium height, modest and unassum-ing, with character stamped upon every lineament of her face. She is secretary of the National Woman's Alliance and editor of the FARMER'S WIFE the organ of the association. She has a clear, sweet voice, which can be plainly heard, and an earnest, womanly manner, which gains her the admiration and friendship of every one. There is a heartiness about Mrs. Pack that takes hold of those who meet her, and which shows that she is no ordinary woman. A firm advocate of equal rights and one of the oldest of the women reform workers, to show her fealty to the noble cause she named her twin boys, born fourteen years ago, Weaver and Gillette respectively, and her willing-pen has done great service in all the leading journals in America advocating the rights of those in the lower walks of life.
She has a perfect horror for women that push themselves forward, and seldom makes a speech unless urged to do so. She is an honored member of nearly all the women associations in Topeka Kans., and an efficient worker. She believes that women suffrage will only come through the new movement, is for Weav-

WOMEN go hatless in Mexico. It would seem that the drama ought there to find its most fruitful field for development.

A "NEW and dangerous counterfeit" is reported from Washington. However, as it is a $50 bill it isn't one-tenth so dangerous as if it were a five.

THE New York Stock Exchange has passed its hundredth milestone, but it can toss a bear or swamp a bull with as much celerity as when it was young or in its prime.

MR. GLADSTONE is the only living member of the Peel administration. No American statesman now living was in active public life when Mr. Gladstone had already taken a prominent position in affairs.

"WHAT a pity it is that something new cannot be invented in bathing costumes," says the editor of the woman's page in a crepuscular contemporary. Why not try the scheme of putting a little cloth in them?

THERE is a new play in New York which actually shocks the moral sensibility of the community. It cannot be definitely rated as bad, however, until the expert opinion of Dr. Parkhurst has been obtained.

SOME one will be sure to imitate that new bridge-jumper who dropped from a height of 149 feet, and some one will get killed. Bridge-jumping is the recreation of individuals whose minds cannot understand the law of gravitation without a personal experience.

ONE of our best judges has decided that "the milk trust" cannot legally collect milk bills. Now what is the reason that this same rule won't apply to the anthracite coal industry? Just as certain as we live "trusts" have got to go. If the present laws are ineffective, laws will be made that will not be.

IN addition to being a considerable source of revenue to the World's Fair Treasury it is some satisfaction to know that the plan of charging a fee for admission to Jackson Park results in extracting a reluctant quarter of a dollar now and then from some local capitalist who has never subscribed a cent toward the fair.

A CHICAGO preacher makes a doubtful claim for his church when he declares "the church could say to every millionaire in the city 'I made you. I made the society and civilization which rendered your acquisitions possible.'" One of the severest charges against the human side of church organizations is that millionaires have been more tenderly treated than their victims. Perhaps the preacher spoke hastily. Will he affirm the converse of his proposition, "that the church also made those conditions which resulted in the oversupply of paupers?" Or will he leave the responsibility for the creation of the poorer-paying class to the Almighty?

IT is stated that Mr. Reid, our late minister to France, paid a rental for his house in Paris more than equal to his whole salary; and it is suggested that this was needful to maintain the dignity of his position. It is certainly a great mistake to suppose that the dignity of an American minister to France depends on the size of his house or the way in which it is furnished or the dinners he gives or the cost of his wines. The French are a sensible people, and as a rule a very prudent people. They know in what dignity consists. They respect ability and culture, and these they can distinguish. A man who supposes that his dignity as a French minister depends on the amount of money he spends, is not fit to be such minister. We never had a better foreign minister than Dr. Franklin, nor one who spent less money.

ANOTHER case is reported in which a woman has probably lamed herself for life through that habit so generally prevalent among women, the trick of shutting bureau drawers with the knee. It is so much easier to push a drawer to, even when it moves with difficulty, by a motion of the knee than it is to stoop, that nine women out of ten, perhaps, are accustomed to do it. The instances in which evil results are of course not large in number in comparison to the number of persons who do this, but they are sufficiently numerous to show the folly of running the risk of harm and to deter thoughtful persons from exposing themselves to a danger so easily avoided yet of consequences so serious in many cases.

ONE morning last February newspaper readers, especially small boys of six-shooter, go West instincts, had a rare story furnished them in the daring exploit of a young train robber on the New York Central. Oliver Curtis Perry was his name, and the manner of his entry into a moving express car was nervy and brilliant to the last degree. It will be remembered how he held the State of New York at bay, how he escaped on an engine, was pursued on a faster one, took to the country, and was finally captured. It was a great feat, and what's more it was true. But there is a dark side to all this, and prospective train robbers still in knickerbockers are invited to read and ponder. Oliver Curtis Perry was sentenced to forty-nine years three months residence in Auburn Prison. These little anticlimaxes will happen, especially when Southwestern artists overdo their jobs in the effete East.

If they were not so farcical the the English aristocracy would be invaluable for comedy, as witness the fact that it is announced that the abandonment of the claim for costs in the Russell divorce suit indicates a prospect for reconciliation. "The Earl," the authorities go on to inform a waiting and eager world, "is said to have been considerably affected by his wife's successful dancing at Walton-on-Thames, where she recently appeared in a charitable entertainment, and, while he is gratified by the graceful and blameless manner in which the performance was conducted, he would prefer not to have Countess Russell appear in any more public exhibitions." This offers a hint to the writer of farces. To have the wife appear as a skirt-dancer in a public charity entertainment is a means of reuniting his separated hero and heroine which has probably never occurred to the fancy of the wildest dramatist.

AMONG other things which were demonstrated by the relay bicycle ride from Chicago to New York was the necessity for better country roads. The men who planned the trip and carried it into effect were looking to other results, but the advocates of hard roads will find in the experience of the cyclists powerful arguments in favor of improved public highways. If the roads had been what they should be—what the age in which we live and the civilization which we enjoy demand—the relay riders would have accomplished their mission ahead of instead of behind time. While the wheelmen are calculating the average distance covered per hour and the army officials are considering the feasibility of substituting bicycles for horses for courier purposes, the whole people might well improve the opportunity to turn their attention to the desirability of road reform. The present barbarous system of country roads must give place to something better. The change cannot come too soon.

EMPEROR WILLIAM has an occasional touch of sanity. His latest declaration is against Jew baiting. He said: "I do not recognize Jews and Gentiles among Germans, and my subjects must also ignore the distinction." Had he been contented with this statement he would have earned something of universal respect for his opinion on a subject which is vexing humanity in every part of the world. When he proceeded to say "the Jews have been good friends of former rulers of Germany, and they give us their money in peace, and their blood in war, and are, moreover, loyal to me," it was not necessary for him to add, "What more can I ask?" The Emperor, while at one with the largest portion of mankind in awarding to every element of the human family an equal place in the world, cannot help even when doing this showing himself an egotist. It is not improbable that if he counted the Jews among his "enemies" he would be as fanatical against them as the Czar of Russia. It is to his credit that even as an egotist he has stated correctly what ought to be the principle concerning races and creeds in all parts of civilization. The world is too old now to note discriminately "Jews and Gentiles."

THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

From the Grand Rapids, Mich., Morning Press.

It is announced that England will accept the invitation of the United States to attend an international conference on silver. England has accepted this invitation twice before and nothing came of it, and it is not probable this acceptance means anything more than the former ones. The great powers of Europe are owned and run by the creditor class and it is not to the interest of that class either in Europe or the United States to bring about the free coinage of silver on any basis other than a ratio that makes all coinage equal to gold in bullion value. This would be unjust to the debtor class and will not be submitted to in the United States.

The time has come when the oppressed debtors in this country are determined to have fair play. They have rights in all honesty as well as the creditors.

There is no harm in a silver conference, and there may be some good; but it need not be expected that a conference now will result in an agreement for international coinage. There is no special reason why a conference should be held now excepting only the exigencies of American politics. The gold interest is scared, and it is feared the United States will vote for free silver.

To avert that and keep the people fooled with talk of international coinage is the purpose of the proposed international conference, which will be kept on its feet until after the November election as a foil against free silver and to again cheat the people. After election the conference will promptly adjourn without reaching an agreement.

WHO IS IT THEY ARE SO ANXIOUS ABOUT?

From the Chicago Free Trade.

The gold-bugs say we are now coining all the product of the silver mines and they (think of it!) want the government to make the 30 cents profit on coinage, instead of giving it to the silver miners. Anxious, indeed, are they for the welfare of the government! Since when has this great change of heart come about? It wasn't when they drove hard bargains with Uncle Sam during the war, when they stabbed the greenback with the exception clause. It wasn't when they passed the credit strengthening act, making the bonds, principal and interest, payable in coin.

It wasn't when, in '73, they demonetized silver, making their bonds payable in gold. Nor it wasn't in 1878, when they passed the law partially remonetizing silver—making the certificates legal tender, except when stipulated in the contract. Nor it wasn't when they passed the law of 1890, under which the coinage of silver has practically ceased. No, you infernal thieves and robbers, it isn't the welfare of Uncle Sam, or the people, you are so anxious about.

SILVER AND WHEAT GROWING.

The following is from the Mark Lane (Eng.) Express:

"The imports of Indian wheat during May into the United Kingdom were large, owing to the exceptionally heavy shipments of old crop wheat. The new crop is not coming forward with any extraordinary freedom. May shipments were slightly under 5,600,000 bushels, a decrease of more than 20 per cent for corresponding month last year. The rupee, however, remains so greatly the dominant feature in all branches of Indian trade that now this silver coin, of the nominal value of two shillings, is down to 1s and 4d, wheat can be sold at 31s, which at a full rupee value would cost us 39s per quarter. The fall of a penny in the rupee cheapens India wheat for English buyers by 1s on the quarter. If the rupee recovers to 1s 7d, as there is some hope of its doing, the wheat now on sale off our coasts for 31s will cost us 34s per quarter, which is a material difference to the English farmer."

Yes, and a material difference to the American farmer as well. If the Indian rupee were at its full value of two shillings, wheat that now sells in England at 31s would bring 39s per quarter, an advance of one shilling (24 cents) per bushel, not only to the English but to the American farmer, an advance which easily marks the difference to the wheat grower between affluence and subsistence, if not between affluence and poverty. And this difference is the result of the unjustified, unnecessary and infamous displacement of silver as one of time-honored money metals of the world by a few leading commercial nations. If silver had been let alone, as it had been for all the ages; if the increasing volume had been regarded as a boon to the world instead of a curse; if the greed of man had not conceived the crime of demonetization as a ready and effective means of contributing to the gratification of its insatiable appetite, the debasement of silver would have been unknown, the much-talked-of "parity" between gold and silver would have been unheard of, and the productive industries of this and other countries would have been infinitely more prosperous. Productive industry should never, never forgive the men or the parties who are responsible for the displacement of silver from its ancient, honored a useful place in the commercial world.

HOW WRONG IS DEFENDED.

From the Minneapolis, Minn., Farm, Stock and Home.

An analysis of the existing conditions reveals an extremely peculiar situation. The people of this country have allowed wrongs and abuses to gradually grow until they have at last become quite intolerable. The wrongs and abuses are of such a character that if the people had been privileged to vote upon them they would have rejected them by an enormous majority. But as they came by a slow and unconscious growth they are not only tolerated, but we are told that to destroy or remove them would outrage the genius of our government and prove fatal to our material interests.

As a legislative enactment the creation of billions of dollars of fictitious values upon which productive industry must eternally pay interest, at all events, and dividends as a rule, would have been followed by armed rebellion, unless this is a nation of paltrons and cowards. But we are now ecologically told that an attempt to throw off such a burden would be an impairment of sacred "vested rights," and precipitate commercial, financial and industrial chaos.

Suppose a proposition were made to turn the postoffice department over to Messrs. Gould and Vanderbilt, to be operated on the principle of "all the traffic would bear," and with rates that would insure interest and dividends on an enormous over-capitalization, what would likely be the fate of the proposition? Not a man would vote for it unless he expected to be benefitted by it. If the telegraph had been a part of the postoffice department, that fact would have made no difference with the vote; but attempts to take the telegraph out of the hands of Gould and make it a part of the postoffice department, is characterized as governmental interference with private business affairs, and not be countenanced for a moment.

That there are wrongs, that wealth is rapidly centralizing, and that all are beginning to see the wrongs and understand their power, is undeniable. The citadels of oppression are in sight, but the moment the people begin to move towards one of them with unfriendly intent the cry is—voiced with strange unanimity by the press and managers of the old political parties—that it will not do to destroy that citadel, and the same cry is raised, the same voices heard no matter what citadel is threatened, what wrong is to be attacked. Monometalism, a protective tariff, rates of interest, money monopoly, capitalistic combines, the entire array of blistering wrongs are sought to be protected in the self-same way.

MUST WE WAIT?

It is a common thing for the opponents of bi-metalism and free coinage to deprecate the value of silver and to assert its impracticability as a disturbing financial element without a common agreement with foreign nations. This is supplemented by the partisan press and the stump speakers who carry on the political canvass in the several states. Nevertheless, there is nothing in it, as a matter of fact, so far as we can see. It is purely dogmatic, and is only the announcement of individual opinion about something in the future of which no one positively knows the absolute final outcome.

But against this speculative theory, which has been so much harped upon, we have the example of France in a period of great financial stress, which goes to prove the fallacy of all these prognostications. It shows what one country may do in the establishment of a silver money currency, without asking or receiving the co-operation of another. What France has done in this respect we may also do, and with the same assurance and success. Well, how was it? When France parted with one thousand millions of gold money, or its equivalent, to pay its great war fine, demanded by Germany, her industries did not stop, but went on all the same. Why? Because the French government had provided to use silver money as a full legal tender, and with this in full supply the business of the country went on without a break. There was no derangement and no financial disaster. There was nothing said about "dishonest money" or "debased coin." For at that time such words would have been deemed cowardice or treason.

By this policy France emerged from the ordeal of war like a giant refreshed, and thus proved her capacity to control her own financial affairs without foreign aid or co-operation. She was independent on her own ground, and so fulfilled her own destiny in her own way.

Why should we not do likewise? Are we not just as competent and in all respects just as capable to fulfill and control our own conditions?

GEORGIA POLITICS.

From Washington letter to Chicago Herald.

Representative Lester, of Georgia, while at home took occasion to study the political situation, and he reports the farmers' alliance making alarming progress. Mr. Lester is a democrat, but he insists that his party will have to exert itself to the utmost to carry the state this fall. "The people of the state want free silver, and they demand several other things endorsed by the alliance," said Mr. Lester. "They are becoming dissatisfied with both old parties. Georgia is considered strongly democratic, and it has always been so, but it looks to me as if the alliance would carry it at the coming election, unless something is done to check the growth of the alliance down there. I sincerely believe the third party will be able to secure the presidential electors from Georgia."

Mr. Lester's opinion is supported by that of Mr. Livingston and some of the other members of the Georgia delegation, in congress. Even Mr. Blount, the eldest member of the delegation, declines to run again. His reason for declining is that the alliance is so formidable in his district as to practically insure the defeat of any candidate on the regular democratic ticket.

WHY NOT PUT IT OUT?

From the Montgomery, Ala., Alliance Herald.

Money is simply an equivalent of value, with the stamp of the government showing how much value it represents. The government must have a basis of value so as to successfully float a large volume of currency. Its credit is capable of meeting all demands, except of the money kings, who could shake the system and make profits out of the quake of confidence they could bring about. But with the earnest efforts of the government to maintain it, four times as much money could be floated on the present basis, as it now exists, than is now in circulation. Why not put it out? Who is benefitted by withholding it? Shylock, and not the people. Is the government organized and run for the benefit of Shylock or the people? Shylock is undoubtedly in the saddle now, and the people are not able to shake his hold or overturn his power so long as they permit themselves to be led by his agents and emissaries. But there's the rub. The people have found out the fact and that is what the row is about.

FARMERS AND INTEREST.

By Walter Blake, New York.

I cannot help thinking that farmers would be more profitably engaged in striving to make themselves loaners of money at fair rates of interest, than borrowers at any rate of interest. The farmers produce nearly all wealth; by every principle of justice they should be loaners of money, and I believe they would be but for certain systems that they should destroy—systems that rob them of the profits of their business. The men who should be working for the destruction of interest are those who create no wealth; but to see wealth-makers trying to destroy the earning power of their own product is something I cannot understand.

THERE are many good reasons for discontinuing governmental crop reports, and discouraging reporting by others. At all events, no other manufacturers would submit to such publication of their business affairs as farmers do, and are expected to smile and look happy over.—Minneapolis, Minn., Farm, Stock and Home.

LITTLE BOYS AND GIRLS.

THIS IS THEIR DEPARTMENT OF THE PAPER.

Quaint Sayings and Doings of Little Ones Gathered and Printed Here for Other Little Folks to Read.

He Had His Way.
My shaving-brush is missing, and my shoe-horn can't be found,
My comb and brush I cannot see, my cane is nowhere round.
My tall silk hat is ruffled up, my pens have gone astray—
But all this woe is naught to me, for baby's had his way.

What though my shoes are minus strings, my manuscripts awry?
I know that this betoken, baby's been spared a heartfelt cry.
What though the floor is ever strewn with toys, by night and day?
Is there not pleasure in the thought that baby's had his way?

It hurts to have my mustache pulled, and games at 4 a. m.
Are not just suited to my mind; but John is fond of them.
And, after all, it seems to me, no man can well gainsay
That there is lots and lots of fun when baby has his way.

So, son and heir, continue on thy happy, blest career;
Ne'er shall thy daddy interpose to raise the scalding tear.
Whate'er discomfort comes to me, cease not thy joyous play;
As far as I'm concerned, my boy, go on and have thy way.
—Harper's Young People

Good Manners for Young People.
Be your natural self and take no thought of the consequences. Other people don't observe you half as much as you imagine. In a crowd, the truth is, you are likely to be forgotten, to pass unnoticed. Of course, if you are not rich enough to dress as the society of the rich requires, keep out of that society. You can find your own place, and you will enjoy it more; nay, you will enjoy it only, for in the other you can have no pleasure at all.

Many young people are distressed because they fear they may not make an exhibition of themselves in society which presents their real value. They are troubled lest they shall be misunderstood, put down lower than they belong, not rated high enough. Hence they make an effort to convince those whom they meet that they are of some consequence. But all that is a waste of energy, of thought, anxiety and ambition. It fails of its purpose, and is likely to produce the very effect which it seeks to prevent. It generates a self-consciousness which breeds embarrassment in turn, and consequent inability to make the desired revelation and create the hoped-for impression.

Learn to forget all about yourself, how you appear, what other people may be thinking about you; and then they will see you as you really are, and as you are a far more engaging and interesting individual than you can be when thoughts of the show you are making of yourself destroy your natural manner and expression. Civility never goes amiss. A young girl who looks on old married men as not worth her consideration of her gracious courtesy, is likely to find out that she has made a sad mistake. A young man who has no attentions to bestow on women who have passed the age which he thinks alone is attractive, may find that he has lost valuable allies in his career.—Canada Presbyterian.

Boys That Succeeded.
"A new boy came into our office to-day," said a wholesale grocery merchant to his wife at the supper table. "He was hired by the firm at the request of the senior member, who thought the boy gave promise of good things. But I feel sure that boy will be out of the office in less than a week."

"What makes you think so?"
"Because the first thing he wanted to know was just exactly how much he was expected to do."

"Perhaps you will change your mind about him."

"Perhaps I shall," replied the merchant; "but I don't think so."

Three days later the business man said to his wife: "About that boy you remember I mentioned two or three days ago. Well, he is the best boy I have ever entered the store."
"How did you find that out?"
"In the easiest way in the world. The first morning after the boy began work he performed very faithfully and systematically the exact duties assigned which he had been so careful to have explained to him. When he had finished he came to me and said: 'Mr. H., I have finished all that work. Now what can I do?' I was a little surprised, but I gave him a little job of work, and forgot all about him until he came into my room with the question, 'What next?' That settled it for me. He was the first boy that ever entered our office who was willing and volunteered to do more than was assigned him. I predict a successful career for that boy as a business man."

Business men know capacity when they see it, and they make a note of it. Willingness to do more than the assigned task is one of the chief stepping-stones to commercial success.

Smart Boys.
Some of the answers given by the pupils of an Indiana public school in an examination in physiology are very absurd. One boy, for instance, wrote: "It will not do to monkey with the tung juce." And such mistakes as "kile" for "chyle," "agean" for "aqueous," "jasper juce" for "gastric juice," and "esofaqut" for "esophagus" were common. A delightful though unconscious comment on the ignorance displayed in the above examples was made by one boy, who solemnly remarked in his paper that "you can't no to much." It is pretty evident that these boys won't "no to much" about physiology, at least, unless the instruction given them is more intelligent than it now appears to be.

Stood on a Steeple Cross.
After describing in interesting detail how Clarence E. Ward, of Cincinnati, with the aid of a rope, climbed the 230-foot steeple of St. Peter's Church, Cleveland, the Leader of that city says: By repeating the process of passing one girdle above the other he reached the large ball at the top of the spire and at the base of the cross. Fifteen minutes were spent in getting his ropes and girdles over the ball. Having accomplished this feat, he climbed over the ball, and was safely lodged at the foot of the cross. His first movement was to securely fasten the pulley through which the long rope passed to the base of the cross. Then he placed both arms around the cross and shook it vigorously. From the street the tall pole could be seen to shake to and fro, and, to the spectators, looked as if it would not bear Ward's weight. With the agility of a cat, however, he mounted the cross, and the next moment was astride of the arm which pointed to the north. Then it was that he produced the national flag, and a cheer broke from the crowd as he fastened it to the upright part of the cross above the arms.

His next act was to make fast a short rope which reached to the foot of the cross. Half a minute later he slid down and again stood on the ball. Waving his hat to the people, he began the descent. This was easy. Ward simply sat in his chair and allowed the rope to pass slowly through his hands. Three times on the way down he stopped his descent, and pushing himself away from the spire with his feet, spun around in midair. The crowd thought he was doing it for the sake of bravado, but his object was to twist the rope so that it would not pass through his hands so quickly.

A Betting Captain.
The captain of one rather old and slow steamer, finding that he would have to be a long time in China before he received a full cargo of tea and would probably have to return in ballast, began, to every one's astonishment, to say that, owing to the repairs that had been done to his engine, he hoped to make a racing passage. Then, still more to the astonishment of the captains of the fast steamers and the world at large, he commenced to back himself to make the fastest passage home. In such considerable sums of money did he wager that people began to think there was something in it, and the merchants sent their tea almost entirely to his ship, arguing that, as the captain stood to lose $500, the repairs to his steamer's engines had probably put him in a position to bet almost on a certainty. Of course the steamer, whose greatest speed was eight knots an hour, arrived in England weeks after the others and the captain lost his $500, but instead of having to lie in China waiting his chance of a cargo coming in from the interior—a probable delay of weeks—he had cleared in a few days after his bet became known to the public with a full ship, thus recouping to his owners, who of course paid his betting losses, a considerable number of thousands of pounds profit.—Blackwood's Magazine.

A Simple Relief for Lung Troubles.
It has long been known that pine needle pillows would alleviate persons afflicted with lung troubles, and a Florida editor relates an incident in support of the fact as follows: During a visit to the home of a most estimable lady living on Indian River, this editor was told of a discovery that had been made which may prove a boon to sufferers from lung or bronchial troubles. The lady having heard that there was peculiar virtue in a pillow made from pine straw, and having none of that material at hand, made one from fine soft pine shavings, and had the pleasure of noting immediate benefit. Soon all the members of the household had pine shavings pillows, and it was noticed that all coughs, asthmatic or bronchial troubles abated at once after sleeping a few nights on these pillows. An invalid suffering with lung trouble derived much benefit from sleeping upon a mattress made from pine shavings. The material is cheap, and the Christian at Work says it makes a very pleasant and comfortable mattress. The odor of the pine permeating the whole room and absorbing or dispelling all unpleasant odors.

Exceedingly Awkward.
A new universal language is on the principle of numbering. Every word is numbered. For example, "I write to know," would be 10, 72, 35, 670.

DRESS FOR HOT DAYS.

CHILDREN'S COSTUMES THAT ARE COMFORTABLE.

A Very Pretty Little Dress for a Child of Eight to Ten Years—Long Skirts on Children Should Be Used with Great Discretion.

Gotham Fashion Gossip.
ETTY cares are often quite as vexatious as great ones, and little folks can be just as troublesome as big. In fact, I'm inclined to think that the woman who on slender means raises a large family of children and keeps them all neatly and decently clad deserves a higher monument than a legislator, warrior, or artist, says our New York correspondent. Ragged frocks make ragged manners, and it is very hard for a child to sit up and be a little lady when she has a hole in the toe of her shoe. The money outlay is so small for the material necessary for a child's dress that even in the lowest walks of life we are justified in assuming that shabbily dressed children are the result rather of indolence than of poverty. It doesn't take long for a nimble needle in skillful fingers to gather a straight skirt on a little yoke, cut out deep bishop sleeves, each in one piece, and finish them with deep, tight cuffs. When time and taste permit, the cuffs and yoke may be set off with a little neat embroidery of some kind. To get a very pretty effect, let the cuffs, yoke, and collar be of striped stuff and the skirt plain.

In my initial illustration you will find pictured a very pretty little dress for a child of 8 or 10. It may be made up in almost any material. You finish the skirt in front with a wide box pleat, and frame it with bands of embroidery. There is also an embroidered plastron and collar. The plastron is framed with folded braces, and the belt is also made in the same style.

In my second picture I set before you

OUT-DOOR COSTUMES FOR YOUNG AND OLD.

In the figure on the right a very charming out-door costume for a tiny Miss. The materials necessary to fashion it are two kinds of woolen stuff, one plain and the other lozenge dotted. The plastron, which is the same back and front, and the epaulets and cuffs are of plain material. The ribbon belt is tied on one side. The hat, which goes with this costume is a red straw trimmed with white crepe, in a band around the crown, and also set crestwise on the top of the crown. The figure on the left is clad in a gray princess walking dress, trimmed with galoon, as indicated. The hat worn with this dress is an open-work straw, blue brown, garnished with a garland of mauve flowrets. At the fronts there are jet wings and lace aigrette; at the back a bow of mauve velvet and strings of same material.

Long skirts of the Kate Greenaway style should be used with great discretion, even in cold weather. Such gowns are really not fitted for walking purposes at all, and many a child gets its first lessons in stiff and awkward carriage by being rolled up in these so-called picturesque costumes. Every child in good health has far more vitality than he or she has any use for, and it must be worked off in swift motions and semi-boisterous play, the limbs, particularly, being left free and untrammelled. Short skirts, therefore, should be the rule as the warm weather comes on, and gowns should be straight and loose and not loaded down with heavy sashes. Very pretty effects are attained by trimming the skirt and cuffs with bands of velvet ribbon of a darker shade than the dress, the ribbon also being used to simulate the yoke.

You will find a charmingly picturesque little gown represented in my third illustration. It may be made up in various materials, but more appropriately in crepon, silk or printed goods. The blouse and tight sleeves should be of plain goods. The particular charm of this costume lies in the original use made of a fichu effect. You get here a back view of it, showing how it discloses a round yoke. In front the two ends cross and terminate on the shoulders, where the ends hook. There is a straight ruched collar. The upper sleeves are made very full and are gathered on the tight sleeve at the elbow.

Beyond all doubt, the craze for child actresses, child elocutionists and child dancers will follow the throngs which betake themselves to the summer resorts, and we shall have dancing and acting and tableaux in the hotel parlors. This craze has not only come upon the parents but upon the little ones, too, and they have uttered many a plaintive wail when the strong hand of the law has interfered to prevent them from performing in public. These tiny Carmencitas have bobbed up on all sides like so many little fairies attired for fancy dress balls, and just as the music has struck up and they take their positions for the first step, some black-whiskered officer of the law has raised his hand and stopped the performance, like an evil-minded Kobold bent upon malicious mischief. It is really too bad. But fortunately these grim-visaged goblins will have no power to enter the hotel parlors and stop the dancing there; so many a little elfin is looking forward to her debut this summer, with eyes full of the flowers that shall be showered upon her, and ears full of the applause that shall fall to her happy lot. In my fourth illustration I show you one of these wee performers as she will appear when ready to bound into the hotel parlor. She is clad in a lovely little costume, her gown being in white silk gauze, garlanded with white roses, while a loose sash of garnet surah encircles her waist and is tied in a large bow at her back. Her stockings and gloves are gray and her Cinderella slippers white, of course. To complete the picture, we shall only need to have her lag sister wearing a sugar-loaf hat, watching over her like a fairy godmother, and ready to snatch her away when the clock strikes midnight.

In the way of headgear for little heads, the mothers should be careful not to make choice of large flowers for garniture, so that the child may not seem to be wearing her big sister's hat. In my last illustration I give you a very good example of a becoming hat for a little Miss—a yellow straw, ornamented with a garland of daisies and bows of straw-colored ribbon. Certain flowers have a young look about them, even when full blown, and they are the ones to make choice of for children's hats. All wild flowers go well with youthful faces and are particularly becoming for such as have the wild woodland air about them. No one would think of setting orchids, or peonies, or tulips, or poppies, or tiger-lilies on a child's hat. Would not daisies, or heather, or wild roses, or forget-me-nots, or pansies, or apple-blossoms be more appropriate? A very becoming bit of headgear for some children is the wide-brimmed fancy straw with a Sicilian crown, which is of silk or woolen stuff, striped something like a liberty cap, and has a silk tassel that falls gracefully over the brim.

Scotch plaids make up very prettily for little misses, the yokes being cut straight and the dress being set-off by a deep velvet corselet, harmonizing with one of the colors of the plaid, and made with braces having bows on the shoulders. The puffed sleeves should be cut straight and the deep cuffs bias. I have not presumed to talk modes to the youngsters. They are bigger men than their fathers nowadays, and scorn to have the family seamstress experiment upon them. Even their knickerbockers must be tailor-made, and their ties have nothing of the home-made look about them.

Evolution of the Harvester.
The original cave dweller—fear child of the working scientist—harvested his wheat crop by going out to his field and gnawing off the heads of the grain with his active jaws. The plan had its advantages and also its disadvantages—on the whole our able progenitor longed for something better. Then there arose a thoughtful paleozoic inventor who pointed out that the grain could be pulled up by the roots and the heads thrashed out in the palm of the hand. This satisfied our esteemed ancestor, and matters ran along thus for a few hundred thousand years; indeed, I claim the working scientist's privilege to be vague as to years. Let us throw overboard the cave-dweller, for that matter, and come along down to modern times. Let us begin with the sickle, for instance.

You may still find old men who will tell you that they can remember when farmers in this country had nothing but the sickle with which to handle their wheat and rye. A dozen men worked in single file, and cut the grain with one hand and gathered it on the other arm, stopping every "round" to drink earnestly out of a big jug of New England rum or Pennsylvania whisky. Then came the cradle—a scythe with "fingers" on it—which made the grain lie straight. Many farmers have a cradle yet for corners and odd nooks. With it one man cut down the grain and another bound it into sheaves. Then rose a direct descendant of the paleozoic genius, and invented a reaper drawn by horses. This was in the '30s, say. A man drove, and a small boy sat on a low seat and raked off the grain in gables. He was practically the same small boy who used to pull the strings that worked the cut-off valve in the first steam engine. He soon lost his occupation in both instances—in the case of the reaper they invented the mechanical rake. It took five men to follow on foot to bind up what the reaper cut down. Still the farmer wasn't satisfied. So they made him the harvester. Two men besides the driver rode on this, and bound the grain as it was brought up on an endless apron to where they stood. They had an awning over them and were very comfortably situated. This was in the '70s. Still the agriculturist fretted. Then he got the self-binder, which he has yet, though he is beginning to find fault with it and talks about electricity.—Harper's Weekly.

Table Manners.
Probably there is no people in the world so uncivilized as not to have among themselves a code of manners, more or less strictly defined. Mr. Bishop, while on his thousand-mile walk across South America, was impressed with this fact. He described a rude meal which he shared with a company of cart-drivers—"almost savage gauchos"—in whose company he was then traveling.

We encamped near a swamp, and supped upon sliced pumpkins, boiled with bits of meat, and seasoned with salt. The meal was served in genuine pampa fashion: one iron spoon and two cow's horns, split in halves, were passed around the group, the members of which squatted upon their haunches, and freely helped themselves from the kettle.

Even in this most uncivilized form of satisfying hunger there is a peculiar etiquette, which the most lowly peon invariably observes. Each member of the company in turn dips his spoon, or horn, into the center of the stew, and draws it in a direct line toward him, never allowing it to deviate to the right or to the left.

By observing this rule, each person eats without interfering with his neighbor. Being ignorant of this custom, I dipped my horn into the mess at random, and fished about for some of the nice bits.

My companions regarded this horrid breach of politeness with scowls of impatience. They declared with some warmth to the cook, that gringos did not know how to eat, and, "as they lived upon dogs in their own distant country, they came to the great Argentine Republic to get food and grow fat on the gauchos."

I apologized as well as I could, and endeavored thereafter to eat according to gaucho etiquette.

How Horses Feed in Norway.
A traveler in Norway says that the horses in that country have a very sensible way of taking their food, which perhaps may be beneficially followed here. They have a bucket of water put down beside their allowance of hay. It is interesting to see with what relish they take a sip of the one and a mouthful of the other alternately, sometimes only moistening their mouths, as a rational being would do while eating a dinner of such dry food. A broken-winded horse is scarcely ever seen in Norway, and the question is whether the mode of feeding has not something to do with the preservation of the animal's respiratory organs.

A Precious Cap.
One of the finest opals in the world is worn on his cap by the Chinese Minister at Washington. It is as large as a pigeon's egg, and is surrounded by diamonds. The value of the cap, with its ornament, is placed at $5,000.

THE WOMENS CHOICE.

For President

GEN'L JAMES B. WEAVER.

For Vice President

GEN'L JAMES C. FIELD.

"G'd give us men? A time like this demands strong minds, great hearts, true faith and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie."

With this issue we end our first year as editor of this paper. Just twelve months ago we purchased the City and Farm Record and started the Farmer's Wife and from the very start we had hopes of success.

Our hopes and expectations have been more than realized. We have received a heartier support than we had any reason to expect. In all sections we have found earnest, sincere and patriotic co-workers who have bravely and nobly put their shoulders to the wheel and helped us along. They have written words of cheer, to all of which we would gladly respond by private letter, but lack of time forbids. They have sent us their subscriptions and devoted their time and energies to getting up clubs which is the best and most substantial aid they can possibly give us.

With scarcely an exception, wherever sample copies have been sent, either from the office or from our friendly co-workers, subscriptions have been received. For this we claim no credit; we ask no praise; we expect no commendation. It simply shows that our heart is in full sympathy with the wants and feelings of the people who are trying to save the Republic with all its blessings and privileges from the control of a Money Oligarchy.

The Farmer's Wife as heretofore will be published monthly. Politically it will be a staunch, reliable, aggressive Peoples Party advocate. As a newspaper it will be concise, correct, thorough and impartial. As a fireside visitor it will be chaste, entertaining, instructive.

It will be furthermore, what its name implies a Farmer's Wife—faithful, vigilant, sleepless, and brave; guarding and watching the husbands rights while they are at work or asleep, warning them of the approach of enemies; brave and fearless in exposing and denouncing dishonesty, frauds and shams in whatever guise they may appear.

We call on every man and woman to lend us your aid in making the Farmer's Wife one of the very best, send us your own subscription, get others to subscribe also. Remember we send Col. L. L. Polk's picture size 6x9 inches suitable for framing free to all who subscribe before Aug. 15th, try and send a club at once and get this premium.

The Christian Advocate: "The use of money in order to procure elections, of particular parties, has become so common, open and public as to be undenied and used either directly or indirectly to secure votes by what in reality is bribery."

"Now it is money that rules: it buys votes, it buys public affairs and it buys legislation, executive and sometimes judicial acts, all of which is done with the coobness and deliberateness of honest transactions. How long can honesty, fairness and just government exist under such circumstances? When wealth and political power combine what is to become of the mass of the common people?"

The republican financiers legislated against silver as a money metal because it was to high priced, now they are against it because it is to cheap. The true reason was that they were to deliver the people, body and soul, into the clutches of power—and they did so.

A man of infinite courage and manliness, and a broad-gauged, christian gentleman has paid man's last debt to nature. In our opinion few men were as well equipped as Mr. Polk to enter upon the larger duties of the other life. The gates has been ajar for him for many weeks and when they swung open he stepped through with the undaunted and smiling faith of a man who had lived up to his responsibilities and realized in his last moments that he had.

The inspired words of that honored man, L. L. Polk as he sleeps in death, who has done more than any other man to bring together the long severed north and south, only sink deeper into the hearts of America's sons as they realize he has gone forever. Here is one speech from the great and generous soul:

"I am standing now just behind the curtain and in full glow of the coming sunset. Behind me are the shadows on the track, before me lies the dark valley and the river. When I mingle with its dark waters I want to cast one lingering look upon a country whose government is of the people, for the people, and by the people."

Hurrah for the Blue and the Gray.

The women are for Weaver and Field.

Give us Weaver and Field and more women in office.

Give the laborer a chance to build a home; the farmer, to own a farm.

Some men are for equal suffrage because they are afraid of Mrs. Lease.

People Party conventions "Keep in the middle of the road" is the motto.

It was a wise thing for the Democrats in Kansas to endorse the people's ticket.

The people's party state ticket in Kansas is the best ever nominated by any party.

The editor attended the Omaha convention and our paper is a little late this month.

Woman's suffrage is assured in Kan. Both the people's party and republicans have a plank in their respective platforms.

The Woman's conference in Omaha decided for Weaver and against Gresham he could not have been nominated even if he had agreed to accept.

There is but one money as there is but one God. The placing of one dollar, be it gold, silver or paper, below that of another should be considered a crime punishable by death.

The people nominated Weaver and the politicians got left as is usual and nearly all of the people's party state conventions so far held have put a suffrage plank in their platform.

Remember we send Hon. L. L. Polk's picture free to all subscribers of the Farmer's Wife with our August issue, those who time expires are requested to renew so as not to lose an issue.

Dear sisters, watch every man that bobs his head up for office, see to it that he favors woman's suffrage, if he is not for us he is against us, be sure he is defeated no matter what party he belongs to if he is not right on this question.

We are not standing here before you begging for sympathy, or for charity. But in the name of true American manhood, we stand before the world and demand justice. As honorable men, would not ask more, and as honorable men we will not accept less.—L. L. Polk.

The national convention at Omaha is the only one that ever dared to recognize the women and so declared it in the following terms:

That the forces of reform this day organized and will never cease to move forward until every wrong is remedied, and equal rights and equal privileges securely established for all the men and women of this country.

And although Mrs. Susan B. Anthony was at the convention she never said thanks. The fact is she don't want equal suffrage unless she can get it through the republican party. She will never get it in that direction. The republican party had it in their power once to grant women her rights but refused to do so and equal rights to all will only be secured through the reform movement.

Their was a band of noble, brave women from nearly every state in the union at the Omaha convention. We wish that we were able this issue to give them all a personal review but that is out of the question, but if we do it unto one, so should we do it until all. Suffice to say they were of the best, noblest and purest women of our nation. It was our first greeting with many of these ladies and we met them only to love them one and all and may our friendship never grow less will be our fervent prayer.

I attended the Minneapolis convention says a prominent republican equal suffragist woman and I found it a drunken mob. I attended the Chicago convention and found that no improvement, but when I come here to Omaha and see every state represented with a delegation as large as both republican and democrats combined and fail to see a person with even the perfume of alcoholic spirits about him I say to myself surely this is the party of reform. Long may it live.

When Mrs. Foster went before the republican platform committee in Kansas and they accepted her suffrage plank she supposed she was doing a great thing for the women but when she stops to consider that the republican party has no show whatever to elect but a small percentage of the upper and lower house and not the slightest idea of electing the state ticket it will be easy for her to conceive how willing the republicans are to do good after the power has passed out of their hand. No Mrs. Foster's will come in Kansas and by the people's party only.

While at Omaha we had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Cummings from Florida. Mrs. Cummings is an editor of two papers. It can be truly said of her that she is an accomplished business woman. She had been taking in the political conventions as they came in turn. She said that she went to the republican convention searching for the eloquent James Blaine and when she was doomed to see the grand old man laid upon the shelf, she wept bitter tears for the defeat of a man whom she loved so well that she had turned both of her papers over to him, and had used both brain and pen to help him to attain the position that he so craved, hence her remorse when she was compelled to witness his defeat. But having the curiosity with which her sex as endowed with, the thought she would take a peep in the democratic convention and with her lacerated heart still aching she lent her voice to aid in booming the much feted New York Hero, David B. Hill, and for a time it seemed as if she was to be rewarded for her trouble and that her choice would be the winner in the race. But alas, she was doomed to disappointment again. And for the second time defeat stared her in the face. So she bid adieu to the grand old man back convention and was about to retrace her steps homeward when she took up a paper and espied a notice of the people's party convention at Omaha, and she said I will visit that grand convention perhaps there I may find a pause for my wounded heart. And when she reached the city of Omaha and met the grand, noble representative women from every state in the union, she exclaimed surely this is grand! who can say this is not a people's party convention, when mother's with babes in their arms are taking a part and when she saw how those noble men gave the women their choice for the president she wept for joy and exclaimed this is indeed wonderful. If this body of men and women here represent the rank and file of the people's party, from this time on I will be one of you. And I will go home and both my papers shall be run in the interest of the party, who take the mothers by the hand and say your interests are ours, we are one, and so not only brother of north and south are united but the sisters open their arms with sisterly love and say from this time on their shall be no north and south, and that one flag shall wave for men and women alike. Let everybody say amen.

From Aunt Louisa.

For the FARMER'S WIFE.

Dear Sister:—As our dear, old, southern grand-mother would say, "How do you all" wash? Not, do you still keep up the regulation, "2 suds, 1 boil, 2 rinses," or have you adopted one of the many new methods, for I, who have grown grey over the wash-board, know white clothes can be secured in more ways than one.

But it was not the clothes of which I was thinking, as I begin my weeks washing, to-day, but, the "tiredness of it," and I wondered how many of you have learned to overcome this tiredness by thought. To those who have never tried, or, are incredulous, let me say, try it next week. It will help you; it may also help some one else. If there are letters you should write study them out while you wash. If the thoughts are in danger of taking wings, place a slate, or paper, and pencil conveniently near, (also a chair) and cage some of the best at odd times. Do not shake your head at the idea. How many hastily written lines could you pen in five minutes? And two or three five minutes will help the tiredness wonderfully.

If you do not care to write, think. There are tons of "food for thought"—nowadays. The labor question, temperance, our right to vote, anything, save that "big dirty washing," and "how tired we shall be at suppertime." Do not, I beg of you, think, as you place the boiler on the stove, "It will just be my usual wash-day luck to have John forget the wood," neither must you tire yourself, in advance of the days work, by the thought that, "there is not another woman anywhere, who has such washings and so little strength." "You imagine I have washed that way?" Bless you! yes; But, because one has walked in a rough path is no reason one need keep on in it, when near by, is a smooth one going the same way.

There are women and ways and ways and women and no one woman can lay down plans that will exactly suit another woman's case, yet, if some of you, to whom washing day is a "necessary horror," will try my thinking plan it will surprise you. When the weary day is done and the snowy clothes on the line are drying, there will be no haunting memory of unkind thoughts, or words, given the loved ones placed in your keeping, but, instead there may be thoughts stored away which will help not only you but others. My best thoughts have come to me through the soap bubble, and that too, when the washing was by no means a light one, and the girls were all in school.

I suppose we will never, in this century at least, fully understand the influence of the mind upon the body, but the most ignorant of us know it to be great. It were better then, if we, not only on wash days but all other days also, would keep our minds buoyant by "looking forward not back, upward not down."

Heart-sick.

TOPEKA, KANSAS.

Mrs. EMMA D. PACK,

Dear Madam:

Please send to my address a copy of the Farmer's Wife and oblige a Patron of Industry and a worker for People's party principles. We have lived in Wisconsin for forty four years, and never experienced such hard times to make a living on the farm as we have experienced within the last few years. Oh! it makes my heart sick to witness the want and suffering there is here among the laboring classes, it makes me shudder to think what the end will be if we do not get relief soon. We have a lodge of P. of I., in our district numbering forty members and we do not think there is a member that will vote with either of the old parties, if the third party will put in nomination good, clean, straight honest workers of reform, if you are trying to help the suffering people out of the mire, God give wisdom and strength to you, is our prayer. We saw your paper mentioned in Pomeroy's Advance Thought.

SONG OF THE SYNDICATE.

J. K. KILBOURN.

Let us gather up the sunbeams
Lying all around our path,
Get a trust on wheat and roses,
Give the poor the thorns and chaff.
Let us find our chiefest pleasure
Hoarding bounties of to-day,
So the poor shall have scant measure
And two prices have to pay.
Yes, we'll reservoir the rivers,
And we'll levy on the lakes,
And we'll lay a trifling toll tax
On each poor man who partakes.
We will brand his number on him
That he'll carry through his life,
We'll apprentice all his children:
Get a mortgage on his wife.
We will capture 'em the w n l god
And confine him in a cave;
And then, through our patent process,
We the atmosphere will save.
Thus we'll squeeze our little brother,
When he tries his lungs to fill;
Put a meter on his windpipe
And present our little bill.
We will syndicate the starlight,
And monopolize the moon:
Claim a royalty on res-days—
A proprietary no-n.
The right of way through ocean's spray
We'll pay just what it's worth.
We'll drive our stakes around the lakes
In fact, we'll own the earth.

FROM CONGRESSMAN CLOVER'S SPEECH.

Gentlemen tell us that the poor widows and orphans of New England would suffer greatly by the passage of this bill. They tell us that the widows and orphans are the money loaners of that locality, and that it would be cruelty in the extreme to distress them. Of course, this statement is all for effect, and should not command respect enough for a reply, and I would not notice it now, were it not an insult to the intelligence of every American citizen, and I know of no better answer than was given by the late Senator Plumb, of Kansas, when this oft-repeated and dishonest statement was made in the senate of the United States during the Fifty-first congress. He said:

"Whenever the question of money comes up, and any move is made that looks toward relief for the people who are struggling under their load of debt, in consequence of the contraction of the currency and a shrinking in the value of their property, this New England widow is promptly brought out and made to do duty over and over again; but behind her ample skirts you can always find a Wall street gold-bug concealed."

Mr. Speaker, this traditional widow is a "myth," a "phantasy," an "iridescent dream," of the over-worked brain of the honest dollar advocates, and has become a very old and musty chestnut. Poor widows and orphans are not in the money-lending business, except as they are found at the interest-paying and not the interest-receiving end of the line.

IS MEASURED BY ITSELF.

From the Pittsburg Dispatch.

A case of extremely shallow special pleading is indulged in by the Boston Herald, in reply to a correspondent, who asks if there has been in the last twenty years any fluctuation in the market price of an ounce of gold. The Herald replies: "Not a particle. Fine gold has been worth $20.67 per ounce all the time. As gold is the standard of value, it cannot fluctuate, unless there should be an alteration of its standard rating either here or in Europe."

This relies for its correctness solely on the technical definition of the words "market price." But the attempt to create the impression that there is no variation in the exchange value or purchasing power, is disingenuous, to say the least. To allege that because gold is the standard of value it cannot fluctuate, but remains worth $20.67 per ounce, is equal to the assertion that, measured by itself, any staple will remain the same. It would be just as pertinent to declare that because a hundred bushels of wheat now is exact, the same same as a hundred bushels of wheat twenty years ago, therefore wheat has not fluctuated.

As a matter of logic the statement is really worse. The assertion is made in the interest of gold mono-metalism; but if the standard of value cannot fluctuate a deduction to an opposite effect is possible. It is that if silver had been retained as the standard of value it would not have fluctuated any more than gold.

Worth of a Character.

[By FANNY FENTRILLS.]

For the FARMER'S WIFE.

Read not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider.

[Lord Bacon.]

The present century—a volcanic isle that glows, works, trembles, and heaves—should at length have discovered and learnt from the political colossus who is now standing on the borders of the two centuries, through the victories of his sea-fishers, tolling hither and thither, the contents and worth of a character; for character is a rock on which stranded sailors land and the head strong are wrecked.

[Richter.]

Before presenting my crude thoughts on the subject of Culture of Morals in the Home, I deem a cursory glance at our present political situation necessary as forming a basis for the arguments which I propose to introduce.

It seems evident that our country is undergoing a crisis which, if it fulfils the promise of its dawn, will be second to the greatest that has transpired since the establishment of the union. The entire social, political and educational worlds are becoming intensely agitated. Even some of the religious denominations are catching the fever and think to shake the world to its foundation by a slight change in a creed that was drawn up by fallible man!

This cry of reform which had its birth in the school room—thanks to teachers, those earnest, hardworked, unappreciated servants of the public—has become the pass-word of the Republic, and is being shouted from class to class with that earnest and persistence that warrants ultimate success.

Since there is nothing under the sun that man has created that will not admit of improvement, I'm convinced that they are all right, that a radical reformation in every phase of our social and political economy, is seriously needed.

But before discussing remedies to be applied to evils, would it not be prudent to search for the causes which produced the evils?

The great calamity which threatens our people at present is financial disaster. Legislation is in the hands of legislators who, in a republic, are elected by the people; there follows the corollary that the people are responsible for the trouble. But the people claim that universal opinion does not rule in our legislative halls in that both the making and the execution of laws are fraudulent being chiefly influenced by bribery. Now, to claim that all, or majority, of the rulers of a republic are corrupt, argues very forcibly that the people from whom they come are corrupt at least to a considerable degree. If not so, why do they elect bad men to fill their offices? Here the ballot reformers come in and claim that we cannot have an honest expression of preference at the polls, that we must adopt a method of balloting which will prevent fraud. There will never be an honest ballot until we have honest men to cast the ballot and honest men to take charge of it. It seems to me that the unpalatable truth forces itself upon us that our moral standard both in public and private life is too low—if we have any moral standard at all. Honest, far-seeing Herbert Spencer has warned us in this danger, that our country yet being in a state of crude civilization, our attention is directed too much to commercial interests and that we do not appreciate the value of a high moral standard.

George William Curtis, in Harper's Magazine July or August, 1891, calls attention to the same fact. In words similar to these, he says that our ideals of public life are lower than they were in the days of Washington. "There is no surer evidence of decadence," he says, "than the disposition to excuse our own unquestionable delinquencies by alleging the peccadilloes of others. Shall we be content to steal because somebody else lied? Shall we insist on bribing voters and buying elections to day because a hundred years ago Rhode Island clung to paper money and New York held slaves. He then declares the tendency of political method to demoralization, and insists that the facts and statements are a consideration of public duty. "It is not statesmanship to be content with extolling our greatness and prosperity, nor patriotism to insist that we are as our fathers." In regard to moral worth of public men he says, "Our true greatness is not in our institutions, but in ourselves. Institutions of the best design may be perverted. The ship of state may be triply plated, and of majestic port, but its captain and his crew that assure a prosperous voyage." So says hoary history from year to year, but she speaks as a chattering sybil to the great herd that pass unheeding by. It seems for us the wise men of all time have lived almost in vain. The doctrine of earnestness of purpose and Godly conduct have been preached to the world by all of the philosophers and great good men in all times—from Socrates and Cato to Carlyle and Spencer; from Christ and his apostles to Spurgeon, Beecher and Talmadge—the oracles of truth, as from an everlasting Delphic cavern, ring eternally upon the ears of the world and yet it seems that true greatness and right principles of action are ignored by the public or forgotten. It frequently appears to an earnest observer that is indeed a world of sham greatness, in which all that is great is little esteemed, and what is trifling and present is alone held, important—where everything is custom and nothing duty and the whole ruling principle in the world is selfishness. That thought is neither comforting nor inspiring and for one—I have not just reached the age of pessimism—shall not solace myself with the belief that there is yet salt enough in our world to save it; tho' I do allow that the salt is not easily accessible at present nor in any very great demand.

The men of staple character, of unquestionable skill and undoubted ability, seem to be hard to find to be put into office. The truth of it is, he isn't wanted. Political parties are searching for the man who can lead the party to victory and in their zeal for party supremacy, I'm inclined to think that moral worth is the least considered as a requisite for a candidate, forgetting that it is a man of abiding principles that can be absolutely relied upon in any place. The deepest seed of our day is a man. A man in that God-given sense of the word—made in the image of his Maker. A man with a well trained will, an enlightened mind and a richly endowed manhood that lustrous crown of glory that graces the heroic type of his sex, and entitles him to a distinction of Nature's noblemen. This man is needed alike in private and public. He is needed in the chair of state. The man who, after having duly enlightened his mind and having weighed his opinion by those of wise counsellors, will then stand by his convictions of duty as firmly as Gibraltar stands upon the surf-beaten shore clearing the storm waves into ripples at its feet and shattering the mountain crests of evil temptation in crusty wreaths of foam flake. That is the man who is needed to fill the sacred charge of Chief Executive. You think that you could not find him? Well, I think that I could, and I should like to be sole Autocrat of the Nation just long enough to name my successor.

There are other points of interest that I should like to notice, but being at variance with the nature of this article will pass by. I leave these thoughts briefly stated to the consideration of my readers, trusting that they will endeavor to discover and appreciate the ideas not pausing to criticize the rude dress in which they are presented.

The central idea that I would impress upon your mind is that the great desideratum, which seems not to be considered as a desideratum at all, the one great fault of the time is, proper appreciation of the worth of a true character. It is one of the great themes of human thought and demands the serious attention of every citizen of the republic. We may exhaust human skill and ingenuity on legislating and in constructing methods of relief and reform, and yet if we forget that "our true worth must exist in ourselves," we are rearing an edifice upon sinking sand which even the very eddying tides will endanger. If we do not wish our schemes to prove a fleet of glass wrecked on a reef of imaginary silver, we must endeavor to utilize plans that will afford, not only present, but permanent relief; and for that work I say we need men—men who have been trained from the cradle to the threshold of manhood to walk in ways that are pure and undefiled. To be a happy and prosperous people, we must drink more deeply of the well-springs of knowledge—must imbibe more of the spirit of perennial truth. We must light our camp torches, as it were, at the camp fires of past struggles and walk unswervingly in the illuminated way that former experience makes known. We must delve in the inexhaustible mines of philosophy and the hoary archives of history for the materials with which we construct our national institution. We must build for time and build for eternity and build upon a foundation of imperishable rock.

Again I repeat that the most essential need of our day is the true valuation of character; that the most important era in the formation of character is infancy; and that it rests with fathers and mothers to mould the future destiny of our country. Would that parents felt more seriously their responsibility!

So I propose to call the attention of women to the fact that mothers of men, are the mothers of their country, and begin at the beginning, and plant my standard of reform where Christ and Plato and Pestalozzi stood theirs, by the cradle, the vestibule of man's life. The father who rears one pure christian and good citizen does more for his country than if he led victorious host on gory battlefield; and a mother who gives a father to his country, blesses this and all succeeding ages with her image and consecrated life.

Oh, parents! Ye who rear for home and for country, for time and for eternity, how sacred your charge!

THE END.

Stomach Full of Lizards.

It is reported that a post mortem examination of Daniel Mummet, who recently died in Adams County, Pennsylvania, found his stomach literally alive with lizards. He had been suffering for some time with what the doctors called pulmonary consumption. A short time ago he was seized with a violent fit of vomiting and threw up six small lizards. He gradually sank and at his death an examination was held with the aforementioned results. It is said that he traveled about a good deal, frequently drinking from roadside springs, and it is thought that he swallowed the lizards in the water, though no theory is advanced as to how the lizards managed to resist the action of the gastric juices and to escape smothering.

Both Your Jars.

Earthen and stoneware jars or crocks should be filled with cold water and put over a slow fire and allowed to come to a boil once or twice before using to cook in.

The greatest curse in the world is jealousy. Nine out of ten domestic troubles originate in it. More than half the murders in the world are committed through its influence. It is a guest that no man or woman who ever entertained, could afterward get rid of. Institutes should be opened to cure those afflicted with it, for it ruins more homes than drink. It is the shadow that follows love, and the happier and more blessed the love makes you, the darker and more cursed the cloud of jealousy will leave you.

OMAHA PLATFORM

We, the People, Make a New Declaration.

The Nation Brought to the Verge of Moral, Political and Material Ruin—Corruption Dominates—The People Are Demoralized by Bribery.

Assembled on the 16th anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, the people's party of America, in first national convention, invoking upon their action the blessing of Almighty God, puts forth in the name and on behalf of the people of this country, the following preamble and declaration of principles: The conditions which surround us most justify our cooperation, we meet in the midst of a nation brought to the verge of moral, political and material ruin; corruption dominates the ballot box, legislatures and congress and courts; even the exercise of the franchise is largely controlled by the money power; the people are demoralized; most of the states have been compelled to isolate voters at polling places to prevent universal intimidation or bribery. Newspapers are largely owned by monopolies; public opinion silenced; business prostrated; our homes covered with mortgages; labor impoverished and lands concentrated in the hands of capitalists. Urban workmen are denied the right of organization for self-protection; imported, pauperized labor beats down their wages; a hireling, standing army, unrecognized by our laws, is established to shoot them down and they are rapidly degenerating into European conditions; the fruits of civilization are being lost; the struggle for the colossal fortunes for the few, unprecedented in the history of mankind, and the possessors of these in turn despise the republic and endanger liberty; from the same prolific womb of governmental injustice we breed two great classes—tramps and millionaires; the national power to create money is appropriated to enrich bondholders; the vast public debt, payable in legal tender currency, has been funded into gold-bearing bonds, thereby adding millions to the burdens of the people; silver, which has been accepted as coin since the dawn of history, has been demoted to add to the purchasing power of gold by decreasing the value of all forms of property as well as human labor and the supply of currency is purposely abridged to fatten usurers, bankrupt enterprise and enslave industry; a vast conspiracy against mankind has been organized on the two continents and is rapidly taking possession of the world; if it is not met and overthrown at once it forebodes a terrible social convulsion, the destruction of civilization or the establishment of absolute despotism; we have witnessed for more than a quarter of a century the struggles of the two great political parties for power and plunder, which grievous wrongs have been inflicted upon the suffering people; we charge that the controlling influences dominating both these parties are the same, the money power, and the conditions to develop without serious effort to prevent or restrain them; neither do they now promise us any substantial reform; they have agreed together to ignore in the coming campaign, every issue but one; they propose to drown the outcries of the plundered people with the uproar of a sham battle over tariff, so that capital, corporations, national banks, trusts, watered stocks, demagogues and the oppressors of the people may be all right sight; if they propose to sacrifice our homes, lives and children on the altar of mammon; to destroy the multitude in order to secure corruption funds from millionaires, we repudiate the celebration of the birthday of the nation, and filled with the spirit of the grand generation who established our independence, we seek to restore the government of the republic to our hands, the "plain people," with which class it originated; we assert our purpose to be identical with the purposes of the national constitution; to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for common defense, promote general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity; we declare that this republic can only endure as a free government built upon the love of the whole people for each other and for the nation; that we cannot be joined together by the bayonet; that the civil war is over, and that every passion and resentment which grew out of it must die with it, and that we must, in fact, as we are in name, become a united brotherhood of free men; we earnestly fling itself confront by conditions for which there is no precedent in this world; our annual agricultural productions amount to billions of dollars in value, which must, in a few weeks or months be exchanged for billions of dollars worth of commodities of other productions; that the currency supply is wholly inadequate to make this exchange, and the results are falling off of prices, the formation of combines and rings, and the impoverishment of the producing class; we pledge ourselves that, if given the power, we will labor to correct these evils by wise and reasonable legislation, in accordance with the terms of our platform; we believe that the powers of government, in other words the people, should be expanded (as in case of the postal service) as rapidly and as far as the good sense of an intelligent people and the teachings of experience shall justify, to the end that oppression, injustice and poverty shall eventually cease in this land; with our sympathies, as the party of reform, are naturally upon the side of every proposition which will tend to make men intelligent, virtuous and temperate, we nevertheless regard these questions, important as they are, as secondary to the great issues now pressing for solution, and upon which not only our individual prosperity, but the very existence of our free institutions depend; and we ask all men first to help us to determine whether we are to have the republic to administer before we differ as to the conditions upon which it is to be administered; believing that the forces of reform this day organized will never cease to move forward until every wrong is remedied and lawful rights and equal privileges securely established for all men and women in this country, we declare therefore:

First—That the union of the labor forces of the United States, this day consummated, shall be permanent and perpetual; may its spirit enter into all hearts for the salvation of mankind.

Second—Wealth belongs to him who creates it, and every dollar taken from industry without equivalent is robbery;—if any will not work, neither shall he eat; the interests of the rural and civic laborer are the same; their enemies are identical.

Third—We believe that the time has come when railroad corporations will withdraw from the people the money now in the hands of the people, and should the government enter upon the work of owning and managing any or all railroads, we should favor an amendment to the constitution by which all such property, in government service shall be placed under civil service regulations so as to prevent an increase of the power of the national administration by the use of such additional government employees.

Fourth—We demand the currency, safe, sound and flexible, issued by the general government only, a legal tender for all debts, public and private, and that without the use of banking corporations, a just, equitable, efficient means of distribution direct to the people, a tax upon a dollar of interest, per annum to be provided as set forth in the sub-treasury plan of farmers' alliance, or a better system; also by payments in the discharge of its obligations for public improvement.

Fifth—We demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the legal ratio of 16 to 1. We demand that the amount of circulating medium be steadily increased to not less than $50 per capita. We demand a graduated income tax. We believe that the money of the country should be kept as much as possible in the hands of the people, and hence we demand that all state and national revenues shall be limited to the necessary expenses of the government, economically and honestly administered. (2) We demand that postal savings banks be established by the government for the safe deposit of the earnings of the people to facilitate exchange.

Sixth—Transportation, being a method of exchange and a public necessity, the government shall own and operate the railroads in the interest of the people. (A) The telegraph and telephone, like the postoffice system, being a necessity for the transportation of intelligence, shall be owned and operated by the government in the interest of the people.

Land.—Land, including all natural sources of wealth, is the heritage of the people, and should not be monopolized for speculative purposes, and the alien ownership of land should be prohibited. All land now held by railroad and other corporations, in excess of their actual needs, and all lands now owned by aliens, should be reclaimed by the government and held for actual settlers.

Spanish Riots.

MADRID, July 7.—A riotous mob tried to force the prison at Calahorra, in old Castile, with the object of rescuing the convicts confined therein. The mob met resistance, and the rioters then beset the barracks to prevent the guard coming out, while others burned the houses of municipal councillors. The troops of Logrono were sent for and they soon quelled the rioting. The population at Calahorra is greatly excited, and further trouble is expected.

Favorable Crop Conditions.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 7.—The past week was cooler than usual throughout the district east of the Rocky mountains. Seasonable conditions of moisture remain substantially the same as reported last week, except in the lower lake region and on the Atlantic coast, where there has been a marked increase in the seasonable rainfall.

In Kansas.—All conditions favorable to corn and harvest. Spring wheat in good condition; oats in need of rain; a splendid wheat harvest in general progress; corn growing rapidly.

In Missouri the wheat and clover harvests are nearing completion in the southern, progressing in the central, and beginning in the northern portion. Oats are ripening and corn generally clean with much improved color; disastrous hail storms in the west and central portion; slightly cool for corn, but model harvest weather, with the outlook steadily improving.

In Oklahoma.—Wheat threshing and oats harvesting continues; corn and all other crops in most excellent condition.

The War at Homestead, Pa.

PITTSBURGH, Pa., July 7.—It is estimated that the shut down in this city alone will cause a loss of earnings of half a million dollars a week.

Affairs at Homestead have assumed an ugly phase and serious trouble is apprehended. Frick, chairman of the Carnegie Steel company, appealed to Sheriff McCleary for protection, and in compliance with his request ten deputies were sent to Homestead. They were met at the station by 2,000 workmen and quietly escorted to the river, where they were placed upon the steam tug Edna and ordered to return to the city. Previous to sending the deputies to Homestead, Sheriff McCleary posted a proclamation warning the men from interfering with new employees, or they will be dealt with according to law.

Added Planks.

The resolutions committee of the Omaha convention, after the platform had been adopted by the convention, submitted a supplement to the platform, which contained a declaration against the admission to the country of undesirable immigration; an anti-Pinkerton plank; a plank opposing the force bill; favoring the nationalizing of the Australian voting system. Chairman Branch moved the adoption of the supplemental resolutions, and his motion carried before the protestants had a chance to get a hearing. They protested against gag law and moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolutions were adopted. The motion to reconsider was lost.

An American Citizen Imprisoned.

NEWARK, N. J., July 7.—Charles Mink, Sr., says that he has learned by recent letters from Ebling, Wurttemberg, Germany, that Dr. Tragott Beck, of Newark, was arrested by the police for using disrespectful language towards the emperor. He met a man there who was formerly a resident of Newark, who tired of America and went back to Germany. During an argument they quarreled, when Beck used the language spoken of. Officers were called and Beck was imprisoned. He refused to take back what he said and was held, but friends are trying to have him released. He owns considerable property.

Cyclone in Maine.

NORTH BUCKFIELD, ME., July 7.—A cyclone passed over the towns of Harris, Buckfield, Sumner and Hartford. It first leveled a strip of forest, mowing a path twenty yards wide through the thick woods. Sweeping on, it blew dwellings from their foundations, smashed barn and farm buildings into kindling wood, killing several horses and destroying wagons, farm implements, etc., and carrying the debris long distances. Huge elm trees were twisted off fifteen or twenty feet from the ground. Several persons were injured in their homes, but not seriously.

Catholic Indians.

CHEYENNE, AGENCY, S. D., July 7.—The Catholic educational conference was addressed by Judge Swan and a large number of educated, young men and women, who testified to the efficiency and importance of the schools and urged all to attend. This resulted in hundreds of applications being made for admission to the government schools.

The Sealer Was Seized.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 7.—Assistant Secretary Spaulding received a telegram from a special treasury agent at Port Townsend, confirming the report that the British steamer Copillon, with a cargo of 6,000 seal skins on board, had been seized at Port Ethol, Alaska, by the revenue steamer Covrin for violation of the United States customs regulations.

An Enormous Steal.

BUFFALO, N. Y., July 7.—Startling figures have come to light concerning the National savings bank defalcation. The wildest guess has been outdone by cold facts. Only about half of the pass books have been examined and the defalcation figures up to the surprising amount of $426,636. These are the exact figures so far as the investigation has gone.

For New Chairman.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 7.—As W. J. Campbell has resigned from the chairmanship of the republican national committee, the following are mentioned for the place: Commissioner Carter, J. H. Manley of Maine, Samuel Fessenden of New Hampshire and Mr. Holart of New Jersey.

Wind Storm in Maryland.

CLAYTON, DEL., July 7.—A fierce storm of wind, rain and hail struck the vicinity of Church Hill, Queen Ann county, Maryland, and did considerable damage, but fortunately no lives were lost. For three-quarters of a mile houses, orchards, fences and crops were leveled to the ground.

Campbell to Resign.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 7.—Campbell will probably decline the chairmanship of the republican national committee. He is greatly embarrassed in undertaking the work by the fact that his wife is a confirmed invalid and that he could not afford to sacrifice his business interests.

Gives Up Stolen Money.

PITTSBURGH, Pa., July 7.—Of the $45,000 stolen from the United States Express company at Washington, June 21, the company has recovered $44,413. Ryan having spent but $187 of the stolen money. Ryan turned over the unspent money to the company's detectives.

Shrewd African Slave Dealers.

Arab slave dealers in East Africa are trying a new scheme to defeat Europeans bent upon suppressing the slave trade. It has been their practice to treat their weaker captives with great cruelty. They have now begun the policy of kindness and indulgence. The newly caught slaves are placed in the care of older bondsmen, receive plenty of food and drink, and are encouraged in the most dissolute and immoral practices. Thus gradually persuaded that slavery is really a rather pleasant thing they are taken to the coast without chains or other tokens that would betray their servile condition. They are loaded with merchandise, and, under the name of porters, both men and women are brought down to the sea in spite of the interdiction against this practice. The Arabs take care to tell their victims most horrible stories of European atrocities, and long before they get to the coast all whites are odious to the deluded blacks and they do not hesitate to tell every one that they are free, preferring to deny the fact that they are bondsmen rather than receive their freedom at the hands of the whites. This is the story the missionaries tell, and they add that it is a perplexing matter to distinguish a newly caught slave from a hired porter.—New York Sun.

THE POET'S LAMENT.

Some day, some day, I know not when,
It may be years and years, but then
Some day my heart shall leap for joy
And words of thanks my tongue employ,
For have I not assurance blest,
And eke a signature's attest,
That in the course of time to me
Shall come reward for industry?

Ah, yes, I need but patiently
To bide my time; and certainly
The day will come—Lord! haste it on—
When my sad eyes shall rest upon
The toiled-for, hoped-for, prayed-for thing
Which to my heart content will bring;
And then, oh, joy! my housekeeper
Will get what I am owing her.

The days and weeks and months have passed
And countless debts—for grub—I've amassed Expecting with each coming mail
The sight of a small cheque to hail;
But oh, my longing eyes greet not
The wherewithal to buy the pot.
Yet I may hope—I've hoped long while—
That fortune yet will on me smile.

I little recked when hunched in toil
Consuming of my midnight oil,
Narrating yarns, describing scenes
For story books and magazines
That I forever-and-a-day
Would have to wait on them for pay.
But, truth to tell, I find it so,
The most of them are awful slow.

I'll give them yet another chance
Mayhap it will my show enhance,
For getting what they've "booked" me for
A cunning little metaphor.
But if they make me longer wait
I'll strike an expeditious bait
And hunt a job, for much I feel
The need of a four-cornered meal!

DRIVEN TO MARRIAGE.

Everybody declared that Hugh Colewood ought to be the happiest man in Greenville.

He was young, handsome, and well educated; then, just as he was preparing to fight his way to fame with poverty arrayed against him, he had suddenly been made the sole heir to the fine old estate of his eccentric aunt, Miss Betsy Colewood, recently deceased, says a writer in the Boston Globe.

What more was necessary to the happiness of a gay young fellow like Hugh Colewood? Nothing, it seemed to the envious bachelors.

However, there were conditions, or one at least, in his aunt's will which caused him no little uneasiness. He must love and marry the girl of her choice, one whom he had never even seen.

Hugh Colewood caught up his aunt's last letter to him and read it again and again, hoping to find some little loophole of escape from the galling condition.

But it was there in merciless black and white. This is the part that worried him:

"If you cannot comply with my wishes for you to meet Ethel Wayne and love and marry her you forfeit your heirship to my estate. Ethel's mother was my dearest friend, and if you marry her daughter it will be fulfilling my fondest desires. You cannot help loving her.

"I could not rest in my tomb peacefully and know that Ethel was not mistress of my estates, and you, dear boy, the master. My lawyer, Mr. Cranston, will arrange for you to meet Ethel, as he is one of her guardians. You know how thoroughly I despise old bachelors, therefore I give you warning that I will not allow you to inhabit my houses and lands as one of that disagreeable, crusty order."

So had written the eccentric spinster. Hugh nibbled the ends of his mustache impatiently as he pondered on the conditions which the will imposed.

Hugh loved the Colewood estates, and could not bear to think of giving them up. Now, if the will had not specified whom he must marry, but left the selection of a wife entirely to himself, Hugh believed that he would have enjoyed the romance of hunting for a bride.

He picked up his hat and rushed from his room, going up to the hotel where Mr. Cranston was stopping while he arranged some business matters with Hugh.

"Hello, Colewood! Have a seat," said the lawyer, scrutinizing the flushed face and nervous manner of the visitor. He was just wondering to himself if the unexpected good fortune had turned young Colewood's head when his visitor remarked:

"You are aware of that one peculiar feature in my late aunt's will, Mr. Cranston?"

Light at once dawned upon the lawyer and there was a twinkle in his eyes. However, he asked indifferently:

"To what peculiar feature do you refer, Mr. Colewood?"

"The one that absurdly commands me to marry a girl that I have never seen."

"Oh, that," returned Mr. Cranston. "You are a lucky fellow, Colewood. That's the best part of the fortune."

"It's the most exasperating part," Hugh cried, desperately. "How can a fellow love and wed to order?"

"Well, it's a deal of time and bother saved to the wooer," remarked the lawyer, putting. "I've no doubt Ethel Wayne will suit you better than any selection you are capable of making."

Hugh Colewood flushed warmly at the lawyer's cool observation and he spoke hotly.

"I'm sure she won't suit me, sir. The estate can go to charity for all I care. I don't love any woman and I love my freedom too well to marry yet awhile. I don't want to be thrust upon any woman for the sake of a fortune, and I don't suppose Miss Wayne cares two straws about the absurd condition in my aunt's will."

"It is very likely, although Ethel had the greatest respect for the late Miss Colewood and was very careful to humor all her vagaries," returned Cranston, much amused over young Colewood's excitement. "However, I hardly feel able to state whether the girl would accept Miss Colewood's last great vagary in the shape of her nephew or not."

"I shall not give her the opportunity," said Hugh, nettled at the lawyer's words.

"Hold on, Colewood. Let's drop nonsense and come to business. You like your aunt's estates, but you cannot retain them without complying with her wishes. You have never met the girl whom your aunt has chosen. Perhaps it will be proved that you are neither of you opposed to fulfilling the condition."

"At least you must meet. I will arrange that. Ethel will pass the summer with my sister in the country, and I'll manage it for you to spend a few weeks with them. You can very soon tell whether the condition is wholly obnoxious or not. What do you say?"

"I will do as you advise, thank you, sir," replied Hugh, who had now cooled off and was trying to take a business view of the strange situation.

Four weeks later Hugh Colewood was speeding away from Greenville on the morning express, bound for a little town among the blue hills of Virginia.

When he stepped from the train he was disappointed to find no one waiting to convey him to the country home of Mr. Cranston's sister, a distance of eight miles.

He was in the act of asking the way to the best hotel when a buggy came rapidly up to the station and halted.

The station agent hurried forward to meet the driver, who was a slender young girl, with bright, dark eyes, and hair as golden as the June sunbeams touching those hills.

"Is Mr. Colewood of Greenville, waiting here to ride out to Mrs. Thurston's?" inquired the fair driver in a sweet voice which won Hugh's interest at once.

"I am here and waiting, thank you," returned Hugh for himself, smiling pleasantly as he came forward on the station platform.

"I came to drive you to Mrs. Thurston's," she answered simply.

"Shall I take the reins?" he asked as they started away.

"No, thank you; I like to drive," she answered.

"It was too bad for you to take so long a drive for a stranger," he remarked, as he stole a side glance of admiration at the girlish form in dainty blue.

"Oh, I didn't mind the distance at all; besides, I rather had to come," she replied. "I did wish to go with the young folks, who are having a picnic this morning over on Laurel Hill, but Uncle Jerry was sick and of course he couldn't come for you."

"Then Mrs. Thurston and Miss Wayne never drive, so they made a virtue of a necessity and sent the last resort of the place," and she laughed merrily.

"It is too bad my coming prevented you joining the picnicers," he said. "I shall not be able to forgive myself."

"That's nothing. I am enjoying myself now too well to think of Laurel Hill," she returned brightly.

"Thank you, and at the same time let me assure you that I, too, am enjoying myself excellently well," and Hugh bowed to the young girl, whose eyes dropped beneath the warm light of admiration in his blue ones.

"I hope you will enjoy your visit, Mr. Colewood," she said, to change the subject. "I know Mrs. Thurston and Ethel will do all they can to make your stay pleasant."

"Thank you; I've no doubt I shall find it pleasant," returned Hugh. "You, too, are one of Mrs. Thurston's summer household, I suppose?"

"Yes," with a smile. "You see, I am a distant relative to Mrs. Thurston; then Miss Wayne is my cousin, and exercises a kind of cousinly guardianship over me, which no doubt is very necessary."

"So you are Miss Wayne's cousin? I do not remember hearing Mr. Cranston mention you. I did not expect to have the pleasure of meeting any ladies but Mrs. Thurston and Miss Wayne."

"How unkind in Mr. Cranston not to prepare you for this meeting," and there was a roguish gleam in her eyes which Hugh did not see. "I had up to date regarded Mr. Cranston as one of my very best friends, but to ignore me so utterly, when he knew I would accompany Cousin Ethel here, looks like downright, intentional neglect."

"You have not given me the pleasure of knowing your name," said Hugh, both amused and pleased with his pretty driver.

"Oh, I'm a Wayne, too," she answered, laughingly. "Ethel Estella Wayne, variously nicknamed, as you will observe later on."

Two Ethel Waynes! Here was a real surprise for Colewood. Why had Cranston not mentioned that strange fact to him?

If the Ethel Wayne referred to in the will was only half as animated and generally captivating as the one by his side Hugh thought it might be an easy matter after all to obey that condition which had so vexed him.

Colewood received a cordial welcome at Mrs. Thurston's home. He found Miss Wayne to be a tall, dignified girl of about 23, with coal-black hair and deep gray eyes. She was as unlike her little merry-hearted cousin as it was possible to be.

Yes, Hugh decided she was just such a woman as his eccentric aunt would be likely to select as the wife of her heir.

In the weeks which followed Hugh's arrival he saw a great deal of Miss Wayne, although much of her time was divided between her taste for literature and in remonstrating against the innocent pranks of her cousin. It did not require a long time for the young man to realize that he could never love Miss Wayne as the man should love the girl whom he intends to marry.

He made another important discovery—that his life would be a future without the little cousin to furnish daily sunshine and wifely cheer for his own home.

He resolved to let Miss Wayne have one-half of his aunt's estates and the orphan asylum the other. He would marry the girl of his own choice, provided he could win her, and boldly fight his own way through life.

Having so decided Hugh set out for a stroll along the river, feeling more manly for his resolve.

He came suddenly upon a little figure in white, reading, in a little viney nook by the river's side.

"Wait, Estelle," he called, for she had started to run away. "I shall leave to-morrow, and I have something to say to you which you must hear."

The telltale flush which swept over her face and neck at his words might have given some hint of an easy surrender. However, in a moment she had regained that customary piquancy which had more than once exasperated Hugh.

"I'd be sorry to have you leave us with any burden on your mind," she said, provokingly.

"It is needily for me to tell you why it was arranged for me to meet Miss Wayne here," he said, unheeding her light words. "You know, I suppose."

"Some slight idea, I believe," she returned, fingering her book.

"Well, I may as well tell you that that condition in my late aunt's will can never be fulfilled."

"And why not?"

"Because I love another," he cried, passionately. "O, Estelle! can you not see how tenderly, how ardently I love you? Without you I shall make a failure of life. Won't you show mercy, Estelle?"

"Oh, Hugh! would you marry a poor girl when you have a chance to win a dignified bride and retain those princely estates?" she asked.

Yes, darling, I prefer you with love in a cottage to the wealthiest woman with all the estates in the world."

"Rash statement, young man."

"It is true. Do not torture me longer, Estelle. Can you not love me a little?"

"No."

"Then you do not love me?"

"I'm afraid I do."

"Do not mock me, Estelle."

"I am not mocking you, Hugh,"

in a very sweet voice.

"Then you do love me a little?"

"No, not a little, but very much."

He would have caught her to his breast, but she eluded his arms, crying:

"Oh, there's Uncle Cranston!" and she rushed forward to greet the little lawyer, who had approached them unseen.

"It is useless for me to ignore facts," said Mr. Cranston, pleasantly. "I did not mean to overhear your conversation, but I arrived unexpectedly and thought I would hunt up my sprite here and surprise her. I see you understand each other pretty clearly."

"Yes, sir," said Hugh, bravely. "I have decided to enjoy love in a cottage with this dear girl rather than keep the estate with Miss Wayne."

"Love in a cottage! Oh, that's too good!"

And Mr. Cranston broke into a hearty laugh, in which the girl finally joined him.

"Will you have the goodness to explain what amuses you so much in my statement?" asked Hugh, not a little nettled.

"Pardon me, Colewood. But, really, you are the victim of your own blunder."

"Blunder! I don't understand you, sir," returned Hugh.

"Of course not," and the lawyer laughed again. "This sprite, whom you took to be the unimportant little cousin, is in reality the Ethel Wayne referred to in your aunt's will. I did not tell you that there were two Ethels, so while she was driving you over here you jumped to the conclusion that Miss Wayne at the house was the Ethel."

"You see I have been told all about your amusing mistake. Ethel would not explain her real identity with the girl whom your aunt had selected for you and, as the other ladies believed you knew, you have remained the victim of your own mistake."

Six months later the condition of Miss Colewood's will was cheerfully obeyed.

She Could Run.

The Rev. H. W. Pierson, D. D., was for many years a traveling agent of the American Bible Society in the Southwest. For a part of that time he rode a horse of which he was justly proud, and of which he speaks again and again, always in terms of eulogy, in his volume of reminiscences, "In the Brush." One night he arrived at a celebrated watering-place. A four-horse stage-coach drove up at the same time, and Dr. Pierson noticed the eyes of the driver and the passengers fixed admiringly upon his "Jenny." The portouret entered the hotel, registered his name—without prefix—and went to the wash-room. As he finished his ablutions and stood wiping his face, the stage-driver burst into the room with great excitement.

"Mr. Pierson," he said, "will you allow your horse to run? The money is up, and we'll have a race if you'll only say the word."

As he spoke he shook in the agent's face a mass of bank-bills drawn through his fingers after the manner of gamblers in those parts.

Mr. Pierson was startled to hear his name pronounced in this way by a stranger, but bethought himself at once of the hotel register. Just then a servant appeared with his saddle-bags, waiting to show him to his room, and with an abrupt, emphatic "No, sir!" he turned away.

In due time the supper-bell rang, and Mr. Pierson stepped out of his room upon the piazza. There he encountered a gentleman who at once approached him pleasantly and said: "I hope, sir," you will reconsider your decision, and allow your mare to run. I have made a bet that she can outrun anything here, and the money is up. Allow me to say that I am an old Virginian, and a judge of horses, and if you will let her run I am sure to win."

By this time the Bible Society's agent had recovered his self-possession. He bowed politely to his Virginian friend, and said:

"Do you think, sir, it will do for a Presbyterian clergyman to commence horse-racing so soon after reaching the Springs?"

Now it was the other man's turn to be flustered. He did not say a word, and Dr. Pierson went in to supper. When he came out again, the stranger made up to him in the most respectful manner.

"Allow me to speak to you again, sir. I wish to apologize. I beg your pardon, sir. I assure you, sir, that nothing would induce me knowingly to insult a clergyman."

Dr. Pierson made some good-natured reply, and thought nothing more about the matter.

The next winter, in passing through another part of the country, he stopped at a blacksmith shop to get a shoe tightened.

"Wasn't you at the Springs last summer with this mare?" said the blacksmith.

The doctor answered in the affirmative.

"Well," said the blacksmith, patting the mare's neck and looking into vacancy with a pleased expression, as if he were living over again some pleasant scene, "they got her out, preacher, and run her, anyway."

Then, as if to make the matter all right with the owner, he looked up into his face with a smile and an emphatic nod as he added, "And, preacher, she beat, she did. He won his money."

Henry Astor Needs No Pity.

I hope nobody is wasting pity on the Henry Astor who was with such bitter explicitness cut out of his rich brother's will. "It is my will and intention," the pious testator wrote, "that neither my brother Henry nor his issue shall as heirs-at-law or next of kin receive any portion of my estate, and any such portion to which he or they would in any contingency be entitled I give to the trustee of the Astor Library." If you have a taste for the manifestations of brotherly love, mark the deliberate ingenuity of this precious testament, the thoughtful malice with which the man proclaims his forgiveness to the son of his mother; how he pondered in his own mind this dainty morsel of hate and handed it to his lawyer to be embalmed in impregnable form and so shelved among the archives of the Astors. All the world knows the reason why. Twenty-five years ago Henry Astor married "a country girl," a nobody, and withdrew to live with her in the peace and quiet of the farm. He felt an honest impulse and yielded to it; gave way to an honest sentiment; loved a woman and was man enough to tell her so: won her love and would not throw it away—no, not to serve the ignoble ambition of a purse-proud pelt. Therefore he was an anathema. His father branded him as an unworthy son and his brother, coming into the heritage of hate, cherished it in his heart and passed it in turn to his son, together with the swollen millions. Great is mammon and worthy to be praised! By Heaven! if such wealth breeds such hardness of heart it is no wonder and no pity that the most of us are poor.—Chicago Post.

A Poor Debtor's Revenge.

Appropos of the discussion of the imprisonment for debt law in Maine, the Augusta Age tells a queer story. Nearly four years ago an Aroostook storekeeper named Hibbard had a man named Banks arrested for debt. The debt had been incurred a few years before for several bushels of onions which Banks bought to plant. The onions failed to "come up" and Banks refused to pay. Hibbard sued Banks, putting in the claim, in answer to Bank's defense of the neglect of the onions to grow, that they had been planted the wrong side up. "You couldn't expect them onions," eloquently remarked Hibbard's lawyer at the trial, "to grow down and stick their roots up into the air and let them whip in the passing breeze like the frayed-out end of a clothes-line. Neither could you expect them to twist around like an ox-bow and come up. What the defendant needed was good horse sense in planting onions and they would have been all right." This eloquence prevailed, and Banks was ordered to pay or go to jail. He could easily have paid, but he preferred to go to jail. It was better than the poor house, and a man would come to the poor house sooner or later if he allowed himself to be imposed upon in the matter of onions. Then, too, farming was slack in Aroostook just then, and a few years in jail would really pay better than harvesting poor crops.

Accordingly Banks went to jail and Hibbard began to pay his board at the rate of $3 a week. At the end of three months Hibbard began to weaken, and went around to the jail and asked Banks when he intended to pay up and get out. Banks looked through the bars and said he was quite comfortable and felt good for ten or fifteen years yet. Then he added the inquiry as to whether Hibbard still thought those onions were planted wrong end up. Hibbard groaned. Hibbard has now paid something over $600 for board. But there is now a slight gleam of hope, as the other day Banks said he thought if the crops were good this year, and the season appeared favorable next spring, a year from now, he might for $400 and a public retraction concerning the alleged wrong position of the onions consent to come out of jail and stop being a further expense to the unfortunate storekeeper.

The Heating of Cars.

Conservatism is in the main a highly respectable quality, but that type of it which is exemplified in the coal-stove which still lingers in some railroad cars is a pernicious vice. There is at this day absolutely no excuse for the continuance of this source of danger. Perfectly safe heaters have been invented, not of one kind only but of many, and a variety of new methods have been in successful use quite long enough to show their practicability. Where electric heaters are used on electric roads, it has been found that they make a scarcely perceptible addition to the average "load" at the power station, and the consumption of coal is not appreciably increased. Cars on steam railroads are already in many cases lighted by electricity; and to heat them by the same means is but another step in advance. In France a heating apparatus has been devised in which acetate of soda is used, being first placed in boxes in a solid state, then liquefied by plunging the boxes in hot water; and the boxes are then placed in the cars, where they give out an agreeable heat for five or six hours. That is not a wise railroad management which waits to be admonished by one more frightful catastrophe before making a choice out of the many safeguards within its reach.

The Best Sunshine.

All sunshine is delightful, but the best of all kinds is sunshine in the home—the sunshine of a loving, cheerful spirit. Better even than the sunlight and warmth of Heaven is that of a cheerful face, having, as it does, a kind and cheerful heart. No one understands it, or fails to feel its influence. A bright eye, an unclouded brow, a loving word, all tell of peace, joy and delight in the pleasure of others. One glance at such a face has lifted the mists and shadows from many a heavy heart, and scattered the fogs from many a burdened spirit. A bright, warm, cheerful face inside the home will drive away sadness and gloom and make it impossible for them to exist. The germs of disease, which at times may lurk in the most elegantly furnished rooms if kept dark, will vanish before the bright and cheery sunlight. And so it is with human beings as with rooms. Open, then, the windows of your heart, and let the sunshine come in.

INSTEAD of wishing you were rich, wish instead that you had more sense about taking care of the little money you have. There are too many people who don't know how to manage a dime who think they could manage a dollar.

WHEN a girl is 19, her mother stands behind her to let the people see how pretty she is, but if she has a son near that age, she stands in front of him to shield his looks.

SERMONS FOR SUNDAY.

A FEW SUBJECTS FOR ALL TO PONDER OVER.

A Check on the Bank of Heaven—One Reason Why Young Men Are Not in the Churches—Bearing False Witness—Not a Fire Escape.

Where Washington Worshipped.

One of the oldest and most interesting churches in this country stands at Alexandria, Va., well nigh in its original condition. In 1773 Col. George Washington was one of the twelve trustees when Christ Church was completed, and he purchased pew No. 5 for £36 10s. At this church were gathered representatives of nearly every family prominent in the early history of the country—the Adamses, Herberts, Muirs, Carlyles, Ramseys, Alexanders, Flemings, Curties, Paynes, Chichesters, Daltons,

CHRIST CHURCH, ALEXANDRIA, VA.

Broadwaters, Blackburns and many others. Washington's pew is still intact, and a handsome tablet in his memory was inserted in the eastern wall. Gen. Robert E. Lee attended Sunday-school, was baptized and confirmed in this ancient edifice. In the churchyard are many interesting tablets, under which lie the dust of many who were prominent in the early history of the country.

For Check.

An invalid lady who tried earning her living as an authoress, at length became discouraged through competition, and thought she would have to give up. As she retired at night, she lay awake for some time pondering over her scantiness of funds, and in this gloomy condition she fell asleep, to dream that a lady missionary came to her and said:

"I think we shall have to wait until we pass beyond to fully estimate the good your missionary stories have done. They have already been instrumental in adding many dollars to our funds, and still their influence is growing wider."

Then the missionary handed the lady's husband a letter and departed.

"Why this is a check," he said, as he opened the letter.

"It is unlike any other check I ever had," the lady replied; "it is so much larger."

"Yes, it is unlike any you ever saw. It is a check on the Bank of Heaven. It says you can only draw what is really needed; yet you can get all you do need, be it little or much."

Through surprise the lady awoke, such sweet peace took possession of her soul as she realized what a rich Father she had. Why had she been afraid to trust Him? Now she would go on, and when necessary to have anything, present her check on the Bank of Heaven.

Dear Christian readers, we all have checks on that same bank. Do we fully realize it? Our father will "freely give us all things." "All things" must mean the supplying of our temporal as well as spiritual needs. Christ was human as well as divine, and knew the pangs of hunger, and had "not where to lay His head." "Seek ye first the Kingdom of Heaven," and the necessary things shall be added. "Having done all stand fast." Stand fast in what? God's promises. This is faith.

If Christians only would live up to their privileges—this precious trusting in all things! We have the same God to-day who fed Elijah, and made the meat and oil last; the same Christ who multiplied the barley loaves. Our men of wealth, handle their bonds and checks, sitting down with complacency and at their ease; yet their riches may take to themselves wings, and flee away. These checks on the Bank of Heaven are sure. It has never failed, neither have its funds depreciated; they are above par every time.

"The cattle upon a thousand hills are His. The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." Come, ye children of a King, and draw upon the bank; your Father is rich.

Why Young Men Are Out of Church.

We quote the following from an article by Rev. E. E. Rogers in N. W. Congregationalist: Do we realize how much tobacco antagonizes our work? A moral paralysis is on the church to-day in its relation to the tobacco habit. We seem bound hand and foot and tied in tongue in the matter of carrying forward an anti-tobacco reform. Tobacco is helping to keep great numbers of men out of the kingdom of God by actually drugging them into a state of spiritual insensibility. I remember reading years ago, one of Rev. George Trask's famous sayings: "When a young man has a cigar in his mouth, he doesn't even want salvation." Have we not been asking, with great anxiety, why so few young men are coming into our churches? What keeps them out? How can it be that only five out of every one hundred young men are in the church? There are other reasons doubtless, but here is one of them which we surely have not fully considered. The spirit of the living God cannot do his most effective work in a soul drugged and stupefied by a powerful narcotic. I would not want to labor as an evangelist in a church filled with spittoons, neither would I want to go into a smoking car to try to persuade men to leave off sinning and give themselves to God.

Friendship.

Friendship is one of the greatest boons that life can have. As Bacon says, "it redoubleth joys and cutteth grief in halves." But where brotherhood is united with it it attains a still richer result; for then it has a world of memories and early associations in common—the mutual love of the same honored parents, the recollections of the same beloved home and of past scenes vividly impressed on the minds of both, in which no other friend, however dear, can possibly share.

Not a Fire Escape.

It is a great mistake to suppose that Christianity is merely a fire escape, of value only to the soul, and that not until after death. Religion is a spiritual illumination, blessing the home and society with a quiet helpfulness in the present life and giving us a foretaste of Heaven.

Breathe Through the Nose.

Dr. J. M. Buckley, who has been writing a series of articles on "Physical Culture" for the Chautauquan, says that breathing exercises are of great value, most easily practiced, and give excellent results. It is not necessary to have an elaborate system. The nostrils are the proper organs of breathing. Man, unlike some other animals, is capable of breathing through the mouth if the nostrils are obstructed, and many from habit or debility continually do so—a practice, whether by day or by night, attended with many evils; whereas every breath of pure air a man inhales through his nostrils is a breath of life.

One exercise, repeated fifty or a hundred times a day, requiring no more than ten minutes all together, is of the greatest advantage and can be done out of doors as well as in, at almost every season of the year. It consists of inhaling through the nostrils a deep breath, retaining it a few seconds, and then with the lips adjusted as if one intended to whistle, expelling it slowly through the contracted orifice. There is no physiological objection to exhaling through the mouth; there are no muscles whereby the course of the breath can be restrained through the nostrils, but the lips contain sufficient muscular strength for this purpose. If students would rise from their studies, bookkeepers from their desks, women from their sewing or reading, two or three times a day and take from fifteen to thirty such breaths the result would surprise them.

A Shrewd Fool.

An old gentleman, a resident of New York City who in his early manhood visited Sir Walter Scott at Abbotsford tells the following story apropos of the Wizard of the North:

We took a walk one evening just as the sun was setting and the painting of a man near by attracted our attention.

I turned in the direction of the sound and saw a ragged young man with a face unmistakably idiotic and the shred of a woman's bonnet on his head in lieu of a hat.

"Ah!" said Sir Walter, gleefully, and he winked to me to note what followed: "here is my ain gude friend Sandy McIntyre, the wise man. And whither are ye gangin', Sandy?"

"I'm oot huntin' for goold and siller, Sir Walter," said the idiot, with a horrible grimace.

"Weel, weel, mon!" exclaimed Sir Walter. "What do you want wi' goold and siller?"

"I want to be rich, unco rich," replied the fellow.

"Weel, I'll tell you what I'll do, Sandy."

"Tell on, Sir Walter."

"I'll gi' ye a thousand goold pounds if you'll let me kill you."

"Na, na, Sir Walter," said the fool like a flash. "I'll compromise wi' ye."

"Compromise?"

"Yes; I'll let you half kill me for half the money."

Scrambling for Life.

The ascent of Adam's Peak in Ceylon is not only difficult but extremely dangerous. Lawrence Oliphant, who was a "trustworthy pilgrim" not likely to manufacture "hair-breadth escapes," gives the following account of his own ascent which, it is easy to believe, one would not care to repeat:

"The path at one point was cut in the precipitous hillside; at least 300 feet below roared a torrent of boiling water. My foot slipped on a root, and I pitched sheer over the cliff. I heard the cry of my companions as I disappeared, and had had quite time to realize that all was over when I was brought up suddenly by the spreading branches of a bush which was growing upon a projecting rock. There was no standing ground anywhere except this rock.

"Looking up I saw my companions and the natives peering over the edge above, and to their intense relief shouted that I was all right, but dared not move for fear the bush would give way. They, however, strongly urged my scrambling on the rock, and this, with a dizzy brain, I succeeded in doing.

"The natives then undid their long waistcloths, and tying them to each other and to a piece of cord taken from the packages, made a rope just long enough to reach me. Fastening this under my armpits, and holding it with the energy of despair, I was safely hauled to the top.

"This adventure was not a very good preparation for what was in store for us when, not far from the top, we reached the one really dangerous point in the whole ascent. Here again we had a precipice with a torrent at the bottom on the one side, and on the other an overhanging cliff. This was not metaphorically overhanging, for its upper edge literally projected some distance beyond the ledge on which we stood; it was not above forty feet high, and was sealed by an iron ladder.

"The agonizing moment came when we had mounted this ladder to the protecting edge, having nothing between our backs and some hundreds of feet below, and then had to turn over the edge, and take hold of a chain which lay over an expanse of bare, sloping rock, to the links of which it was necessary to cling firmly while one hauled one's self on one's knees for twenty or thirty yards over a surface by no means smooth. Yet we did it, and lived to tell the tale."

Salmon Going the Way of the Buffalo.

It looks as though the salmon fisheries of the Columbia River, which have added enormously to the wealth of the Northwest, would in the course of a few years become exhausted. The fate of the Columbia will probably be that of the Sacramento River, from which stream the salmon have almost disappeared. Fish laws may be passed and an attempt made to enforce them, but it is not thought that anything can be done in this way that would suffice to save the fisheries. It seems that the salmon will not remain in rivers the waters of which are frequently disturbed by steamboats and that flow through thickly inhabited countries. The salmon fishing of the not very distant future will likely be almost entirely confined to British Columbia and Alaska.—Denver Republican.

The Origin of the Name California.

The name California (hot furnace) was given by Cortez to Lower California and a part of Arizona about the year 1535. The title was probably an adaptation from a name applied in a Spanish romance to an imaginary island in the Indies, which was supposed to contain gold mines of fabulous wealth. This explanation is the one most commonly tendered, but it is more than probable that the name was applied by Cortez to the southern parts of Arizona on account of the intense heat peculiar to that country, and that the title was at a later day extended to include most of the North American Pacific coast.—Globe-Democrat.

Fruit in Oregon.

Fruit-growers in the far West are enthusiastic over the possibilities of Oregon as a fruit-growing region, and especially for prune culture. One fruit expert says that Italian prunes, grown in the Willamette Valley, are superior to those grown in Italy. The climate, he says, is like the great fruit region of Asia Minor. One grower has planted about 15,000 prune trees in 150 acres in the Willamette, and it is said that prunes and other fruits are being planted in thousands of other farms. That part of the State promises to be a vast fruit orchard in the near future.

The Largest Pair of Shoes.

A Georgia shoemaker has finished the largest pair of shoes ever made for actual use. It took a piece of leather containing 1,040 square inches to make the uppers, and one of 1,960 square inches to make the soles, or exactly 3,000 square inches of leather altogether. If the leather contained in that pair of shoes were cut into strips an eighth of an inch wide, it would make a string 24,000 inches long. The sole of this gigantic pair of shoes are 14 inches long and 5½ inches wide. The two combined tipped the scales at exactly eight and one-half pounds.

Told in a Dream.

Before Watts, the discoverer of the present mode of making shot, had his notable dream, induced by over-indulgence in stimulants, the manufacture in question was a slow, laborious, and consequently costly process. Great bars of lead had to be pounded into sheets of a thickness nearly equal to the diameter of the shot desired. These sheets had then to be cut into little cubes, placed in a revolving barrel and there rolled around until, by the constant friction, the edges wore off from the little cubes and they became spheroids.

Watts had often racked his brain trying to discover some better and less costly scheme, but in vain. Finally, after spending an evening with some boon companions at an ale house, he went home, went to bed, and soon fell asleep. His slumbers, however, were disturbed by unwelcome dreams, in one of which he was out with "the boys," and as they were stumbling home it began to rain shot—beautiful globules of polished, shining lead—in such numbers that he and his companions had to seek shelter.

In the morning Watts remembered his curious dream, and it obtruded itself on his mind all day. He began to wonder what shape molten lead would assume in falling through the air, and finally, to set his mind at rest, he ascended to the top of the steeple of the Church of St. Mary at Redcliffe and dropped slowly and regularly a ladleful of molten lead into the moat below. Descending, he took from the bottom of the shallow pool several handfuls of the most perfect shot he had ever seen. Watts' fortune was made, for from this exploit emanated the idea of the shot tower, which ever since has been the only means employed in the manufacture of the little missiles so important in war and sport.

The number of men who can write legibly with the left hand is very small in this country, where the fact of being ambidextrous is not appreciated at its full worth, says a St. Louis exchange. Sir Edwin Arnold remarked while in St. Louis that in Japan every child is taught to write with either and both hands, and he hinted that this was not the only evidence of sound common sense he met with while in the kingdom of the Mikado.

I learned to write with my left hand some years ago, in consequence of the impression created in my mind by reading the arguments of Charles Reade on the subject, and now I change my pen from hand to hand on the first impression of weariness.

There have been many remedies suggested for what is known as writer's cramp, and many writers alternate between the pen and the typewriter, but the simplest plan of all is to acquire the art of writing with either hand, and change from one to the other on the first suspicion of fatigue.

It is quite easy for a child to learn to write with the left hand, and although after the muscles have got set with age it is more difficult, almost any man can learn to write with his left hand in a week and to write as well with one hand as the other in less than a year.

How They Worked It.

A beggar sat on a stool near the curb-stone offering lead pencils for sale. Near him stood a ragamuffin selling newspapers. Both were miserably clad, and it was bitterly cold.

A nice-looking old man came down the street. The newsboy ran up to him, and the old man purchased an afternoon paper. The beggar held out his hat and cried out for an alms.

The old man looked at the beggar for a moment and was about to pass on without giving him anything. The miserably clad newsboy looked up at the comfortable old man with surprise in his eyes. Then the boy pushed his hand into his pocket, pulled out five pennies and dropped three of them into the beggar's cap.

This unselfishness immediately touched the old man's heart. He put his hand into his well-lined pocket and gave the boy and the beggar each a quarter, then passed on with something like a tear in his eye.

The boy and the beggar tried it with success on everybody who passed along the street that afternoon.—Kate Field's Washington.

Cuban Justice.

A gentleman from North Carolina, while making a tour of the island of Cuba, had his watch stolen on the street. In less than two hours a police judge had sentenced the thief to three years' imprisonment. He also awarded the North Carolinian $23 damages for the injury sustained by his watch in the struggle for its possession, and ordered the convict to work it out.

Das Vaterland.

The population of the German empire was 49,428,470 on Dec. 1, 1890. The relative numbers of the federated German states stand as follows: Prussia, 29,957,367; Bavaria, 5,594,982; Saxony, 3,502,684; Wurtemberg, 2,036,552; Baden, 1,657,867; Elsass-Lothringen, 1,002,506; Hesse, 992,883. The number of males in Prussia on the census day was 14,702,151.

Just Fun Aliva.

There is a staid solemnity about the average railroad conductor that is simply awe-inspiring. He passes through the car, in his monotonous round of punching and collecting tickets, with a sort of subdued, mournful air, as if there was nothing in life for him but punching and collecting tickets. "Your tickets, please," he says, in a tone of persuasive blandness. He never smiles; he never jokes; he punches the tickets proffered him in a sadly perfunctory way. This is when he is on duty.

The other day I struck upon a conductor of a New Jersey Central train when off duty. He was a different man. He was dressed differently, having doffed his regulation blue and brass-buttoned uniform. I soon found that this fellow was full of fun way down to the bottom of his boots, and that the conductor of the train on duty had likewise a vein of humor as rich and fertile, though carefully concealed.

"Your ticket, please," asked the conductor of the train, as he came to where the conductor off duty was seated.

"I have no ticket," was the response.

"Then you will have to pay your fare."

"I will pay you when I get to my journey's end and not before," said the off-duty conductor in a tone of rare firmness. "Railroad companies have no business to exact fares in advance. How do I know whether the train will get through or not? The train may run off the track and we may all be smashed to pieces, and then I'd be out my fare. No, sir, I have made up my mind that from this day on, and I have to ride a good deal on the cars, that I shall never buy a railroad ticket and never pay my fare before I get to the end of my journey."

"I am not here to be trifled with," retorted the conductor, with an air of intensely savage gravity. "How far are you going?"

"To the end of the route."

"Not unless you give me your ticket or pay your fare."

"I have told you what I will do. I won't pay you before I get to my stopping place."

"Then I shall put you off the train."

"I dare you to do it. I only hope you will, for then the company will have to pay me money enough to make me independent for life."

"Wait till I get through punching tickets and I'll bounce you off this train so quick you'll think you have been struck by Jersey lightning."

"Do it, if you dare; do it now, don't wait for anything."

The two talked so loud and appeared to be so angry, that the attention of all the passengers in the car was directed to them. They seemed as mad as two wet hens, that popular formulated climax of indignation. It was the cause of some fright to the passengers, but then those two conductors were having a big lot of fun all to themselves, and they kept it up with increasing vehemence at intervals to the end of the route.—New York Herald.

Whittier and the Little Girl.

A correspondent tells this story of the poet Whittier's success in aiding a little girl at a school examination. The aged poet one winter renewed his youth in a handsome overcoat of the purest ulster pattern, clad in which he attended a school examination upon among the hills so dear to him. He stood beside the teacher while she catechised a dimpled dot in geography.

"What are the provinces of Ireland?" asked the teacher.

"Potatoes, whisky, aldermen, patriotism—" began the child.

"No, no," interrupted the teacher, "provinces, not products."

"Oh," said the little girl. "Connaught, Leinster, Munster, and—"

She stuck her chubby fingers in her her rosebud mouth and sought inspiration successively in her toes, the corner of her apron, the ceiling, and the poet. All children loved the Quaker poet's kindly face. He smiled; her face brightened sympathetically. He patted his ulster significantly; she looked up at him inquiringly. He nodded, and she burst out with:

"Oh, Miss Simmons, I know now! They are Connaught, Leinster, Munster, and—Overcoat!"

A Wife Worth Having.

A good story is told of a man somewhere in Maine. He one day told his wife that he would give her all the silver pieces she found in his wallet which were coined the year she was born. As a result the lady in due course of time had quite an amount of silver money on hand—so much so, in fact, that she went to the bank and deposited it in her name. Then speaking to the cashier the lady said: "My husband tells me you are going to pay him some money to-day. Won't you please, pay him in this money I have just deposited? I shall be much obliged if you will."

Of course the cashier, being noted for his courtesy to the ladies, quickly replied that he should be happy to please her.

As a result the lady had still more birthday money.

FORMERLY CITY & FARM RECORD.

TOPEKA, KANSAS, AUGUST, 1892.

NINTH YEAR, VOL X, NO. 1.

Written for the FARMER'S WIFE.

A BUGLE CALL.

BY ZILPHA J. TALLEY.

See! my sisters, day is breaking,
Shackled Labor breaks his Chain,
Men of toil from slumber awakening,
Freedom claims her own again.

See our hero, General Weaver,
To the people hear him tell
That the working men are coming
From the workshop hill and dell.

See him there like faithful David
Read the writing on the wall,
"Meno Tekal and Reparsin,"
Written there for tyrants all.

Hear him as he boldly tells them,
"You are sowing dragons teeth,
That your scoffs and geers and laughter
Will be turned to wails of grief."

"That the bankrupt Sons of Labor,
Starving children, mothers groan;
As you reap your golden harvest
So the whirlwind ye shall own."

Men of toil be up and doing,
We will aid you by our prayers,
Cheer you with our words of comfort,
Share with you your toils and cares.

And when comes the joyous hour
Of our nation's freedom gained
By our nation's working people
Then shall woman be unchained.

Free to vote beside her brother,
Free to lay her loving heart
On her country's sacred altar
Now defiled by traitorous art.

Men my brothers, men the workers!
Do you heed a sisters call?
Can it be that you would rather
At the golden altar fall?

No, thank God, we know you better,
In your brave hearts we confide;
Go forth boldly, you will conquer
Hoarded gold and bonded pride.

From the ocean to the ocean,
From the gulf to rocky Main,
Form in line and keep in motion,
Sound the bugle call again!

Culture of Morals In The Home.—
Requisites of Parents.

Written for the FARMER'S WIFE.

Oh! what might not poor humanity have become, if like the thirty popes who, one after another, continued building the great cathedral at Rome, a contemporaneous and successive band of princes had, joining temple to temple, so urged on the great temple building of humanity.—Richter.

Do men gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles. * * * A good tree can not bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.

Math. VII.

I am painfully aware of the fact that in attempting the arduous task of setting forth a few well-written thoughts on this subject, I am guilty of a boldness that could justify none other than a master hand; that any ideas worthy of serious consideration should be drawn from a mind long intimate with and deeply versed in classic lore, tried and proven by extensive observations in actual life and ripened into mature judgment before being offered to the public.

I can only endeavor to defend myself against unjust criticism by saying that the apparent stupendous indifference of parents to the environments and fruits of the home life in the formation of character, seems to justify the production of even a fragment on the worthy subject.
Perhaps this insignificant fragment may,
like the small pebble tossed into the stream whose receding and widening wavelets extend to the uttermost shore, prove of a widening influence and touch and awaken the latent energies of an abler pen in behalf of the noble cause.
If one single human being could be benefitted by such a feeble or generous effort, then the work would not be in vain: for of adding to the sum of human happiness and diminishing the sum of human suffering, how little, alas! do we know! how much less do we contribute!

You find in the proceeding letter the idea is implied that the foundation stones of the centuries are laid by the rose-tinted fingers of the nurseries.

The essence of moral philosophy crystallizes into this truth, viz: The best battle-field for contending with evils will forever be the floors on which the little men and women execute their mimic earnest frays; and one of the most potent flames for purifying national depravity is that which glows on the warm hearthstone of home.

Now every one knows that in the natural world the ultimate success of a plant depends greatly upon the conditions that surround it in the first few years of its existence.

When the horticulturist desires a good fruit-bearing tree, he selects a scion of excellent stock, chooses a location and soil suited to its nature, plants it with great delicacy, surrounds it with conditions necessary to its development, tends it with unfailing care—protecting it from enemies and all abuses—and then he re-joices in its vigorous growth, luxuriant development and generous fruitage.

Indeed, what would be his mortification if his labor were not thus rewarded, and he would immediately set about the task of discovering, if possible, the fatal error that had prevented the culmination of his sanguine hopes.

Ah! if our precious little human nurslings were treated with so much preciousness, what might we not expect of ulterior disclosures? What legislative hall would then lack its Fabricious, its regulus? Think you that then a Scipio Africanus would be wanting to go forth and conquer "the whole known world"
of evils and set free the captive weak?

I must now betake myself to the most unpalatable portion of my task—that of alluding to desirable and non-desirable qualities of parents.

Let's think for a moment what meaning is crouched in the simple word parent—one who dares invoke the life of an immortal creature, a creature that should be trained for God, for humanity, for the state and for society. "A father,
when he brings his child into existence and supports them, has, in so doing, fulfilled only a third part of his task."
O thou who dares call into being a creature whose life thenceforth is to be eternal with that of the Creator, how solemn your task. One whose views are not commensurate with this meaning of the parental relation, should never dare to tread the sacred aisle that leads to that most sacred altar over which Heaven sheds its gentlest influence when the altar fires of the two hearts that beat in concord sweet and grateful are purified by consecration.

The selection of a life partner involves, or should involve, a vast deal more than merely the enlisting of the affections.
Verily, there is something more in matrimony than the wedding ring.
The character of the parent must ever be regarded as the chief corner-stone of the character of the child—

"Never since harvests were ripened,"
Or laborers born,
Have men gathered figs of thistle,
Or grapes of thorn."

Like unto like is repeated with fearful fidelity in the home circle. Yet what man thinks of this when choosing the future mother of his children? It would be well if every man and woman when choosing a companion for life would bind this passage as a phylactery upon the pillars of their memories, namely: "Do men gather grapes of thorn or figs of thistle?" Instead of any such sane considerations being exercised, what startling choices do we behold!

We find a man of grossly immoral habits leading a bride to the altar as often as we see one of irreproachable conduct.

"The men that women marry, and why they marry them, will forever be a marvel and a mystery to the world"—an imperishable monument to the folly of lovely woman!

With equal truth the saying can be applied to men. Husbands and wives are chosen for any other reason under the sun than for any supposed qualifications of parents. "Is it that this responsibility is a remote contingency? On the contrary, it is certain to devolve on nine out of ten." Is it because the task of properly rearing those delicate "olive plants" is considered easy? Every one knows it to be the most difficult, the most perilous that was ever to erring mortal given.
Truth is, the blind god blindfolds his victims who become ensnared in his golden meshes and no fault is ever recognized until after the irrevocable bond is forged, and then lo! they come to light with startling velocity. Petty faults that formerly appeared virtues become vices and evils that, viewed through the veiled eyes of a lover seemed trivial, multiply their weight with incredible power when practiced by the wife.

There are some types that every one knows are to be avoided strictly, such as family tendencies to lunacy, idiocy, drunkenness, hereditary diseases, a union with different races or different religions, etc., but there are many unavowed qualities that are vicious in their character and destructive in their results. A dishonest man will be the father of dishonest sons;
a miserly man will be the father of miserly sons; a worldly woman will be the mother of worldly daughters and so on.
An ungovernable temper, a selfish disposition, a tendency to impetuosity or infidelity and many other qualities could be named that are far from being desirable ones to transmit to posterity or to make one an agreeable companion. But what is the use of uttering warnings? All the preaching since Adam will never make a woman marry any other than the man that she loves, if she can get him. Yet if glaring defects of character are ignored, one may live to rue his or her choice with a life-long penalty. "Repenting in a coach and six," is poor comfort to one who has made ship-wreck of her happiness by a reckless imprudence.

One evening when waiting in a densely crowded church for the appearance of a bridal couple, I heard a young lady who wore a very happy countenance say to a matronly-looking woman beside her,
"Well, it's a leap in the dark any how."
"Yes," replied the matron, whose face was grave and sad, "you never know a man until you live with him." (Are you sure that you know him then?) I was forcibly reminded of the warning that a venerable minister gave a young man who went into the old gentleman's presence, carelessly threw himself into a chair and said, "Well, I've made up my mind to marry 'for weal or for woe.'"
The aged minister looked at him for a moment gravely, sternly, and then said very forcibly, "Young man, if you do not know that it is for weal, I pray you, forbear."

I crave your indulgence for two more quotations and then I will conclude this distasteful subject. From an old, old tract I make the following: "The question which a man should ask himself when he contemplates marrying is, not am I financially able to provide for the support of a family, but am I mentally and spiritually qualified to properly train up a family."

This trumpet blast is from unfortunate Pousseau: "He who cannot fulfill the duties of a father, has no right to be a father! Not poverty, nor severe labor, nor human respect can release him from the duty of supporting his children and of educating them himself. * * * I prophesy to any one who has natural feelings and neglects these sacred duties, that he will long shed bitter tears over this fault, and that for those tears he will find no consolation."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Big Four of this Campaign.

The campaign of education is on.
During the next few months the industrial millions who do not wish to surrender all hope of freedom and prosperity to the gold bugs who have nominated their willing tools in the great Harrison-Cleveland plutocratic combination must show their friends the inevitable results which will attend the continued supremacy of the "communism of capital." The industrial millions have it in their power to compass the noblest victory for true democracy that has ever been achieved, if they work industrially between now and November. All that is necessary is to show the people the logic of facts, and to do this every voter should possess a copy of Mr. King's wonderful book,
"Bond-Holders and Bread-Winners."
This book was sent to a number of leading gold bug financiers, with the request that they disprove its statements if they could do so. Not one has attempted the task. The facts are official, the logic is unanswerable, and the work is so plain that any unbiased bread-winner who reads it will be driven into the People's Party. Of this work the late lamented Col. Polk said: "It should be in the hands of every voter. In no work have I seen the unjust and ruinous effects of class legislation so forcibly and faithfully presented."

Another work which should be in the hands of every thoughtful voter is Dr.
Bland's wonderful story, "Esau; or, The Banker's Victim," which vividly portrays the iniquitous financial policy which has characterized the plutocratic reign of recent years, and under which the toiling millions of our nation are struggling with ever decreasing hope.

A third work, which is a whole army of vital facts for our people, is the recent issue of the Copley Square Library, entitled, "Industrial Freedom," containing as it does, "The Money Question" by Hon. John Davis, M. C., "The Sub-Treasury Plan," by C. C. Post, chairman of the People's Party of Georgia, and "The Railroad Problem," by ex-Gov. Lionel A.
Sheldon and C. Wood Davis. In the compass of this handsomely printed pamphlet is found the most masterly presentation of the three great demands of industry that has yet been presented.
Next to "Bond-Holders and Bread-Winners," this will prove to be the most effective campaign document which has yet appeared.

The fourth campaign pamphlet in this wonderful series of vote-winners is entitled "Money, Land and Transportation," and contains brilliant discussions by R.
B. Hassell, C. Wood Davis and Hamilton
Garland of Money at Cost, The Farmer,
The Railway, and The Land Problem.

The price of these powerful campaign books is 25 cents each.

They will be sent, post-paid, from this office upon receipt of price.

WORLD'S FAIR LETTER.

Toddlekins and the Fair.

Written for the FARMER'S WIFE.

Only last week a young mother wrote to me, "We have decided to give up going to the fair, for I cannot go and John says he will stay at home, too. The trouble is, we cannot leave Toddlekins and we cannot take her, and that ends the whole matter." But it did not end the whole matter, for I had wonderful news to tell her, all about the Children's Home, and as she and "John" are now anticipating genuine comfort in coming to the World's Fair, I have determined to tell other parents about this opportunity and beneficent feature of the Columbian Exposition.

The Home was not in the original plan, but when suggested it met with a generous response. Hearts and purses have opened wide and the building is already far advanced. The beams are up, the roof going on and the workmen will soon be covering its exterior with staff, while the carpenters finish off the interior wood-work. Almost every state has responded through its State Board of Women, and many have already furnished their quota of the needed money.

There is a grand playground for children in the court in the middle of the building, and here no one but children and their attendants are admitted. But we will all be allowed to look down upon their fun from a private gallery. There will be another playground upon the flat roof of the home, where birds and bees will flit and trees and flowers grow, and where the children will sport free from danger, for a wire netting surrounding and covering the roof and stretching upward some fifteen feet will at once prevent the youngsters from dropping their precious selves overboard and also from letting their kites and balloons fly off into boundless ether. A reading room will be fitted up for the story book and "St.
Nicholas," lovers, and there will also be an assembly hall for showing stereopticon views and holding concerts. Pen fails to tell of all the good times the little ones will have at work and play under the supervision of wise and loving kindergartners. But to my mind the heart of the Home is the nursery, where skillful nurses are to minister to the babies.
Every Toddlekins and each and all of his belongings will be numbered and tagged so that there will be no danger that the nurses will "mix those babies up."

Let me tell you how to visit the Fair comfortably. Do not plan to accomplish a "big day's work" every day. Take your time to it. Better see less in comfort than to exhaust yourselves in the vain attempt to see everything. I have had some experience in this direction which I believe you can make of benefit to yourselves, thus saving in both purse and endurance. Take plenty of sleep every night and do not start out too early in the morning. If your lodgings are at quite a distance plan to reach the grounds at about half-past ten. But before entering the gates just turn down Fifty-seventh street to Rosalie Court and take a quiet, restful, substantial lunch at the restaurant of the Woman's Baking company. It will give you heart and vigor for a long afternoon's siege of sight-seeing. This Woman's Baking company, by the way, is one of the genuine institutions of Chicago and is manned by seven of the soundest and straightest women in the west. Their friends have jokingly dubbed them the "Pious Seven," because their first enterprise was a pie factory where they guarantee "pure material." Their "piety" is, however, no laughing matter, and the lunches and dinners they serve make one feel good all over.

Thus fortified, you enter the great gates and at once seek the Children's Home, under the shadow of the Woman's building. Having established Toddlekins there in comfort you and your
"John" start out to show to the older children such parts of the Exposition as promise to be most profitable to them.
When they are tired and before their sweet tempers have soured return with them to the Children's Home, for by this time you ought to be looking after Miss Baby. After your own rest and diversion leave them all there while you and "John" pursue further investigations
according to your own tastes.

I hardly need to suggest to you as the proper sequel of a day at the Fair to gather your little tribe together and hie yourselves to your lodgings before you and "John" have become intolerably cross, but even if you should arrive at that ungracious condition your children will be more patient and forbearing with you if you have sweetened their tempers at the Children's Home.

FORAKER'S VIEWS.

Female Suffrage—Spicy Correspondence.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., July 9, 1892.

RECORDED:

I had intended sending a copy of our letter to J. B. Foraker with his reply, but was waiting to hear from Bay City in answer to a letter from me, in which I proposed that all organized women, as far as they can be induced, join issues, work with their might for the only party with courage to make an unpopular cause a principal plank in their platform—and against the party of pretended reform.
You may hear more of this, but this letter I am going to send to every woman's paper. Can you give me the names of Missouri, Arkansas and Kansas women's papers? I want it to come to the ears of southern women and western women. I want them stirred with indignation and rebellion, to be told coolly they are neither citizens nor people.

GRAND RAPIDS MICH., June 29, 1892.
HON. J. B. FORAKER, Cincinnati, Ohio.

The Political Equality Club of Grand Rapids, Mich., have caused to be read, with careful consideration, the Republican platform as formulated and adopted at Minneapolis, June 10th, to their members in meeting assembled. With earnest scrutiny they have carefully weighed every word of the declaration of principles of the party which declares for progress and reform. They have hereby instructed the proper officers to ask you, as chairman of the resolutions committee, and entirely conversant with its full meaning, if, in the declaration beginning
"We demand that every citizen of the United States shall be allowed to cast one free and unrestricted ballot in all public elections, and that such ballot shall be counted as cast; that such laws shall be enacted and enforced as will secure to every citizen, be he rich or poor, native or foreigner, white or black, this sovereign right guaranteed by the constitution. The free and honest popular ballot, the just and equal representation of all the people, as well as their just and equal protection under the laws, are the foundation of our republican institutions, and the party will never relax its efforts until the integrity of the ballot and the purity of elections shall be guaranteed and protected in every state," by "every citizen" and "of all the people" whose "free and honest ballot, the just and equal representation as well as their just and equal protection under the laws are—etc., etc., to whom the republican party gave their guaranty" to protect in every state? We believe we are people and citizens of the United States, and are deeply concerned in the full meaning of the phraseology of this resolution.

If your committee and party recognize that women are entitled to and shall be secured in the exercise of the same rights granted to the ignorant foreigner, the emancipated slave and the Indian,
that party can command our enthusiasm, our organized activity, as well as our allegiance. Awaiting a direct and positive reply to our various questions, we sign ourselves Yours respectfully, Emily B. Ketcham, President Michigan Equal Suffrage Association.
Mary G. Pearson, President Political Equality Club, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Dear Madam:—In answer to your letter of the 27th ult., I can only say, speaking for myself, that I do not understand the words you quoted to be intended to include women, and, therefore, to amount to a declaration in favor of female suffrage. Whether or not any of the other members of the committee may have understood them differently I am not advised. With sentiments of high regard I remain,

Very truly yours, etc.,

J. B. FORAKER.

Goad the women to resent this insult and cause the letter to be spread which tells the women what they are not. Let this arrogant party know what they are in this coming campaign.

Drunken Judge Bodkin, whose name was mentioned so prominently in the Sam Wood murder a few months ago, made a speech at the reunion of the old soldiers at Wichita recently, and tried to incite a mob to hang Hon. Jerry Simpson. The Topeka Capital, the republican state paper, was wonderfully elated over the matter, knowing that the only way to beat Congressman Simpson in the seventh district was to induce a band of outlaws to kill him.

It strikes us a little queer, that our legislators are so blind to the real interests of the farmers and wage-earners that with all their loud declarations of devotion—during the campaign—to his interests, they can't draw a bill that will help him. If the Alliance people will stand together, and support only such men as are known to be in accord with their ideas after election as well as before, irrespective of party affiliations, from senator down to the lowest officer, we will have less to complain of, so far as laws are concerned.

A woman that deliberately slanders one of her own sex is virtually an assassin of female virtue and gives a stab to her own character. A man that assails a lady's reputation by innuendos, compromising remarks or scandalous fabrications is an enemy to the mother that gave him birth, a traducer to the woman who may be his wife, his sister or daughter. There is no social ostracism too great for such a creature and he should be shunned alike by every one who appreciates the claim of pure womanhood.

Confidence is that quality of virtue in man which annihilates distrust, and insures safe reliance under the most trying circumstances. It is that stock in trade on which business men transact their affairs. It is a faith, strong and impregnable, in prosperity or adversity. It is the underlying principle of a well-conducted business life; and business becomes slack and dormant as this confidence is broken or destroyed, either by the nation, the society or the individual. A man whose word is not as good as his bond is of short duration, and must not make any claims for preferment when his qualities are known. An honest man is the noblest work of God, and also one of the rarest, and this is the most lamentable evil that prevails to-day. The whole superstructure of government existence is hung on the confidence which one man reposes in another or in which men, as a nation, trust a leader.

Now, there must of necessity be leaders, and these, to have weight, character and force, must be true to every sense of duty; unbiased, untrammelled, frank and fair in all the phases in which the human is called to act.

Why is the laboring class so poor? Ask yourself this question and then see if you can answer it justly. Is it because the laboring class is wasteful and extravagant? Does the farmer always have a lazy, extravagant wife who thinks of nothing else but costly apparel and luxuries? Is the daughter reared to think she must spend two or three hundred dollars a month for frivolities? Does the son think he can spend his time in pleasuring and spending hundreds of dollars? You will say no! Why then are the farmers and laboring classes so needy, so much in debt that they know they must suffer for the necessities of life? Does the Carnegies and Pinkertons study economy? Why, yes, they study economy in this way, they are always thinking of depriving the man in their employ of his wages which he has honestly earned and give him a paltry sum on which his family and himself must be fed and clothed. Is it right that this state of affairs should exist? Are you going to vote for men like Carnegie and his followers, or are you going to think of your poor families so needy as many of them are and support some man who will work for the interest of the laboring class?

The grand work being done for the wives, mothers and families of the land by the Keeley cure for drunkenness and the opium and tobacco habits cannot be over estimated. Numerous letters, commendations of the Keeley treatment, have been published by graduates of the Keeley institutes of Kansas of which there are four, located at North Topeka, Wyandotte, Wichita and Leavenworth. And a remarkable thing in connection with the matter is that all who have taken the cure agree as to its wonderful efficacy, testifying months and even years after receiving treatment that they have no thoughts whatever of need or desire for the old enemy, and that their general health has been materially benefited. Stories to the contrary are usually circulated by those interested in increasing the sale of liquors or in building up practice for imitation on which there are many. The de- ley cure have proven to have occurred the imitation institutes, about dozen such having occurred in the of Kansas alone. No Keeley graduates pronounce the treatment anything but effective and beneficial.

Written for the FARMER'S WIFE.

JOSEPHINE ROGERS.

Upon the hills near Gettysburg
Morning dawned calm and clear,
While from stirring and expectant camps,
Rose many a ringing cheer;
For rival hosts were marshalling
Ready to dare and do -
The eager, fearless, valiant gray
And the calm, intrepid blue,
"O, haste thee, maiden, fly from hence;"
Spoke one among the brave;
"The battle fiend speeds on apace
And this house will be your grave;
For Lee is riding onward
To desolate the North,
Your home is in his line of march;
Quick, maiden, hurry forth!"
But calmly spoke the maiden:
"My bread is not yet brown,
And hungry men would break a fast
That bears their prowess down."
"Nay, go, and go at once!", he cried,
"For scenes of death and blood
Should never greet the eyes that glow
In comely maidenhood."

She shook her wise and shapely head
And a tear shone in her eye;
Should a maiden run from duty's post
Because she feared to die?
The soldier smiled and raised his hat;
"If Lee's so firm," he said,
"We scarce will win the foughten field Till he's numbered with the dead."

He turned and walked with rapid step
To where his battle line
Already swayed in eagerness
Waiting the onset's sign.
The maid flung wide the oven door,
Drew out her gold-brown bread,
Then lightly to her window stepped;
"It waits," she simply said.

Then in there thronged a weary crowd
Of blue clad volunteers,
Who, when they saw the airy loaves,
Broke into honest cheers;
For with the aromatic feast
Rose thoughts of mother love,
And wife's caress and childhood's laugh
With the dear home roof above.

All day the waves of battle surged
Forward and backward o'er the field,
All day the blue and gray struck out
Each band forsworn to fly or yield;
All day the clouds of battle smoke
Obscured the rays of Heaven's sun,
All day was heard but death's wild call
And shriek of shell and roar of gun.

A respite came with dewy night;
Night with its kind and tender stars
Puts check upon the battle fiend
That day's refulgence soils and mars.
But Josephine was at her post;
No rest she sought, no sigh she gave,
Her only aim to gently serve
The hungry, battle weary brave.

Another morn, another sun,
And still the ghostly shriek of shell
And sulphurous smoke and lurid glare Proclaimed the battle's seething hell;
But undismayed by gloom and blood
And disregarding death's fierce reign,
Her hands still wrought the snowy loaves
And signaled to the feast again.

And not alone material food
She gave to those whose need was sore,
The wounded and the dying sought Refuge within her humble door.
Gently with flowy hands she strove
To check the flow of life's red stream,
Regardless of the terror loosed
With every shell's exultant scream.

The work was done. Lee gathered up
The remnants of his battle lines
And marching fast with wearied feet
Sped past the loyal state's confines;
But far and near among his ranks
Were men whose failing strength held out
From the bread that Josie Rogers gave
As they passed her door in charge or rout.

In the blue clad regiments there rose Ringing hurrahs for victory won,
Mingled with tears for comrades who
No more would greet the rising sun;
For Sicksles and for Meade rose cheers
That echoed in a long refrain—
That stirred the powder blackened leaves
And rippled the brooklet's breast again.

But the one who at her oven stood Toiling unknown to thought of fear While cannon balls crashed through her walls,
And rifles flashed their red flame near,
Asked no reward from shooting throats
No shoulder strap nor title high;
'Twas for humanity she held
Her post to death and danger nigh.

O, friend historian when you write
The list of those who merit fame,
Whose deeds shall ask our children's praise
And earn a stainless, deathless name,
When you tell the tale of sieges drear
And toilsome battles lost or won,
Of reeking swamps and desert plains—
The scenes of brave deeds long ago.

Let not the loftier heroes hide
The helpful hearts and noble souls
Of those whose humbler destinies
Embarked them ever on life's shoals.
The maid who braved the grievous ills
Of Gettysburg those July days
Should step to history's foremost rank
Amid a storm of generous praise.

Grand is the heart that beats for all
Who feel the edge of sorrow's blade,
That bleeds for wounds it fain would heal,
That toils through dangers undismayed;
The noble heart a stranger is
To accidents of sex and birth;
It knows no caste—it sees no rank
In the offspring of Mother Earth.

THE WORLD OF WOMEN.

A GOLDEN GRIST FOR OUR FAIR READERS.

Dormitories for the Women of the Columbian Exposition—Legendary Origin of Earrings—What Shopping Means to Women—Decorative Don'ts—Misjudged.

Dormitories at the Fair.

THE members of the Board of Lady Managers residing in Chicago, having undertaken to construct dormitories for the accommodation of industrial women and wage-earners visiting the World's Fair, feel that the widest publicity must at once be given to the project, that such persons may be able to avail themselves of the benefits proposed. Its capital stock is now $150,000. Each share is $10 and entitles the holder to lodging at 40 cents a day for twenty-five days at any dormitory of the Association, provided suitable notice has been given of the time when rooms are desired, and it will be received for its face value in payment of bills incurred for such lodging. The shares are made transferable so that the holder need not stay the full twenty-five days, but can transfer the unused stock to another, or by mutual agreement two persons can use the one share at the same time for half the twenty-five days. In other words, a paid up share is equivalent to a prepaid room or lodging—this does not include board.

It is contemplated that several thousand women will be housed every day of the exposition in these dormitories and some definite arrangement before hand is necessary in order to secure to the stockholders the rooms required, hence the rule which has been made that all shares indicate, when sending for stock, the month in which the rooms will be required. This is not a work of charity. The enterprise is intended to be self-sustaining.

What Shopping Means to Women.

Two men occupied a seat in an open car the other morning, and as they reached the shopping district, the car stopping at every block to drop passengers, one of them freed his mind after what the New York Times calls the usual masculine fashion:

"Odd, isn't it, how women can shop all day and all the year around?"

The other laughed. "Yes, it would be, only you get used to it; they all do it. Now, I go to my tailor's twice a year and get all I want."

"So do I," said the other indulgently, "but then they like it and it takes them out."

The other acquiesced, and the subject, thus satisfactorily settled, was dropped.

It probably never occurred to these complacent minds that a man's shopping is a molehill to the mountain needed in a household, and it is not believed that twice a year at his tailor's satisfied either of these well-dressed men. How about shirts, shoes, and neckties, hats, gloves, and underwear? Perhaps their wives "shopped" for some of these things? Certainly they did for the chairs, carpets, the hangings, and pictures, and all things, little and big, which made their homes comfortable, and for little Jane and big Tom and the baby and all the rest. But a man never sees a woman turn on a street which holds a dry goods shop that he does not assume with more or less flippancy that she has gone to buy a bonnet for herself.

Legendary Origin of Earrings.

According to the Moslem creed the reason why every Mohammedan lady considers it her duty to wear earrings is attributed to the following curious legend: Sarah, tradition tells us, was so jealous of the preference shown by Abraham for Hagar that she took a solemn vow that she would give herself no rest until she had mutilated the fair face of her hated rival and bondmaid. Abraham, who had knowledge of his wife's intention, did his utmost to pacify his embittered spouse, but long in vain. At length, however, she relented and decided to forego her plan of revenge. But how was she to fulfill the terms of the vow she had entered into? After mature reflection she saw her way out of the difficulty. Instead

How much a man may love a horse and hate to lose him has recently been shown in the case of an old farmer in Illinois, who traveled over 1,000 miles of country trying to find an old $25 plug which was stolen from him two years ago. He got the animal at last in Georgia.

FRANCE and Spain are having a fierce commercial struggle, but there will be no reaching out for scalps by either country.

BUT IT WAS MEAN.

Now a Drummer Won at Billiards by "Rattling" His Opponent.

One was a commercial traveler, the other was just a common, large, quiet, bashful man. They were playing billiards in the hotel billiard room, which was deserted by all save them, and the quiet man had beaten the drummer every game and beaten him badly.

"I know what's the matter," said the drummer, as they chalked their cues for another game, "I want an incentive. We ought to make a little bet; say a couple of dollars on this game, and let it be the last one. Come, you've had it all your own way. What do you say to that?"

"It's agreeable to me," answered the bashful man, taking the lead and then he ran off six points.

The drummer made two.

The large man got in a little run of fifteen, playing the balls around in the corners softly and gently without apparent effort.

"I want to see the clerk about getting my baggage ready for the next train," said the drummer, looking at his watch. "I won't be gone but a minute," and he hastened out to the office, which was filled with commercial men and other guests of the house.

"Well, now we'll try again," he said cheerfully, when he returned a few minutes later, but he made only four points and left a beautiful "set up" for the large man.

One or two other men had strolled in from the office and stood by while the bashful player made the shot, and by the time he had run the score up to twenty-eight there were half a dozen onlookers standing about the table.

"Gemini, that was a good shot!" said one, as the big man made a very good draw.

Then he made a difficult carom, and the spectators looked at each other with that side movement of the head which indicates both approval and surprise.

"Where are you in this game, Billy?" asked one of them. "I guess I ain't in it at all," said the drummer, leaning on his cue and watching his opponent, who, seeming a little disconcerted by so much attention, missed the next shot and sat down.

While the drummer was running off seven points three or four more men sauntered in and watched the game, meditatively puffing at their cigars.

The big man came up, missed and retired to a seat amid the most intense silence, and the drummer got in another little run.

"That's a shot I can never make," remarked one of the spectators as the big man advanced and stood observing the balls.

"It's very difficult," said another. "Well, I should say so," said a third. "The man that can make it is a dandy."

The heat of the room or something had made the large man a little red in the face, and he looked uncomfortable. He missed the shot. There was no comment, but every person had closely watched the attempt, and there were about a dozen of them now.

The drummer made a very good run; the bashful man missed again, and when, finally, the drummer ran the game out, the other stood by with a $2 bill in his hand.

"I kind of lost my luck towards the last," he said with a sickly smile, as he laid down the bill, and murmuring something about having an engagement he went out.

"Well, boys," said Billy, as he put in his coat and picked up the $2 bill. "I'm much obliged to you for coming in. I ain't much of a billiardist, but I'm a very fair judge of human nature."—Free Press.

They Have Their Heads Modeled.

A curious eighteenth century custom has been revived by the leading Paris coiffures, of having models made of the heads of distant clients. In order to study the effects of new styles of hair dressing and keep the ladies posted on the newest and most becoming fashions. A Russian grande dame, for example sends at a considerable expense a fac-simile of her head and face, copied perfectly in every detail, to her hairdresser in Paris. He experiments freely, and when a satisfactory result is obtained he mails a photograph of it, with minute directions for arrangement, each month to the St. Petersburg belle, and thus enables her to look up to date in the matter of coiffure. The initial expense is not small, for the wax modeler must be in his way a true artist.

Didn't Dare Do It.

Mrs. Bingo—"Your new dress trousers are ruined. I hung them out in the backyard to air and some boys threw snowballs at them all the afternoon."

Bingo—"Why in thunder didn't you go out and stop them?"

Mrs. Bingo—"I couldn't very well. They were relatives of the servant girl."—Philadelphia Record.

THE FARMER'S SIDE.

"Where we are, how we got here, and the way out."

By Hon. W. A. PEPPER, U. S. SENATOR FROM KANSAS.

12mo, cloth - - - Price, $1.00.

There is a demand for a comprehensive and authoritative book which shall represent the farmer, and set forth his condition, the influences surrounding him, and plans and prospects for the future. This book has been written by Hon. W. A. Pepper, who was elected to the United States Senate from Kansas to succeed Senator Ingalls. The title is THE FARMER'S SIDE, and this indicates the purpose of the work.

In the earlier chapters, Senator Pepper describes the condition of the farmer in various parts of the country, and compares it with the condition of men in other callings. He carefully examines the cost of labor, of living, the prices of crops, taxes, mortgages, and rates of interest. He gives elaborate tables showing the increase of wealth in railroads, manufactures, banking, and other forms of business, and he compares this with the earnings of the farmer, and also wage-workers in general. In a clear, forcible style, with abundant citations of facts and figures, the author tells how the farmer reached his present unsatisfactory condition. Then follows an elaborate discussion of "The Way out," which is the fullest and most authoritative presentation of the aims and views of the Farmers' Alliance that has been published, including full discussions of the currency, the questions of interest and mortgages, railroads, the sale of crops, and other matters of vital consequence.

This book is the only one which attempts to cover the whole ground, and it is unnecessary to emphasize its value. It is a compendium of the facts, figures, and suggestions which the farmer ought to have at hand.

THE FARMER'S SIDE has just been issued, and makes a handsome and substantial book of 280 pages. We have arranged with the publisher, for its sale to our readers at the publishers' price. The book may be obtained at our office, or we will forward copies to any address, post-paid, on receipt of $1.00 per copy. Address

NINTH YEAR. VOL. XI, NO. 4.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

BY EMILY ACTON.

Written for the FARMER'S WIFE.

The evening fire burned bright and clear,
As I sat mending Peter's coat,
He threw his paper down with "Pshaw!
What for do women want to vote?"

"Haint they got all the rights they need?
What would they do with any more?
Such consarned nonsense makes me sick."
In this mild form good Peter swore.

"They've got the right to live at ease,
While we toil on through thick and thin."
I thought of Monday's wash, and how
I worked to get it out and in.

"In summer they don't feel the heat,
They stay indoors, all nice and cool."
I thought of how my weary feet
The year I taught the district school.

Toiled back and forth through burning sands
And dust so thick one scarce could see,
That grimed my face, my clothes, my hands,
And could not with Peter quite agree.

"In winter they don't feel the cold;
Don't have to tramp out in the snow."
I thought of Cap'n Cattle's song,
"The stormy winds do blow, do blow!"

And thought how if the squeaky ghost
That dwells in shoe-soles ever talks,
What lots of tales 'twould have to tell
Of snow high-piled upon the walks.

Where children go to school, and maids
Through yards must travel to and fro,
While men sit round the grocery fire,
And "stormy winds do blow, do blow."

And how, when three weeks Peter sat
Upon the jury, snug and warm,
I milked the cows, and fed the stock,
And shoveled paths from house to barn.

"And they've got the right to lie abed While men get up, and hoe, and weed."
I broke my needle, lost my thread,
And felt with Peter vexed indeed.

For did not I that very morn
Rise up to work at half-past four;
While Peter yawned, turned round in bed,
And slept for fully an hour more;

Then bustling to the kitchen came;
"Now, I declare, this thing won't do!
If breakfast can't be earlier,
We'll have to rise at half-past two."

"I spose you've milked?" No? Wish you had.
I want to get away to work.
It almost drives me raving mad
To see the way the women shirk."

"What is your hurry now?" I said,
"To-day's election, I must vote.
Give me the pail; and, oh, I say,
I wish to night you'd mend my coat."

"How came your coat so torn?" I said,
Although I guessed full well before.
"What's that? How did I do it? Why,
That nail 'longside the entry door."

"When I'm as busy as I be,
Should think you'd try to drive it in,"
With that, he vanished, leaving me
Breakfast to cook, and mourn my sin.

With all this running in my head,
I fitted in another piece,
And hoped that Peter, finding me
Silent, would his oration cease.

But he, close sticking to his text,
"These foolish women," still went on
From "first" and "second," to next,
And even "fifthly" was begun.

What else he said I do not know;
My thoughts were wandering, I fear,
And feeling that his eloquence Struck an unsympathetic ear.

He started on another tack.
"Now, here's a big outrageous steal!
Remember, Sue, that farm way back, Owned by that poor old man, McNeil?"

"What do you think they've gone and done?
Why, slapped a railroad right plump through.
And the land won't no account.
What'll the poor old fellow do?"

Said I, "Why, Peter, that's too bad.
But then, 'twon't hurt him nuch, you know;
He died the time we built the shed,
Something like eighteen months ago."

"And Hannah lives there all alone,
And manages to earn her bread,
She has to hoe and plow, and sow,
All by herself, since he is dead."

Why, so he did; I had forgot.
Of course that makes it different, some,
I think 'twill raise the price of land,
And make all business round here hum."

"But what will poor old Hannah do?"
Said I, with pain for her distress.
"O, woman always get along.
Somebody'll care for her, I guess."

"But can't she sue the company?
And won't her claim for damage stand?"
"Oh, well," said Peter, loftily,
"Women haint got no need of land."

"They live too easy, spend too much—"
The words died down within his throat.
He fell asleep there in his chair,
While still I mended at his coat.

SENATOR MRS. LEASE.

The "Farmers' Wife" Endorses Her Candidacy.

NO REASON WHY SHE SHOULD NOT BE ELECTED.

What General Weaver Says.—Several Authorities Cited.

Hon. A. L. Williams, David Overmyer, J. W. Ady and Judge Hazen Find No Serious Objections to the Election of a Woman as Senator.

"Senator Lease of Kansas," would look odd on the congressional record. Yet it is possible. As Sam Wood used to say, "all things are possible with God and the farmers of Kansas," and if the next legislature should happen to feel so inclined, Mrs. Mary E. Lease may be the next senator from Kansas. It is not absolutely certain that the Populists will select the next senator, but granting that they do, it ought not to surprise those who have followed Kansas politics if Mrs. Lease were the fortunate one.

It is not a settled fact in any sense that if elected, she could not be seated. This is all the federal constitution has to say on the question of eligibility: "No person shall be senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not when elected be an inhabitant of that state for which he is chosen."

It will appear at a glance that the only constitutional objection to Mrs. Lease is the word "he," which by inference is taken by some to mean that the senator must be a man. In reply to this it might be argued that "person" is the word used elsewhere, and that "he" is only grammatically used to indicate either man or woman.

A Journal reporter sought the opinion of several of the best attorneys in this city on this point.

Hon. A. L. Williams said: "I know of no constitutional reason why Mrs. Lease should not be a senator. There is nothing to prevent it except the popular idea that the senator should be a man. I hope they'll elect her. I'm for her. She would keep them pretty busy if they sent her to Washington."

David Overmyer said: "I hardly know what would be done if she were elected. It would doubtless cause a contest, and my judgment is that the constitution would be construed to debar her. Nothing of the kind was ever done before, and when the constitution was adopted it had never been thought of. Clearly, then, it was originally intended that the United States senator should be a man. Mrs. Lease would make a great senator if she could be seated."

Hon. J. W. Ady said: "I don't care to give an opinion. The question would have to be settled on a contest, no doubt, and the results would be interesting. Other things being equal, Mrs. Lease is certainly entitled to the support of the Populists. She is the leader of them all."

Judge Z. T. Hazen: "I should like to see that question raised and decided. It would probably go to the supreme court, and would bring out a very important decision. As I think of it now I don't see why she should not be a senator and a good one, from her standpoint. While some of the best authorities in Kansas are in doubt as to the result, it would be an interesting case if she were elected and the election contested. No woman has ever taken part in the deliberations of the national congress, though they are forcing their way into nearly everything else. It was left to Kansas, the state that always introduces every new thing, to seriously discuss and perhaps to settle this point of eligibility of a woman to a seat in the national councils. When humorists and pugilists are elected to congress and coal barons and millionaires to the senate, a woman, intelligent and the leader of her own movement, might be admitted."—State Journal.

A dispatch from Wichita announces that Mrs. Lease is really a candidate for the United States senate. She says:

"I have never told any one I would be a candidate for the United States senate," said Mrs. Lease. "The meeting at which I was alleged to have made the announcement was at a meeting of the Alliance at Emporia, and no word of politics was spoken during the session. There has been a quiet undercurrent flowing in my direction and many prominent men of all political belief and from different parts of the Union have urged me to be a candidate. I shall, however, quietly bide my time, and when some of these people who are raising objections to my candidacy on the score of sex and alleged consequent constitutional ineligibility, have made what they consider a knock-down argument against me, I will make my bow to the people and announce myself as having entered the contest."

Mrs. Lease has received the following letter from General James B. Weaver on the subject:

"After a careful examination of the constitution of the United States, I find that no legal objection exists which would prevent the election of a woman to the United States senate. Section 3, of article one of the constitution provides that 'no person shall be a senator who shall not have attained the age of thirty years and been nine years a citizen of the United States and who shall not when elected be an inhabitant of the state for which he shall be chosen.' And stress is here laid upon age, citizenship and inhabitancy, and not upon sex. There can be no question as to the plain meaning of this constitutional provision.

Yours very respectfully,
J. B. WEAVER."

The FARMER'S WIFE endorses Mrs. Lease for senator, and the only objection that can be made against her is that she is a woman. If it is going to be the fight let it come, for there is no person, male or female, who has been engaged in this battle for human liberty that is more entitled to and any better qualified to fill the office as a United States senator than Mary E. Lease of Wichita. She has stood where the shot were the thickest, and with her true woman's heart beating and aching for the oppressed and homeless people, she has plead for them as only a mother can plead. Like a brave general upon the battle field she has faced the foe and ever battled, and fought that justice should be meted out alike to men and women, asking only that each should have equal rights and an equal chance in the race of life; not claiming more for her own sex than she would demand for her brothers, but that the doors of advancement be swung open as wide for one as the other.

We predict that if our sister enters the contest for the senatorial honors, she will receive not only the majority of the Populists vote, but that our Republican brothers will gladly lend a helping hand to place the crown upon our beloved state that has so long hovered above her brow.

The Wife of Columbus.

BY H. AMELIA TUTTLE.

At this time when such stupendous and novel preparations are going on for the grand event of '93, how strange it is that the noble wife of Columbus should seemingly be ignored. We have been reading lately upon this subject, and find that she is more deserving of a share of the homage of her illustrious husband, than have been most of the unknown wives of known men. Columbus married about 1470, Miss Perestrello of Lisbon, whose father was a distinguished and popular navigator. We are told, part of her marriage dowry, was a great collection of valuable charts, important journals and memoranda. She in childhood displayed enthusiastic lore for venturesome voyages on the seas, often accompanied her noted father, (from whom she undoubtedly inherited these tastes) upon his hazardous voyages in unfamiliar waters, and later, made very valuable drawings of their geographical discoveries, Lisbon then being headquarters for all schemes and ideas of geographical knowledge. She was well-known and admired as a brainy, brilliant daring woman. After her marriage to Columbus she constantly entreated him to become bolder in his explorations, and it is a well known fact, he used several of the charts she inherited, and finally yielded to her persuasion and reached the great goal, discovered America in 1492, and proved to the unbelievers, that the world was round, and also the fact, that every grand achievement done by great men: every laurel-wreath now in science, art, literature, needs and has for its impetus and incentive in its beginning or root, some noble woman, be she mother, wife, sister or sweetheart. There is probably no picture of this brave talented woman extant. But let us hope that some gracious and fitting tribute be given her precious memory, upon the forth-coming occasion, and this 19th or woman's century let every American woman set upon the important matter in proper unison.

WOMEN'S WAR.

Kansas to be the Next Battle Ground.

SHE WILL JOIN WYOMING IN THE SISTERHOOD OF STATES.

The Legislature will Submit the Question of Equal Suffrage to the Voters.—Both Parties Pledged to do this.

Now that the question of equal suffrage is to be submitted it behoves every suffragist to gird on the armor of war to commence at once and not stop until the women of Kansas obtain the full rights of citizenship which our heavenly Father vouch-safe to her from the beginning of time. The FARMER'S WIFE will be the leading factor in this fight and we invite all to give us a helping hand to place our mothers, our wives, our daughters and our sisters on an equal footing with men in this great race of life and battle for bread. Brothers and sisters unite; it matters not what your former political views. This is a fight for humanity, and suffrage should be guaranteed to our women from a non-partisan standpoint. The People's party met in state convention and by the heroic efforts of alliance women, the following plank was placed in the platform:

"We favor the submission to the vote of the people of Kansas of an amendment to the state constitution, providing for Equal Suffrage of all American citizens, without regard to sex."

A few weeks after, the republican party met in convention and through the efforts of the equal suffrage association adopted a similar plank, thus binding the legislators of both parties to submit the question to the voters of Kansas.

The senate stands 25 Peoples' party and 15 Republican, while the house is nearly equally divided and with a People's party governor who has already promised to sign the bill, it becomes a potent fact, that in a short time we will be called to settle the question forever, in Kansas. This will be a test and every state in the Union will be interested and will join with us in this great battle for freedom. The FARMER'S WIFE will keep you posted on this most important issue. Subscribe for it; encourage it; help it along.

Eminent Opinions of Woman Suffrage.

I am in favor of woman suffrage.—Phillips Brooks.

Justice is on the side of woman suffrage.—William H. Seward.

In the progress of civilization, woman suffrage is sure to come.—Charles Sumner.

With all my head, and with all my heart, I believe in woman suffrage.—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.

I am highly gratified with the late demonstration in the Senate on the question of female suffrage.—Hon. George W. Julian.

Woman suffrage is undoubtedly coming, and I for one expect a great deal of good to result from it.—Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

I go for all sharing the privileges of the government who assist in bearing its burdens, by no means excluding women.—Abraham Lincoln.

In the administration of a State, neither a woman as a woman nor a man as a man has any special functions, but the gifts are equally diffused in both sexes.—Plato.

I think there will be no end to the good that will come by woman suffrage, on the elected, on elections, on government and on woman herself.—Chief Justice Chase.

The correct principal is that women are not only justified, but exhibit the most exalted virtue, when they enter on the concerns of their country, of humanity, and of their God.—John Quincy Adams.

If prayer and womanly influence are doing so much for God by indirect methods, how shall it be when that electric force is brought to bear through the battery of the ballot-box?—Frances E. Willard.

I take it America never gave any better principal to the world than the safety of letting every human being have the power of protection in his own hands. I claim it for woman. The moment she has the ballot, I shall think the cause is won.—Wendell Phillips.

When you were weak and I was strong, I toiled for you. Now you are strong and I am weak. Because of my work for you, I ask your aid. I ask the ballot for myself and my sex. As I stood by you, I pray you stand by me and mine.—Clara Barton to the Soldiers.

self and my sex. As I stood by you, I pray you stand by me and mine.—Clara Barton to the Soldiers.

The true family is the type of the State. It is the absence of the feminine form in the conduct of the governments of the earth that makes them more or less savage. The State is now in a condition of half-orphanage. There are fathers of State, but no mothers.—Rev. Samuel J. May.

You ask my reasons for believing in woman's suffrage. It seems to me almost self-evident, an axiom, that every householder and tax-payer ought to have a voice in the expenditure of the money we pay, including, as it does, interests the most vital to a human being.—Florence Nightengale.

To have a voice in choosing those by whom one is governed is a means of self-protection due to every one. Under whatever conditions and within whatever limits men are admitted to the suffrage there is not a shadow of justification for not admitting women under the same.—John Stuart Mill.

For over 40 years I have hesitated to declare my conviction that justice and fair dealing, and the democratic principles of our government, demand equal rights and privileges of citizenship, irrespective of sex. I have not been able to see any good reason for denying the ballot to women.—J. G. Whittier.

Just as women in literature, both as authoress and audience, has effected a radical reform, an elimination of the obscenity and harshness form literature and art, so women in the State will avail to eliminate the rigors of law, and much of the corruption in politics that now prevails.—Prof. Wm. T. Harris.

It is very cheap wit that finds "it so droll that a woman should vote. If the wants, the passions, the vices, are allowed a full vote through the hands of a half-brutal, intemperate population, I think it but fair that the virtues, the aspirations, should be allowed a full voice as an offset through the purest of the people.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

If the principal on which we founded our government is true, that taxation must not be without representation, and if women hold property and are taxed it follows that women should be represented in the state by their votes. I think the State can no more afford to dispense with the votes of women in its affairs than the family.—Harriet Beecher Stowe.

When we seriously attempt to show that a woman who pays taxes ought not to have a voice in the manner in which the taxes are expended, that a woman whose property and liberty and person are controlled by the laws should have no voice in framing those laws, it is not easy. If women are fit to rule in monarchies, it is difficult to say why they are not qualified to vote in a republic.—Hon. H. B. Anthony, R. I.

Suppose, for the sake of argument, we accept the inequality of the sexes as one of nature's immutable laws; call it a fact that women are inferior to man in mind, morals and physique. Why should this settle or materially effect the subject of so-called woman's rights? Would not this very inferiority be a reason why every advantage should be given to the weaker sex, not only for its own good, but for the highest development of the races.—Huxley.

STATE TEMPERANCE UNION.

It Will Meet to Consider the Saloon Question in Kansas.

President James A. Troutman and Secretary F. O. Popenoe of the Kansas State Temperance union, have issued a call for the tenth annual meeting of that organization to be held in Topeka at Representative hall, Tuesday and Wednesday, November 29th and 30th. The opening session will be a mass meeting Tuesday evening. The business session will be held Wednesday and there will be a second mass meeting Wednesday evening. The prospective opening of saloons will be considered.

The annual meetings have heretofore been held in either August or September, but this year the time of the meeting was postponed until the results of the state election would be known. The railroad have agreed to make reduced rates for this meeting.

A bright little girl said a few days ago, "We are all Prohibitionists at our house, but we do not do any harm or good." When asked to explain this state of things, she said, "Mother is a Prohibitionist and cannot vote for it; father is a Prohibitionist and won't vote for it; so it don't do anybody any good or anybody any harm." That little girl was a philosopher.

MATRONS AND MAIDS.

FAIR WOMAN'S DOINGS AND IDEAS.

Valent Testimony of a Little Book—A New Mexico Genius—Excite an Interest in Literature—The Question of Ideals—Notes of Notables.

To Interest Children in Literature.

A BRIGHT woman hailing from New England has hit upon a clever method of increasing her income, which is mainly derived from her talents as a reader, recitationist and drawing room entertainer. She has formed several classes of children, the seances to be held in New York and adjacent cities this winter, in which the little folks are to be introduced to a study of English literature in a manner devised by herself, which will doubtless prove an interesting medium for making some tiny mites acquainted with the writers of their native tongue. Deciding upon some author, who shall form the subject to be treated, she gathers her young listeners about her, and begins by telling them something of his early life and surroundings, who his parents were, and under what circumstances he secured his education and developed his literary abilities. If a poet should be the theme selected, the story and origin of a poem would be treated, and after awakening an interest among her youthful audience in the author and the story, she leads them forward to a consideration of the poem itself. These classes have proved so successful in many instances that the teacher has been importuned to extend her discourses to children of an older growth, and frequently her talks have formed the precursor to an evening's amusement, that is later diversified by dancing or entertainment of a lighter character.

The Princess of Wales.

A few years ago, as the story is told in the English papers, the Princess of Wales went to the table of the Holy Communion accompanied for the first time by her eldest son. She gave him that morning a little manuscript book containing texts and verses of hymns, which she had copied for him, "hoping," as she said afterward, "that they might help him to keep closer to the cross."

After his death, as she was stooping over him to lay some flowers on his breast, she saw upon a little table close to his bedside, the book, bearing marks of long and constant use. The Princess told this fact to Canon Fleming, adding with tears streaming from her eyes, "I could not but feel that Eddy had clung to the cross."

The woman who, in her grief, told the story of her dead boy, because she knew that all other mothers would be glad with her, is the daughter, the wife, the mother of kings and princes. Yet the little worn book which gave her a hope that "Eddy had turned to the cross" is of more value to her now than that proudest of earthly crowns, which he lost in lying.

The boy who is a prince in a foreign court, or the boy who is in a school or shop or office in an American town, may believe that power, money, prizes of one sort or another, are the only things to think of and work for, and his mother may spend her life in trying to gain these things for him; but when the boy, in the midst of his work or fun, suddenly feels Death's hand upon him, it is only his soul and his fate that he thinks of.

And his mother, be she queen or slave, when she stands over the dead body of her boy, would give all the rank or wealth or success which she had hoped to see his, for one word to tell her that he had clung to the cross.—Youth's Companion.

She's a Genius.

Near the town of White Oaks, N. M., lives one of the most remarkable women even of this most remarkable age. The house in which she lives, a low, white walled adobe building covered with green vines and fitted out with rich carpets, artistic hangings, books and pictures, exquisite china and silver, and all the dainty belongings with which a refined woman loves to surround herself, was built with her own hands. The huge ranch on which it is located, with 3,000 cattle, is managed entirely by her. It is she who buys or takes up the land, selects and controls the men, buys, sells and transfers the cattle. She is also a skillful and intelligent prospector, and found the valuable silver mine on her territory in which she now owns a half interest. She sings charmingly, accompanying herself on the piano or guitar, and handles a cambric needle or a water color brush as ceterisus as she uses an adz or a jackplane. She entertains delightfully at her home whist parties, little dances and even an occasional german. Her name is Mrs. Barber, and she has been twice a widow. A woman who can run a ranch, build a house, manage a mine and engineer a successful german deserves a prominent place in the ranks of women of genius.

Mistaken Ideals.

The ideal woman of every man is the "womanly woman." The ideal man of every woman is the "manly man." And the expression "a womanly woman" means pretty much the same to every man who uses it, just as the "manly man" of one woman expresses a certain combination of qualities well known to every other woman.

The man's "womanly woman" is gentle, amiable, quiet and domestic. She loves to sit upon a low chair and hem things, with the lamp-light falling over her hair. It is unnecessary to say that although in theory this is the sort of woman a man prefers, in practice he may choose one entirely her opposite. She does not exist in large quantities, which is lucky, as she might prove dreadfully insipid if she did.

The woman's "manly man" means a man strong, brave and daring. He must perform easily bold deeds which she dare not attempt. She likes that—in dreams. In actual life she may find that a man neither daring nor bold has satisfactory and endearing qualities which makes him more after her heart than the ideal of her dreams could ever be.

We are not all alike, thank Heaven! but various. And the spark of originality which if implanted in each of us all is the thing to cherish and develop, and not distort ourselves into ideal forms.—Harper's Bazar.

When She Carves.

It is pleasant to see a woman carve, if she does it deftly; there seems to be something appropriate and almost scriptural in a woman dispensing food to her household. English women nearly always carve, but in this country the work is almost invariably relegated to the men. To save strength, time and patience in carving it is absolutely necessary to have a sharp knife. As a general rule cut across the grain. A turkey should be placed with the head toward the right hand of the carver. The breast is generally cut in slices parallel to the breastbone; but if the turkey is large, first cut the wings off close to the body and then cut across. A good way to keep a knife perfectly sharp, and make your husband think you give him the tenderest joints, is to use a "rifle," such as the farmers sharpen their scythes upon. A few turns on this will give an edge that will cut through anything.—New York Tribune.

That Bifurcated Nether Garment.

"The bifurcated nether garment," which is ignorantly supposed to be specially distinctive of the masculine toilet, belongs by right to our own sex. Archaeological research has proved that the women of Judah were the first wearers of the nether garment in a bifurcated form, and that man, the tyrant on perceiving the convenience and comfort of this article of dress evolved by the superior intelligence of woman, did, with his usual arrogance and selfishness, insist upon appropriating the same to his own use and doomed his womenkind to incur their limbs with clinging, flowing robes "which render it impossible for us to cope with man in the useful and common avocations." It is satisfactory to have man's meanness and cunning thus shown up, and in the good time coming we shall doubtless insist upon resuming the "bifurcated nether garment."

The Boy Had a Front Seat.

Between the shafts of a coal-cart a horse jogged along at a leisurely pace one day last week, says the Brooklyn Eagle. It appeared to have the whole day before it, and looked as though it was ruminating on the perversities of fate as manifested in the social distinction between the hauler of a heavy load of coal and the animal that wags its docked tail in front of a stylish T-cart.

It was going in the direction of Fulton street, and had just left a coal-yard situated on a thoroughfare where the aforesaid coal-yard is, very properly, regarded as an eyesore. Its driver was a contented-looking Irishman, to whom the comforts of a well-smoked pipe seemed to be appealing, to the exclusion of everything else in the world except the companion by his side. Social distinctions were not troubling him at all, notwithstanding the fact that his companion was manifestly at one end of the social line, while he was at the other extreme.

A boy in something suggestive of a fauntleroy suit sat beside him, but there was nothing effeminate about the lad. He was evidently about 8 years of age—that is to say, he was exactly old enough to appreciate the precise character of the exalted privilege he was enjoying. Nothing could be more apparent than that the topmost summit of the young man's ambition was being gratified. As no other horses were in sight, and the danger of collision was therefore quite remote, the daintily attired young man was, for the time being, actually master of the proud situation.

The reins were in his grasp, and he was shouting "Get up! get up!" with unnecessary but most enjoyable vigor and enthusiasm. His vocal industry has no effect whatever, either upon the animal or upon its regular driver. The horse jogged along at no accelerated speed, as though it understood the situation perfectly well, and the smoker occasionally cast an approving glance at the youngster. The procession attracted some attention, and pedestrians enjoyed the contrast.

About three hours later the same turn-out again made its appearance in the same thoroughfare. The boy did not seem to be quite so daintily attired. Not that his face was in reality any blacker than that of the regular driver, not at all! Both faces were just about as black as they could be, but the boy's face looked the blackest of the two, because of the contrast between its color and that of such parts of it as had escaped the thick layer of coal-dust. It was quite apparent that he had helped to unload the coal, but whether he had risen to the dignity of actually using the shovel was not explained.

In front of a handsome brown-stone house the young man was himself finally unloaded. He did not seem to have the least misgiving. He had about him the air of one who has at last achieved the object of a perfectly legitimate and laudable ambition. His mother was looking out of the window as the coal cart materialized. She had long ago become alarmed about her son, but she did not know him until he opened the gate. Then she raced down stairs, at once relieved and mortified.

"Oh, what a sight!" she exclaimed. "Where on earth have you been, you young scamp?"

"It's pretty hard work, mamma, but you can bet it's lots o' fun, an' I had a front seat all the way. You should try it."

FOR CURIOUS BOYS.

How to Have Fun with Gunpowder and a Glass of Water.

Gunpowder, as is well known, is composed of potassic nitrate (salt-peter), sulphur and charcoal. Of these ingredients the first is very soluble in water and the others insoluble. The amateur chemist can perform an interesting experiment by separating the soluble salt. It is only necessary to place a little gunpowder in a glass half filled with water and allow it to stand a day or so in a warm place—such as a sunny window sill.

The salt-peter will first dissolve in the water, and then creeping up the sides of the glass will crystallize around the edge, as shown in the illustration. The creeping property of certain salts is a very interesting—and sometimes a very annoying—one to the chemist. Ammoniac chloride, or sal ammoniac, possesses it in a high degree, and it may often be observed incrusting the edges of electric batteries, in which its solution is used as an exciting agent. It may be prevented by covering the edges of the vessel containing it with grease, wax or paraffin.

The residue left in the tumbler consists of sulphur and charcoal, but there is no simple method of separating them. The sulphur will dissolve in bisulphide of carbon, but we cannot recommend the use of this inflammable and offensive liquid to the amateur in chemistry.

Peace of Mind.

Ways and means of living are to be viewed, largely, from the standpoint of peace of mind—of happiness. No one can afford to live in an uncongenial atmosphere. If he can buy peace of mind it is a good investment. Not that either mental or spiritual peace are for sale in the market-place, but still they depend to a very good degree on matters of environment, and peace of mind is a working capital of life. It has no representation on the ledger, but all the same it has value beyond computation.

The energy, good-will, interest in affairs and faith in one's self and one's associates—all of these are the factors that put one in a working mood, and to most of us our working moods are our capital. We may be able to afford many losses, but we cannot afford to lose this. Whoever takes it from us takes that which, like the traditional good name, not enriches him, and leaves us "poor indeed." One's most priceless possessions are his energy and his faith.

What right has the despondent or the ill-tempered or "soured" individual to bring his discordant atmosphere into that of harmony, and sweetness and energy? It is a clogging, even a paralyzing force, and the man who is in a dark mood should be denied approach to his fellow-creatures until he can regain the level of humanity.

Although, of course, there are not wanting instances where one who is in a despondent mood, or in real trouble, needs the sweet ministering of cheerfulness and energy. Then the best possible use of this "working capital" may be made—of all the cheerfulness and energy and love that has been stored up. It is missionary work, of the higher and the more subtle kind.

But for all of us the work of life demands all that is encouraging and hopeful and of good repute; and each and all who aim to live worthily should regard faith and energy and good-will as the best of all working capital.

CLOCK MADE OF FLOWERS.

The Curious Mechanical and Decorative Sight in a Paris Garden.

A little masterpiece of mechanism, and at the same time a model of garden decoration, is the floral clock which decorates the garden of an ingenious Parisian. The appearance of this oddest of timepieces is shown in the accompanying cut. The dial, which is not less than thirty feet in diameter, is composed entirely of choice plants of various colors. The hands, which actually move over the face of the clock, are made in the same manner, and the whole effect of the arrangement is that of an immense basket of flowers. The mechanism which drives the hands is lodged in a large chamber built in the garden immediately beneath the dial. It is composed of the usual machinery employed in operating large clocks, except that it is particularly constructed, to move the great weight of the earth which must be supported by the revolving hands. This is cleverly accomplished by making an ordinary clock train release a volume of water every minute and this by its gravity operates the wheels that send the heavy hands forward. The whole arrangement is exceedingly ingenious and interesting, and, according to the Philadelphia Record, is the daily admiration and wonder of hundreds of the inventor's townsmen.

At School in Switzerland.

The system of education in practice among the Swiss is enlightened and far reaching. Not only are pupils under a strict and kindly discipline while at school, but they are also made to feel that the warning and protecting care of their tutors is over them whenever they are outside the father's house. As soon as the child is in the street he has passed from the circle of his home, and that moment begins the school's authority.

Regulations, printed on slips and left at every house, contain, among a score of others equally sensible, the following rule, relating to outdoor manners:

"Delay of any kind between the scholar's home and school is not allowed. No whooping, yelling, throwing stones and snowballs, teasing children, or ridiculing age and deformity can be endured. Grown persons shall be met with civility as they pass. Thus shall honor be reflected on the schools."

Once in the classroom, the pupil is taught deportment, as well as his "three R's"; he is told how to walk, stand, and speak, and a blot on his book and a smudge on his face are regarded as equally bad.

"A book defouled is wasted," said a teacher to the author of "The Swiss Republic," "and our economical habits will not suffer such loss. Turn over any of our books in daily use, and you will find none torn or defaced by scribbling."

The same rule applies to the school building and furniture. The desks look as if they received daily washing and polishing; not a spot of ink is to be seen on their surfaces, nor the slightest evidence of the mischievous boy's knife. The corridors and stairways show neither spot nor scratch, and the walls are free from finger marks, and no bits of paper litter the floor. The children, representing all grades of society, from patrician to peasant, are neatly and comfortably clad. None are dirty, ragged, or shodless.

"If a child comes to school with his face begrimed, or his clothes torn," says a teacher, "he is washed and mended and then sent home. The mother is ashamed on finding that some other person has had to wash her child, and the child so mortified that it never becomes necessary to repeat the experiment."

For Lazy Horses.

A resident of Riverside, Cal., owns a lazy horse. He fixed a battery in the buggy to give the animal an electric shock occasionally instead of using a whip. He was to press the button with his foot, and the electricity was to do the rest. At the first pressure, however, the horse kicked the carriage so hard that some portions of it have not come down yet.

Trees.

It is best not to cut young trees back in the fall, but perform the work in the spring. If cut back then the trees will require another pruning in the spring should any portion of the trees be winter-killed; which is liable to happen every season.

HOME AND THE FARM.

A DEPARTMENT MADE UP FOR OUR RURAL FRIENDS.

To Make Money at a Dull Season—A Cheap and Handy Food Cutter—Arrangement for Sorting Potatoes—Should Have a Good Lawn, Etc.

A Good Sheep Shelter.

A successful sheep raiser shelters his flock in the convenient shed shown in our illustration. The only bought lumber is for the ends. The frame is made of posts and poles, hewed only near the mortises and tenons, and sloping gently back to a low and tight stone wall. The forward pitch is steeper and shorter, reaching to within four and a half feet of the ground. The roof is made of slabs and poles covered with long swill grass, two feet deep at the eaves and eight feet at the ridge, and built like a stack to shed rain. The posts stand on flat stones to prevent decay. Board caves troughs carry the water to the sides to prevent a mudhole in front, and the ground slopes away from the shelter. The shed opens to the south, allowing the sun to shine in, but excluding the prevailing winds. During lambing time, one part of the shed is boarded up close and warm for ewes and young lambs. Movable feed racks extend from the front to within three feet of the back wall. The manure is not cleaned out until spring. Abundant bedding is used, and the dry compost thus made is a rich fertilizer. This shed is twenty-five by sixty feet, and will easily hold 100 sheep.—American Agriculturist.

Sorting Potatoes Made Easy.

Make a box 12 feet long and 4 feet wide, like the illustration, with three partitions, the back piece should be about 4 feet high, the next 3 feet, and the next 1 1/2 feet high. Nail pickets on for screens. Put them rather close together on the first incline, and further apart on the second. This sorts them in three grades. Shovel them on the top or first incline and poke them down, and you have them sorted in three grades.—Practical Farmer.

Money at a Dull Season.

If one has a shop, hen-house, barn or tight shed with a southern exposure and glass, he can put in a second-hand stove at a cost of $1 or $2, keep the place warm with waste wood, which abounds on most farms, and start plants for the gardens of his neighbors and of those in the surrounding villages. These will include cabbage, tomato, pepper, egg, celery, and other plants. If the room is not the warmest it makes no difference, and if the plants grow slowly they will be harder and give better satisfaction in transplanting. At 6 in high these seedlings will be ready for sale and should command 25c per dozen at least, if sold in little boxes filled with earth. The boxes of thrifty plants can be readily sold from house to house or left at the stores on commission. The grower will be astonished by a neat little sum from no apparent outlay. A room 10x12 is large enough for a starter. If it is dark, insert some sashes, which may be made cheaply. Have the sashes 3x6 ft and let the middle supports for the glass run lengthwise only. When setting the glass let it lap, but be sure that it does not extend over the next pane more than 1/2 in. To make these plants the best for looks and growth, sow the seeds in fine, rich soil and transplant them an inch apart at 1 inch high. They will not be retarded long and will grow more rapidly than ever. Before being finally placed in the boxes for sale, they should be transplanted a second time into boxes and beds and 2x3 in apart. Nothing is more important for their appearance and after-growth than two or three transplantings.

Wintering Geraniums.

For the last five years, says a correspondent, I have kept my bedding geraniums in the cellar over winter, and the plan has proved a very successful one. The plants are left in their beds, covering them at night to protect from frost till the approach of severely cold weather; then they are dug carefully to preserve the roots. At least two-thirds of the tops are cut off and the plants closely packed in strong, deep boxes with the roots well covered with earth which is sifted and packed among them. After being thoroughly watered the boxes are placed in the shade for a few days, and stored in a dry cellar till spring. They require no further attention than an occasional watering. When removed from the cellar in the following April or May the plants are covered with new shoots, and are gradually exposed to the sun till the time to again transplant their beds on the lawn. The stocks being large and strong, in a few weeks the beds are beautiful with foliage, and soon present a mass of flowers.

Protect the Sheep.

The tendencies at present are for more sheep on the farms, and more should be kept, especially on dairy farms. The great drawback has been the cur dogs, and if it were not for these a great many more sheep would have been kept. The Legislature should give us a good fair dog law, but until we have it we must devise some means to protect ourselves. One good way of protection is to fence in small fields with chicken wire or woven wire fences. Another is by the use of portable hurdles which may be moved every day or two. Still another way is by the use of bells on the sheep's neck, using one to every eight sheep. These will not only scare the dogs when they get in with the sheep, but will give alarm. Sheep owners should have a good rifle handy and send all dogs that are found in the flock "over the river."—Farm and Home.

Live Stock Notes.

The better the grade of calf, generally the better the profit.

Some breeds are best for early maturity and others for great weight.

As a rule getting a yearling fat does not materially hasten its maturity.

Milk feed and skimmed milk are good materials to make growth in pigs.

ALWAYS stir the slop in the barrel well before feeding, and never allow it to stand too long.

If rye is fed to hogs, in nearly all cases it should be fed in connection with wheat bran or cornmeal.

WHEN going any considerable distance grass-fed cattle will shrink very heavily, for the first ten days at least.

In many cases a few cattle can be kept on a farm with profit when a large number would only result in loss.

If cattle are to be wintered largely on roughness it is very important that they be provided with a comfortable shelter.

The object in feeding pigs that are to be marketed is to push them from the start, so as to maintain a steady growth.

An important item in selecting a good brood sow is her milk producing powers. This is necessary if she raises good pigs.

A sow that will bring an average of eight pigs in a litter twice a year is doing more than average work and is valuable.—Live Stock Indicator.

Experiments With Potatoes.

In experiments at the Utah Station for various purposes, it was found that depth of planting did not materially affect the total yield of the crop. Also that when they were planted near the surface the tubers contained 23.1 per cent more starch than when planted deep, and were therefore worth 33.5 per cent more for eating purposes besides being more palatable. Shallow tillage, and even no tillage was better than deep tillage, a fact which we hope will not lead to careless culture. Eight inches apart in the rows was found to be the limit of greatest production, as the yield of a greater or less distance diminished. Increasing the distance between the rows did not appear to decrease the yield. Close planting resulted in an increase of moisture and a decrease of starch in the tubers. Planting nearer than one foot in rows three feet apart is not recommended. In the production of potatoes, quality should be one of the prime considerations, since they hold such an important position in family use.

Have a Good Lawn.

The charm of a lawn consists largely in its dark green color, luxuriant growth and freedom from weeds. Many try to secure this result by covering their lawns with rotten manure in the fall or early winter. A much pleasanter method is to sow a mixture of, say, equal parts nitrate of soda, superphosphate and muriate of potash on the lawn this fall, and then next spring give another dressing of nitrate of soda. Apply this fall the above mixture at the rate of half a ton per acre, or say a small handful to each square yard. The above treatment will not only greatly improve the lawn, but will also give increasing luxuriance to the trees, shrubs, roses and flowers.

Working and Packing Butter.

Butter for immediate use need not be worked as clean as that which is to be kept for some time. The nutty flavor of butter is caused by the formation of a volatile oil known as butyric acid and by the action of a ferment in the cheesy matter of the butter. If this takes place too quickly and there is too much of it present, the butter becomes rancid, while if the butter is washed very clean and all the buttermilk taken out, the action is delayed. To pack butter for keeping it should be salted (1 oz to the pound) after washing thoroughly, and packed in clean or new tubs. First scald the tub, rinse it with cold water, then with cold brine, and rub the inside lightly with fine salt. Pack the butter firmly to exclude the air, and to within a half inch at the top. Sprinkle with salt and cover with cloth a little larger than the top. Press this down and cover with salt, then put on the cover and fasten down tightly. Keep the tubs in a clean, dry and cold cellar.

Cheap Feed Cutter.

The handy feed cutter shown in the engraving, has a steel knife made the shape of the old-fashioned grain sickle but with wider blade.

Two pieces of one-fourth by one-inch iron are bent in the same shape, and bolted to pieces fastened to room wall. The irons should be just far enough apart, HOMEMADE FEED CUTTER to allow the knife to pass down between them. The knife is raised, the sheaf placed under, and the cut made. The sickle must be kept very sharp to do good work. Care must be taken that the fingers are not caught and wounded while slicing the feed. Turnips and sugar beets may be sliced with this contrivance. The chief advantage in cutting hay is that grain may be mixed with the food. Sliced roots are much easier eaten by cows and sheep than the compact large roots. It is well to moisten chopped hay before feeding.—American Agriculturist.

Poultry Pickings.

Give the chickens fine gravel and let them help themselves.

If poultry are confined, if they are not given a good variety they eat much that had better be let alone.

In very hot weather see that the chickens have some chance to get into the shade. Too hot a sun is not good.

The nests and roosts should always be easy of access in order to make the work of keeping down the lice much easier.

WHILE chickens thrive best in small numbers or flocks, ducks seem to do better when a large number are kept together.

One advantage with geese is that they are hardy, easily raised and require less care and expensive food than any other class of fowls.

On large farms there is no reason why the chickens' runs should not be very large, as the ground can be put to few uses that will pay better.

Hints To Housekeepers.

A SLICE of tomato rubbed over the hands will remove berry stains.

CAREERS if well sprinkled with salt and then wiped with cloth squeezed out of warm water containing a spoonful of spirits of turpentine to every quart, will look bright and new, and will not be troubled with moths and buffalo bugs.

To avoid duplicating wedding gifts in silver, it would be wiser to give a friend fine linen. Really fine linen to be used on special occasions will last a long time, and the happy bride who receives it will always bless you for aiding her in making her table handsome.

PASTE a list of its contents on every box or trunk or closet of stored-away goods. Write down each one as you put it in, then the list will be headed with the bottom ones. Then when the name is written on each package it is an easy thing to find any needed article.

THROW bits of nails or small pieces of unruined iron into the inkstand. The corrosive action of any acid contained in the ink will expend itself on the iron and not on the pen. After a steel pen has been used for a time in plain ink a rusty substance is formed. This is prevented by the presence of iron in the ink.

For the destruction of the mosquito Prof. Riley, in his Lowell Institute lecture, recommends pyrethrum powder moistened, made into little cones, then allowed to dry, and burned in a close room. The effect is to stupefy or kill the mosquito. The professor does not think it is true that mosquito bites sometimes inoculate the body with malarial poison.

To cook asparagus cut in half-inch pieces a large bunch of asparagus; begin at the top and cut till you reach the hard buds. Put these aside to flavor soup with, and put the tender pieces in a stewpan, with a little water. Cook for 15 or 20 minutes, when the water should be nearly boiled away. Add a quart of milk, butter the size of an egg, bring to a boil, season with salt and pepper, have two eggs well beaten; let it just stop boiling; stir in the eggs, which must be only scalded, not cooked hard.

DECIDEDLY NEGATIVE.

Singular Array of Facts in United States History.

From Mr. Malcolm Townsend's unique collection of facts regarding the history and composition of the United States and to which he has given the comprehensive title "U. S.," we glean the following "curiosities."

The Dismal Swamp is not a swamp, neither is it dismal or unhealthy. It is a beautiful stretch of pure water and the healthiest place on the American continent.

The East River, flowing between New York and Brooklyn, is not a river, but a sea strait connecting Long Island Sound and the ocean.

Manhattan is not the Indian name of New York Island, but it is directly traceable to a Spanish original: manas, "drunkenness;" manas, machados, monates, "the place of drunkenness." Manhattan is but the Indian form of the word.

The Declaration of Independence was not signed on July fourth by the representatives whose names have become historic. It was given to the world on Monday the eighth of July, 1776, with but two signatures: John Hancock, President of the Congress, and Charles Thomson, Secretary. The signatures of forty-five delegates were affixed to a copy of the original paper on Tuesday, the second of August, 1776.

There was not a bearded face among all the signers of the Declaration. "All the signers" says the record, "had smooth faces."

The word "God" does not appear in the Constitution of the United States, nor is there any reference to creeds or church beliefs.

Three delegates to the convention would not sign the Constitution. These were: Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, George Mason and Edward J. Randolph of Virginia. Gerry feared a civil war; Mason a monarchy, and Randolph objected to the powers conferred on the president.

Benedict Arnold was not the first or only traitor during the Revolution. His predecessor in that "Judas office" was Doctor Benjamin Church of Raynham, Mass., arrested, tried and imprisoned at Cambridge, Mass., in 1775. He had been an active member of the Provincial Congress and was trusted as an ardent patriot. He was released from prison in 1776 because of failing health, embarked for the West Indies and he and the vessel in which he sailed were never afterward heard of.

The following States have not a State motto: Indiana, Mississippi, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio and Texas.

The dollar sign ($) is not a monogram of "U. S.," but dates from the days when the transfer was made from Spanish to American dollars and accounts were kept equally in dollars and reals. Thus: one dollar eight reals (American and Spanish parallel accounts.) Later the eight was placed between the cancellation mark |||; then the perpendicular lines crossed the 8, and finally the 8 shaded into an S and combined with the cancellation lines evolved the present sign ($).

The head of a man does not appear on any coin of the United States.

Eight States do not observe New Year's Day as a legal holiday; seven States do not class Washington's birthday as a legal holiday.

Friday is not an "unlucky" day for the United States. At least forty great events in United States history fell on Friday.

The American Indian is not a "vanishing race." There is very nearly as large an Indian population in the United States to-day as at the time of Columbus.

The Twelve-Inch Cannon.

Few people comprehend what an enormous machine the twelve-inch cannon made by the Government is, and probably the best method of stating its size is by comparing it with a heavy locomotive, such as takes a fast passenger train to Albany from New York City. The diameter of the cylinders of the largest of these engines averages 18 inches, while the exterior diameter of the muzzle of one of these guns is 20.5 inches. The extreme length of the locomotive and tender will probably be not far from 54 feet, while the gun is 36 feet 8.1 inches long. The gun weighs, unmounted, about 52 tons, while the locomotive will probably not exceed 40 tons. Other comparisons could be drawn, but these are enough to convey some idea of the ponderous nature of one of these pieces. In order to insure a steady flight of the projectile, there are 72 grooves, each 0.06 inch deep and 0.3736 inch wide, cut around the inside. These grooves, termed the rifling, begin at the rate of one revolution in a length of 50 feet at the breech and increase to one revolution in 25 feet at the muzzle. The powder chamber is 5 feet 3 inches long and 14.2 inches in diameter, and is calculated to receive a charge of 40 pounds. The projectile will be of the Hotzer armor-piercing type, weighing 1,000 pounds and discharged with a velocity of 2,000 feet a second at the muzzle of the gun.

THERE is a good deal in becoming discouraged in time.

Schiller and the Duke.

Karl, Duke of Wurtemberg, living in the latter part of the eighteenth century, was much dreaded by his subjects on account of his eccentricities and his severity. He founded a university near Stuttgart, called the "Karlsruhe," in which all branches of science were taught, but the students could not carry on their free and unrestricted life, as at other universities, but had to submit to a strict military discipline and often to severe punishment. Frederick Schiller, who afterwards became the most celebrated German poet, was one of the students in the year 1775. Duke Karl took great interest in the institution and had founded and often, with his consort Francisca, Countess of Hohenheim, paid the university an unexpected visit. On such occasions he began a rigid examination of the first student he met, in some particular branch of his studies. If he received prompt and correct answers he expressed to the happy student satisfaction; but, if, on the contrary, the student, taken by surprise, uttered some unintelligible or wrong answer, or did not answer at all, Karl Duke, as he was called in Wurtemberg, would turn around suddenly and say to his spouse, "Come, Frauzel, let the blockhead alone." Of course the unfortunate student became the laughing stock of his comrades and this habit of the duke furnished ample material for conversation. Schiller playfully imitated the duke's manner of catechising the students, and this was reported to Karl. One day he came again with his consort and met Schiller in the corridor. The examination began at once and Schiller's answers were satisfactory. But the duke suddenly assumed a ferocious air and said: "Look here, Schiller, I am told that you can copy me very well. Is that so? I would like to see you do it. Who undertakes to copy the duke must understand his business well, or thunder and lightning shall come upon him. Go on now with your copying."

Schiller quickly responded, and requesting the duke to assume the character of the student, he bawled out:

"Look here, Schiller, I have been told that you dare to copy me, the duke. Is that true?"

As Karl did not answer at once Schiller continued:

"Well, now, go on at once with your answer, or thunder and lightning shall come upon you."

The duke replied in good humor: "Your highness will pardon—only an inconsiderate joke."

"A joke!" cried Schiller, who threw an angry look at the duke, and taking the arm of the countess, said: "Come, Frauzel, let the blockhead alone."

The duke, at first nonplussed by such audacity, soon broke out into loud laughter and afterward bestowed a great deal of kindness upon Schiller.

Old Finger Rings.

Queen Elizabeth had an immoderate love for jewelry, and the description given of her dresses covered with gems of the greatest rarity and beauty reads like a romance. For finger rings she had remarkable fondness. Paul Hentzner, in his "Journey into England," 1598, relates that a Bohemian baron having letters to present to her at the palace at Greenwich the queen, after pulling off her glove, gave him her right hand to kiss, sparkling with rings and jewels—a mark of particular favor.

Among the old Northmen rings were generally worn by rich people and persons of rank. Such rings are frequently found in barrows of pagan date, and from their nature and quality it is easy to determine that they were generally of very simple workmanship; the reason of which, undoubtedly, is that they were used instead of money in commercial transactions, and had, therefore, not infrequently to be cut asunder. Still, rings of more artistic workmanship are sometimes found in pagan graves.

Rings of Italian workmanship of a later period are remarkably beautiful. Venice particularly excelled in this art. In the Lonsborough collection is a fine specimen. The four claws of the outer ring, in open-work, support the setting of a sharply-pointed pyramidal diamond, such as was then coveted for writing on glass. The shank bears a fanciful resemblance to a serpent swallowing a bird, of which only the claws connecting the face remain in view.

It was with a similar ring Raleigh wrote the words on a window pane: "Fain would I rise, but that I fear to fall," to which Queen Elizabeth added: "If thy heart fail thee, do not rise at all," an implied encouragement which led him on to fortune.

In the Lonsborough collection is a ring, doubtless a rage d'amour, the hoop of which is richly decorated with quaint floriated ornaments, cut upon its surface, and filled in with the black composition termed neillo, once extensively used by goldsmiths in enriching their works. This beautiful ring is inscribed within the hoop, "Mon Cor Pleur"—"my heart's delight."

WHEN a man builds a house, although he may be very careful about the whole of it, he takes more pains with the windows than with the rest.

MRS. EMMA D. PACK, EDITRESS.

In Michigan they call it the Farmer's alliance, in Kansas Eli-ance. Interpreted, we got there.

The bill introduced by Senator Felton in the interests of the liquor dealers and distillers of the United States, providing for an indefinite extension of the bonded period for distilled spirits, is iniquitous. It practically places about $75,000,000 annually of taxes in the hands of the liquor dealers for an indefinite period. If these Congressmen were half as anxious to protect women and children of the country from the ravages of the saloon as they are to protect the liquor interests at other people's expense, the country would be much better off.

We are all happy over the result of the recent election in Kansas, and all feel like throwing up our old bonnets (hats, men would say) for joy, and it is right that we should rejoice for the victory we have gained. But it is not right to waste money in getting up parades and holding up before the people pictures of the poor unfortunates who have been making so many fatal mistakes for us, these thirty long years, when in our midst are so many hungry and half clad human beings that could be made comfortable with the money thus wasted. We were in hopes that our party would begin its reform work at once, for it has come to stay, and if we ratify all of our great victories in the future like this one, the party will have to at once go to making money or else call on Jay Gould and the Vanderbilts to defray the expenses of our ratifications.

No one can engage in a higher calling than in working for the success of the Peoples' party. Their cause is noble. It is the cause of justice, fraternity and liberty. But the cause can never be pushed to the front by cowards. Neither can it ever win lasting victory if led by political mountebanks, office seekers, and place hunters, whose sole object is gain and political preferment. As rotten and corrupt a ring of politicians as ever scuttled a party ship are waiting anxiously to get at the helm of the Peoples' party ship in Kansas. To win victory with such leaders would be infinitely worse than defeat at the polls with honorable, honest and upright men. Is it wrong then to denounce injustice within our ranks. If it is, we have made a mistake in uniting with a party who held up to the world the motto of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." We hope, however, that the people will say it is not wrong, but that it is right, and that it is our duty to do so. And furthermore, we hope our brothers will see to it that the party that has started out with such bright prospects for doing good will be kept free from political tricksters, and we shall continue to do our duty fearlessly.

We love the cause of the people, and we pledge our word we will remain true to it and lend our aid to it and do all in our power to prevent a party that has been built up by the poorly clothed and scantily fed people of the country from falling in the hands of bloodies.

WHARTON'S DEFEAT.

The Topeka Advocate, which is probably as well known as the FARMER'S WIFE, and is morally responsible for its utterances, throws out a challenge for a newspaper fight. Our only answer is we have no time, space or disposition for any morbid fight of that nature. What we said in regard to the election of Wharton for congressman in the Fourth District the official count has proven true, and our fears were not groundless. A congressman is the people's servant, and the people have a right to know how their servants behave or misbehave. It is the mission of this paper to seek the greatest good to the greatest number and to awaken people to the necessity of reform. This cannot be done without criticizing public persons and stripping the mask from hypocritical pretense. And, since some party-blind people refuse at first to believe our report, they now see that we were right and freely admit it.

Let parties stop choosing such men for public servants; let partisans stop white-washing their conduct; and especially let voters stop saying: "I'm as good a temperance man as you are," while supporting such men for office; and let such men step down and out into private life if they don't wish to have their shameful conduct exposed by those who, in the fear of God and love of man, believe in telling the truth for the whole people's information and the general welfare.

To spare one guilty person in such a case is cruelty to thousands.

We ought not let the highest interest of humanity and thousands of boys and girls suffer for the sake of screening one ambitious office seeker. If a man's character cannot stand close scrutiny, he should stay in private life and his fellows should show themselves better friends than to put him up for public inspection and important services at the people's expense.

A Child Night Worker.

In New York City, where clothing is made to flood New England, it is no unusual sight to see children of five, six and even four years, employed all day sewing on buttons, pulling out bastings or carrying high piles of work to and from the sweater's shops. A teacher in one of the primary schools on the east side, told me not long since, of a little girl in her class who was constantly falling asleep. When she asked her at what time she usually went to bed, to her astonishment, the child answered one o'clock, and explained that she had "to pull out bastings" until that time.—Exchange.

Mothers, after reading the above article, can you still feel you have no work to do? In your imagination, place your own little daughter in such a place, even at the age of fifteen, what would be your feelings? Let us not leave a stone unturned until such wrongs are righted. No matter if we are able to provide the luxuries of life for our daughters and sons, we must not lose sight of the fact that those little children are human beings. And we know not how thick and fast the tears of that little girl's mother falls because her darling must weave and toil her sweet childhood away. Oh, mothers, as you see your children happy in their innocent glee, stop and think how many, many poor children who never know childhood's happy hours.

Facts of Encouragement to Women.

The fair sex has achieved a fresh victory in Michigan, where the supreme court has delivered its decision that a woman may legally perform all the functions of a county clerk. The case was that of Miss Marguerite Barr of Flint, who, in the usual course of her duties issued a regular writ of attachment. The legality of the act was questioned on the broad general ground that a woman cannot act as a county clerk. The supreme court, however, holds that the choice of a deputy by a county clerk is not limited by race, sex, color or age, as the office is wholly ministerial.—Chicago Tribune.

Why not elect woman to fill such offices. In many places they are hired to do the work in those offices while a man holds the office and draws the salary.

Are Women as Intelligent as Men.

The civil service records of the past three years show that out of the number of young men applicants examined for government officers only a little over one-half passed, while four-fifths of the women applicants passed.

Perhaps the women's brains are not so muddled by tobacco and intoxicants and thus they are enabled to give clearer answers in examinations.—Ex.

After reading the civil service records one would naturally think they are capable of learning and can tell what they have learned.

We call the attention of our subscribers to the "blue cross" on the margin of this paper, and would like to have you renew your subscription at once. We dislike to be obliged to take any names from our list. Our paper will be more interesting for the next year on account of the great fight for woman's rights in Kansas. You want to keep posted. Kansas Redeemed.—Topeka Capital, November 9, 1892.

Mr. Editor, why did you not tell the good people that our beloved state had been "redeemed," not by the calamity "makers," but by their "sufferers"?

Nobly our people fought and won the battle on November 8th.

No truer, nobler man will have a seat in the State senate than Mr. R. Householder of Cherokee county.

The People's party say if they cannot send the very "best" men to the halls of Congress, they will not send any. A very wise decision.

Give us men who represent the home that has had the consecrated toil and labor of ourselves and families, and we will put our shoulders to the great political wheel and help elect them. Otherwise we will join hands and defeat them.

Brothers, how would it do to let the sisters select the next United States senator?

When the women vote, such men as Tom Watson, John Otis, Fred Close, Dave Howard, and Grant McConnell will not only be nominated, but they will be elected.

We are about to have a fine, large millinery establishment opened in our city presided over by a man. Men never get out of their sphere.

Our brave men fell fighting the battle for the people, that they might prevail.

People must get the idea out of their heads that every time a brother or sister differs with them that they have sold out. People may differ and still be honest.

Yes, the McKinley bill is a grand, good thing for the people. The People's party speakers explained it so plain to the voters, they made up their mind to leave the party that favored such a notorious bill. That, together with the education received in the Farmers alliance schools, has been the means of burying the once grand Republican party so deep that, unlike Rip Van Winkle, it will sleep never to waken again.

And o'er their grave
Shall wave the sign,
The laborers voted
Us out of line.

Let us each and every one do our best to keep up the organization of the F. A. & I. U. Had it not been for the good lessons taught in those meetings success would not have been ours this fall.

Don't throw away time and seed wheat by sowing in the clods. Be sure that the candidate for the United States senate will fearlessly and faithfully represent your home before casting your vote for him. You cannot afford to take any risk. A mistake may prove fatal.

I will never ask for the ballot again if I live one hundred years. But as long as I live I will watch closely the man who opposes it.—Mrs. Dr. McLellan, Topeka.

Those who did not have the pleasure of listening to Mr. Lewelling through the campaign will receive a cordial welcome at his office in the state house after January.

The Peoples' party has reached the end of its rope. The man who rises majestically above the wreck is Senator Peffer.—Capital, November 13th.

If the Peoples' party in two years from now should meet with another wreck like the one of November 8th, they will have full control of the Government. Such wrecks are fatal to the Republican party.

The seed that General J. B. Weaver has been scattering broadcast all over the country since July 4th, will take root and bring forth a tremendous harvest in 1896.

Shawnee county has the honor of furnishing a vice president for the State Alliance, Mrs. M. C. Clark.

Watch the people who always imagine some one is about to sell out. There is something wrong.

With such a lecturer for the F. A. & I. U. as S. M. Scott it is hard to make an estimate of the victory for the Peoples' party in two years from now.

In Oakland, California, last April, a few ladies wishing to enter upon some useful enterprise, formed themselves into a society called the Martha Washington Placer Mining company. They then secured the Peoria Gravel Mines, located in Tuolumne county, California, and sent out their superintendent to Denver, Colorado, to investigate a new invention in machinery for working placer mines. After having secured proper machinery, they commenced business. They have a capital stock of $500,000, divided into two hundred shares of $500 each. They contract no debts, therefore there is no assessments.

They have had nearly $50,000 paid in, notwithstanding this has been a presidential year, and all know that in such a year there is little money for business.

The company is composed mostly of self-supporting women, teachers and widows. No doubt some of the men (heaven pity them) are waiting and watching to see the women fail in their enterprise, and will kindly sympathize with them for the loss of their capital invested in the business, and no doubt will remind them that the failure is all due to their being out of their sphere.

But as long as the ladies keep the business in their own hands, we predict success for the enterprise. With the president, S. Gertrude Smyth, a brilliant business woman, aided by the secretary, Mrs. P. T. Burrell, who is fully competent to fill the important offices she now occupies, there is no such thing as fail.

If any of our sisters have a little capital to invest, write to the company for further information.

WORLD'S FAIR LETTER.

"Consistency, Thou Jewell."

We learn that the Church of Rome, having thoroughly canvassed the records of the life of Christopher Columbus, has decided not to canonize the great discoverer; and all on account of his very pronounced wanderings from the path of virtue, together with the fact that he was really no church-man at all and seldom, if ever, took time to attend mass.

It is a grand thing to be a saint, but it seems that Columbus has missed that distinction. It is about the only thing, however, that he is missing nowadays, and every other honor is showered upon him. His deplorable lack in morals does not stand in the way of his being elaborately memorialized in monuments and public buildings as well as in the World's Exposition.

In contrast with this let me tell you of one of the things which is not to be. An association of women asked for space on which to erect in the grounds a monument of Queen Isabella. This was refused them.

"Why did not your committee welcome this monument?" queried I of an influential member of the committee to whom the application had been made.

"Oh," said my good friend confidentially, "those who know say that Queen Isabella's reputation was not such as would bear inspection."

Alas for queen, and hail explorer!

Truly this is consistent with the general verdict of popular judgment on the relative morality of man and woman.

PUBLIC COMFORT.

Probably nothing in the management of the World's Fair will be more heartily endorsed by both citizen and stranger than the department of public comfort. Only recently organized, it is hard at work. Its chief is already making a list of real estate owners, householders and landlords in the city and suburbs who expect to furnish lodgings to visitors. Such public and private providers are

WHAT YOU WANT.

What you want is to know what you want. And in order to know what you want, you want to know what there is that you want. In other and perhaps clearer language,—general intelligence is admirable, but special information is the desideratum for prospective World's Fair visitors. How can you get it? You shake your heads and say: "Well it is all a muddle. There is going to be so much to be seen that we can't begin to see what we want to, and we will not know where to begin or when we are through."

Of course. It will be so unless you make special preparations beforehand. Begin this week to study the grounds and buildings. Make a set of scrap books for home study, one for each building or group of buildings, and place in each book every item you can find pertaining to its subject and the exhibits which are to appear therein. These scrap books need not be brought with you to the Fair, but will serve to classify your scattering stock of information. As a ground work for this study use a file of the "Illustrated World's Fair," a magnificent periodical which has distanced all competitors in the elegance of its make-up and the attainment of its special mission. It has become widely known by means of the World's Fair Tourist Company, which gives a year's subscription of this incomparable journal to each of its prospective tourists. Mr. McGovern, the able editor is a recognized literature as well as newspaper man and the author of thirteen books, among which are the novels, "Daniel Tremworthy," "David Lockwin" and "Goefrey."

The "Illustrated World's Fair" has had from the first the friendly aid of leaders of thought and in its inception received generous contributions from such men as David Swing, Robert McIntire and Robert G. Ingersoll. It is due entirely to the faith, courage, perseverance and common sense of Mr. Halligan, the publisher, that the "Illustrated World's Fair" was founded and has kept true to its high mission as a worthy exponent of the greatest fair the world has ever seen. It will outlive the Exposition and bids fair to become the best known illustrated journal on the globe.

EMILY A. KELLOGG.

PRODIGAL DAUGHTER.

There's a welcome for the Prodigal son,
The son through sin grown so old,
The doors of fine mansions for him open wide,
Though of his sins, they all have been told.
The crime he committed is forgotten
By father, mother, and sisters, not one
But has a welcome for the wayward
And wild prodigal son.

But, alas, for the prodigal daughter
Who has wandered away from the fold.
Her portion must be isolation and misery,
By the cruel world she's plainly told,
For shame, break down the walls of injustice
That rob life of all that is sweet,
Let us teach the erring to trust us,
And lift them again to their feet.

Are we better than the meek lowly Jesus
Who died while nailed to the cross?
That our sins, though as scarlet should be Whitened,
And that the world might be free from dress.
He died for the Prodigal daughter
As well as the Prodigal son,
And He's prepared a home for His children,
Mercie's doors He will close against none.

A very ugly craze taken up by some ladies is a mixture of yellow flowers and ribbons, with the wings of green parrots. It requires some courage to wear such a head dress.

Lucky Numbers.

Humphreys' Specifics may well be called lucky numbers, and lucky, indeed, are the persons who use them. The thirty-five Specifics cover all diseases from infancy to old age.
